So doth Paul here; for though he stood in doubt of them, or was perplexed for them, yet he sendeth this epistle to them.]

21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? 22 For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a freewoman. 23 But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise. 24 Which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. 25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. 26 But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all. 27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband. 28 Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise. 29 But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now. 30 Nevertheless what saith the scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman. 31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free.

In these verses the apostle illustrates the difference between believers that rested in Christ only, and those Judaizers that trusted in the law, by a comparison taken from the story of Isaac and Ishmael. This he introduces in such a manner as was proper to strike and impress their minds, and to convince them of their great weakness in departing from the truth, and suffering themselves to be deprived of the liberty of the Gospel. "Tell me," says he, "ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?" He takes it for granted that they did hear the law, for among the Jews it was wont to be read in their public assemblies every sabbath day; and since they were so very fond of being under it, he would have them duly to consider what is written therein, referring to what is recorded Gen. xvi. & xxi., which if they would do, they might soon see how little reason they had for it. And here, "For it is written that Abraham had two sons," &c., where he represents the different state and condition of these two sons of Abraham, that the one, namely, Ishmael, "was by a bondmaid;" and the other, namely, Isaac, "by a free woman;" and that whereas the former "was born after the flesh," or by the ordinary course of nature, the other "was by promise," when in the course of nature there was no reason to expect that Sarah should have a son.

Secondly. He acquaints them with the meaning and design of this history, or the use which he intended to make of it, ver. 24—27. "These things," says he, "are an allegory," wherein, besides the literal and historical sense of the words, the Spirit of God might design to signify something farther to us, and that was, that these two, namely, Agar and Sarah, "are the two covenants," or were intended to typify and prefigure the two different dispensations of the covenant. The former, namely, Agar, represented that which was given from mount Sinai, and which gendereth to bondage, which, though it was a dispensation of grace, yet in comparison of the Gospel state was a dispensation of bondage, and became more so to the Jews, through their mistake of the design of it, and expecting to be justified by the works of it. "For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia," (mount Sinai was then called Agar by the Arabians), "and it answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children;" that is, it justly represents the present state of the Jews, who, continuing in their infidelity, and adhering to that covenant, are still in bondage with their children. But the other, namely, Sarah, was intended to prefigure "Jerusalem which is above," or the state of Christians under the new and better dispensation of the covenant, which is free both from the curse of the moral and the bondage of the ceremonial law, and "is the mother of us all," a state into which all, both Jews and Gentiles, are admitted, upon their believing in Christ. And to this greater freedom and enlargement of the church under the gospel dispensation, which was typified by Sarah, the mother of the promised seed, the apostle refers that of the prophet, Isa. liv. 1., where it is written, "Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not, break forth and cry, thou that travailest not; for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband."

Thirdly. He applies the history thus explained to the present case; ver. 28. "Now we, brethren," says he, "as Isaac was, are the children of the promise. We Christians, who have accepted Christ, and rely upon him, and look for justification and salvation by him alone, as hereby we become the spiritual, though we are not the natural seed of Abraham, so we are entitled to the promised inheritance, and interested in the blessings of it. But lest these Christians should be stumbled at the opposition they might meet with from the Jews, who were so tenacious of their law as to be ready to persecute those that would not submit to it, he tells them that this was no more than what was pointed to in the type; for "as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, they must expect it would be so now. But for their comfort in this case he desires them to consider what the Scripture saith, namely, Gen. xxi. 10., "Cast out the bondwoman and her son, for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the free woman." Though the Judaizers should persecute and hate them, yet the issue would be that Judaism would sink, and wither, and perish, but true Christianity should flourish and last for ever. And then, as a general inference from the whole, or the sum of what he had said, he concludes, ver. 31, "So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free."

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter the apostle comes to make application of his foregoing discourse: he begins it with a general caution or exhortation, ver. 1, which he afterwards enforces by several considerations from ver. 2—12. He then presses them to serious practical godliness, which would be the best antidote against the snares of their false teachers, particularly, 1. That they should not strive with one another, ver. 13—15. 11. That they would strive against sin; where he shews, 1. That there is in every one a struggle between flesh and spirit, ver. 17: 2. That it is our duty and interest in this struggle to side with the better part, ver. 16, 18: 3. He instances the works of the flesh, which must be watched against and mortified, and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be brought forth and cherished; and shews of what importance it is that they be so, ver. 19—24. And then concludes the chapter with a caution against pride and envy.

TAND fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. 2 Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. 3 For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4 Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace. 5 For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith. 6 For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love. 7 Ye did run well; who did hinder you that ye should not obey the truth? 8 This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you. 9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. 10 I have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded: but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. 11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased. 12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you.

In the former part of this chapter the apostle cautions the Galatians to take heed of the Judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to bring them back under the bondage of the law. He had been arguing against them before, and had largely shewn how contrary the principles and spirit of those teachers were to the spirit of the Gospel; and now this is, as it were, the general inference or application of all that discourse. Since it appeared, by what had been said, that we could only be justified by faith in Jesus Christ, and not by the righteousness of the law, and that the law of Moses was no longer in force, nor Christians under any obligation to submit to it, therefore he would have them to stand fast "in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and not to be entangled again with the yoke of bondage." Here observe, 1. That under the Gospel we are enfranchised, we are brought into a state of liberty, wherein we are freed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and from the curse of the moral law; so that we are no longer tied to the observation of the one, nor tied up to the rigour of the other, which curses every one that continues not in all things written therein to do them, ch. iii. 10. 2. That we owe this liberty to Jesus Christ. It is he who has made us free; by his merits he has satisfied the demands of the broken law, and by his authority as a king he has discharged us from the obligation of those carnal ordinances which were imposed on the Jews. And, 3. That it is therefore our duty to stand fast in this liberty; that is, constantly and faithfully to adhere to the Gospel and to the liberty of it, and that we do not suffer ourselves upon any considerations to "be entangled again with the yoke of bondage," or persuaded to return back to the law of Moses. This is the general caution or exhortation, which in the following verses the apostle enforces by several reasons or arguments. As,

First. That their submitting to circumcision, and depending on the works of the law for righteousness, was an implicit contradiction of their faith as Christians, and a forfeiture of all their advantages by Jesus Christ, ver. 2—4. And here we may observe,

1. With what solemnity the apostle asserts and declares this; "Behold I Paul say unto you," ver. 2, and he repeats it, ver. 3, "I testify unto you;" as if he had said, I who have proved myself an apostle of Christ, and to have received my ness of St. Paul was a trial to the Galatians. Yet they did not despise (treat with contemptuous indifference) nor actively loathe his teaching, but received him, &c.

iv. 17, 18. "Zealously affect you," &c.: "They (the Judaizing party) pay court zealously to you; nay, they wish to shut you out from their fellowship, that you may pay court to them. This indeed is good in a good cause. I remember your zealous affection. I would it had not grown cold in my absence."

v. 4. "Who are:" rather, "who would be justified in the law;" or, "all ye who are seeking justification," &c. "Ye are fallen;" Lightfoot sees in the word an allusion to the banishment of Hagar. "Ye are driven forth, are banished with Hagar, your mother."

v. 5, 6. Note the connection of the three Christian graces—hope of righteousness by faith, faith working by love. (Compare 1 Thess. i. 3; Col. i. 4, 5.) "Faith worketh by love." These words bridge over the gulf which seems to separate the language of St. Paul and authority and instructions from him, do declare, and am ready to pawn my credit and reputation upon it, "that if you be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing." &c. Wherein he shews that what he was now saying was not only a matter of great importance, but what might be most assuredly depended on. He was so far from being a preacher of circumcision, as some might report him to be, that he looked upon it as a matter of the greatest consequence that they did not submit to it.

2. What it is which he so solemnly and with so much assurance declares. It is, that if they were circumcised Christ would profit them nothing, &c. We are not to suppose that it is mere circumcision which the apostle is here speaking of, or that it was his design to say that none who are circumcised could have any benefit by Christ, for all the Old Testament saints had been circumcised, and he himself had consented to the circumcising of Timothy; but he is to be understood as speaking of circumcision in the sense in which the Judaizing teachers did impose it, who taught "that except they were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses, they could not be saved," Acts xv. 1. And that this is his meaning appears from ver. 4, where he expresses the same thing by their being "justified by the law," or seeking justification by the works of it. Now, in this case, if they submitted to circumcision in this sense, he declares that Christ would profit them nothing; that they were debtors to do the whole law, that Christ was become of none effect to them, and that they were fallen from grace. From all which expressions it appears that thereby they renounced that way of justification which God had established; yea, that they laid themselves under an impossibility of being justified in his sight, for they became debtors to do the whole law, which required such an obedience as they were not capable of performing, and denounced a curse against those that failed in it, and therefore condemned, but could not justify them; and, consequently, that, having thus revolted from Christ, and built their hopes upon the law, Christ would profit them nothing, nor be of any effect to them. Thus, as by being circumcised they renounced their Christianity, so they cut themselves off from all advantage by Christ; and therefore there was the greatest reason why they should steadfastly adhere to that doctrine which they had embraced, and not suffer themselves to be brought under this yoke of bondage. Note, 1. That though Jesus Christ is able to save to the uttermost, yet there are multitudes to whom he shall profit nothing. 2. That all those who seek to be justified by the law do thereby render Christ of none effect to them. By building their hopes on the works of the law they forfeit all their hopes from him; for he will not be the Saviour of any who will not own and rely upon him as their only Saviour.

Secondly. To persuade them to steadfastness in the doctrine and liberty of the Gospel, he sets before them his own example, and that of other Jews who had embraced the Christian religion, and acquaints them what their hopes were; viz., that, through the Spirit, they were waiting "for the hope of righteousness by faith." Though they were Jews by nature, and had been bred up under the law, yet being, through the Spirit, brought to the knowledge of Christ, they had renounced all dependence on the works of the law, and looked for justification and salvation only by faith in him; and therefore it must needs be the greatest folly in them who had never been under the law to suffer themselves to be brought into subjection to it, and to found their hopes upon the works of it. Here we may observe,

1. What it is that Christians are waiting for. It is the hope of righteousness, by which we are chiefly to understand the happiness of the other world. This is called the hope of Christians, as it is the great object of their hope, which they are above every thing else desiring and pursuing; and the hope of righteousness, as their hopes of it are founded on righteousness not their own, but that of our Lord Jesus: for though a life of righteousness is the way that leads to this happiness, yet it is the righteousness of Christ alone which has procured it for us, and on the account of which we can expect to be brought to the possession of it.

2. How they hope to obtain this happiness; and that is, by faith, namely, in our Lord Jesus Christ; not by the works of the law, or any thing they can do to deserve it, but only by faith, receiving and relying upon him as the Lord our righteousness. It is in this way only that they expect either to be entitled to it here or possessed of it hereafter. And,

3. Whence it is that they are thus waiting for the hope of righteousness. It is through the Spirit. Herein they act under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit. It is under his conduct, and by his assistance, that they are both persuaded and enabled to believe on Christ, and to look for the hope of righteousness through him. And when the apostle thus represents the case of Christians, it is implied that if they expected to be justified and saved in any other way they were like to meet with a disappointment, and therefore that they were greatly concerned to adhere to the doctrine of the Gospel which they had embraced.

Thirdly. He argues from the nature and design of the Christian institution, which was to abolish the difference between Jew and Gentile, and to establish faith in Christ, as the way of our acceptance with God. He tells them, ver. 6, that in Christ Jesus, or under the Gospel dispensation, "neither circumcision availeth any thing nor uncircumcision." Though, while the legal state lasted, there was a difference put between Jew and Greek, between those that were and those that were not circumcised, the former being admitted to those privileges of the church of God from which the other were excluded, yet it was otherwise in the gospel state; Christ, who is the end of the law, being come, now it was neither here nor there whether a man was circumcised or uncircumcised, he was neither the better for the one nor the worse for the other, nor would either the one or the other recommend him to God; and therefore, as their Judaizing teachers were very unreasonable in imposing circumcision upon them, and obliging them to observe the law of Moses, so they must needs be very unwise in submitting to them herein. But though he assures them that neither circumcision nor uncircumcision would avail to their acceptance with God, yet he acquaints them what would do so, and that is, "faith which worketh by love;" such a faith in Christ as discovered itself to be true and genuine by a sincere love to God and our neighbour. If they had this, it mattered not whether they were circumcised or uncircumcised, but without it nothing else would stand them in any stead. Note, 1. That no external privileges or profession will avail to our acceptance with God, without a sincere faith in our Lord Jesus. 2. That faith, where it is true, is a working grace. It works by love, love to God, and love to our brethren; and faith thus working by love is all in all in our Christianity. [3. Though faith and love be always conjoined, yet faith, in order of nature at least, hath the precedency; being impossible that we can discharge any duty of love to God or our neighbour, sincerely or acceptably, before we close with Christ for the acceptance of our persons by faith, Heb. xi. 6, and thereby draw covenanted furniture from Christ for through-bearing in our duty, 1 Tim. i. 5; for, saith he, "faith worketh by love," or is efficacious, and putteth forth its efficacy in love, as the fruit thereof.]

Fourthly. To recover them from their backslidings, and engage them to greater steadfastness for the future, he puts them in mind of their good beginnings, and calls upon them to consider whence it was that they were so much altered from what they had been, ver. 7.

St. James. Both assert a principle of practical energy, as opposed to a barren, inactive theory" (Lightfoot).

v. 7—10. The connection of these verses is not very obvious, but seems to be this: "Ye were running in fine style; who hindered you? The persuasion you have now adopted or countenanced is not from God; and though it may seem a trifling thing, or the promoters of it few in number, remember the proverb about the insidious power of leaven. Still, I trust you to perceive the danger. He that

1. He tells them that they did run well. At their first setting out in Christianity they had behaved themselves very commendably, they had readily embraced the Christian religion, and discovered a becoming zeal in the ways and work of it; as in their baptism they were devoted to God, and had declared themselves the disciples of Christ, so their behaviour was agreeable to their character and profession. Note, 1st. That the life of a Christian is a race, wherein he must run, and hold on, if he would obtain the prize. 2nd. That it is not enough that we run in this race, by a profession of Christianity, but we must run well, by living up to that profession. Thus these Christians had done for awhile; but they had been obstructed in their progress, and were either turned out of the way or at least made to flag and falter in it. Therefore,

2. He asks them, and calls upon them to ask themselves, Who did hinder them? or how it came to pass that they did not hold on in the way wherein they had begun to run so well? He very well knew who they were, and what it was that hindered them; but he would have them to put the question to themselves, and seriously consider whether they had any good reason to hearken to those that gave them this disturbance, and whether what they offered was sufficient to justify them in their present conduct. Note, 1st. That many who set out fair in religion, and run well for awhile, run within the bounds appointed for the race, and run with zeal and alacrity too, yet, by some means or other, are hindered in their progress, or turned out of the way. 2nd. That it concerns those who have run well, but now begin either to turn out of the way or to tire in it, to inquire what it is that hinders them. Young converts must expect that Satan will be laying stumblingblocks in their way, and doing all he can to divert them from the course they are in; but, whenever they find themselves in danger of being turned out of it, they would do well to consider who it is that hinders them. Whoever they were that hindered these Christians, the apostle tells them that, by hearkening to them, they were kept from obeying the truth, and thereby in danger of losing the benefit of what they had done in religion. The Gospel which he had preached to them, and which they had embraced and professed, he assures them was the truth; it was therein only that the true way of justification and salvation was fully discovered; and, in order to their enjoying the advantage of it, it was necessary that they should obey it, that they should firmly adhere to it, and continue to govern their lives and hopes according to the directions of it. If, therefore, they should suffer themselves to be drawn away from it, they must needs be guilty of the greatest weakness and folly. Note, First. That the truth is not only to be believed, but to be obeyed, not only to be received in the light of it, but in the love and power of it. Secondly. That they do not rightly obey the truth who do not steadfastly adhere to it. Thirdly. That there is the same reason for our obeying the truth which there was for our embracing it; and therefore they act very unreasonably who, when they have begun to run well in the Christian race, suffer themselves to be hindered so as not to persevere in it.

Fifthly. He argues for their steadfastness in the faith and liberty of the Gospel from the ill rise of that persuasion whereby they were drawn away from it; ver. 8, "This persuasion," says he, "cometh not of him that calleth you." The opinion or persuasion which the apostle here speaks of was, no doubt, that of the necessity of their being circumcised and keeping the law of Moses, or of their mixing the works of the law with faith in Christ in the business of justification. This was what the Judaizing teachers endeavoured to impose upon them, and what they had too easily fallen into. But, to convince them of their folly herein, he tells them that this persuasion did not come of him that called them; that is, either of God, by whose authority the Gospel had been preached to them, and they had been called into the fellowship of it, or of the apostle himself, who had been employed as the instrument of calling them hereunto. It could not come from God, for it was contrary to that way of justification and salvation which he had established; nor could they have received it from Paul himself, for, whatever some might pretend, he had all along been an opposer and not a preacher of circumcision; and if in any instance he had submitted to it for the sake of peace, yet he had never pressed the use of it upon Christians, much less imposed it upon them as necessary to salvation. Since, then, this persuasion did not come of him that had called them, he leaves them to judge from whence it must arise, and sufficiently intimates that it could be owing to none but Satan and his instruments, who by this means were endeavouring to overthrow their faith, and obstruct the progress of the Gospel, and therefore how much reason they had to reject it, and to continue steadfast in the truth which they before embraced. Note, 1. That in order to our judging aright of the different persuasions in religion there are among Christians, it concerns us to inquire whether they come of him that calleth us, whether or no they are founded upon the authority of Christ and his apostles. 2. That if upon inquiry they appear to have no such foundation, how forward soever others may be to impose them upon us, we should by no means submit to them, but reject them.

Sixthly. The danger there was of the spreading of this infection, and the ill influence it might have upon others, is a farther argument which the apostle urges against their complying with their false teachers, in what they would impose on them. It is possible that, to extenuate their fault, they might be ready to say that there were but few of those teachers among them who endeavoured to draw them into this persuasion and practice, or that they were only some lesser matters wherein they complied with them; that though they submitted to be circumcised, and to observe some few rites of the Jewish law, yet they had by no means renounced their Christianity, and gone over to Judaism. Or, suppose their complying thus far was so faulty as he would represent it, yet perhaps they might farther say there were but few among them that had done so, and therefore he need not be so much concerned about it. Now, to obviate such pretences as these, and to convince them that there was more danger in it than they were aware of, he tells them, ver. 9, that "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" that the whole lump of Christianity may be tainted and corrupted by one such erroneous principle, or that the whole lump of the Christian society may be infected by one member of it; and therefore that they were greatly concerned not to yield in this single instance; or, if any had done so, to endeavour, by all proper methods, to purge out the infection from among them. Note, That it is dangerous for Christian churches to encourage those among them who entertain, especially who set themselves to propagate, destructive errors. This was the case here; the doctrine which the false teachers were industrious to spread, and which some in these churches had been drawn into, was subversive of Christianity itself, as the apostle had before shewn; and therefore though the number, either of the one or the other of these, might be but few, yet, considering the fatal tendency of it, and the corruption of human nature, whereby others were too much disposed to be infected with it, he would not have them on that account to be easy and unconcerned, but remember that "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." If these were indulged, the contagion might soon spread farther and wider; and if they suffered themselves to be imposed upon in this instance it might soon issue in the utter ruin of the truth and liberty of the Gospel.

Seventhly. That he might conciliate the greater regard to what he had said, he expresses the hopes he had concerning them: ver. 10, "I have confidence in you," says he, "through the Lord, that you will be none otherwise minded." Though he had many fears and doubts about them, which was the occasion of thus unsettles you shall bear his judgment, whatever his rank or position." "Run well;" St. Paul's favourite metaphor (chap. ii. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 24—27; Phil. iii. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 7). "Leaven;" "The leaven itself is born from corruption, and corrupts the mass with which it is mixed." This idea of corruption seems most prominent in the allusions and prohibitions of the Bible, as when the corrupt doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees is called by Christ "leaven" (Matt. xvi. 6). Its secretly penetrating and diffusive his using so much plainness and freedom with them, yet he hoped that, through the blessing of God upon what he had written, they might be brought to be of the same mind with him, and to own and abide by that truth and liberty of the Gospel which he had preached to them, and was now endeavouring to confirm them in; wherein he teaches us that we ought to hope the best even of those concerning whom we have cause to fear the worst. [As the sinner's first conversion from sin to holiness is God's work, Eph. ii. 5, so the recovery of a sinner from his backsliding and defection is no less a work of infinite power, Psa. li. 10, and the only work of God; for the apostle, speaking of his confidence of their recovery, doth rely not upon their strength, but on the Lord, for bringing about the thing hoped for: "I have confidence in you through the Lord," saith he.] And that they might be the less offended at the reproofs he had given them for their unsteadfastness in the faith, he lays the blame of it more upon others than themselves, for he adds, "But he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be." He was sensible that there were "some that troubled them, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ," as ch. i. 7, and possibly he may point to some one particular man, who was more busy and forward than others, and might be the chief instrument of the disorder that was among them, and to this he imputes their defection or inconstancy more than to any thing in themselves, which may give us occasion to observe that, in reproving sin and error, we should always distinguish between the leaders and the led; such as set themselves to draw others thereto, and such as are drawn aside by them. Thus the apostle softens and alleviates the fault of these Christians, even while he is reproving them, that he might the better persuade them to return to and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. But as for him or them that troubled them, whoever he or they were, he declares they should bear their judgment. He did not doubt but God would deal with them according to their deserts; and, out of his just indignation against them as enemies of Christ and his church, he wishes that "they were even cut off;" not cut off from Christ, and all hopes of salvation by him, but cut off by the censures of the church, which ought to witness against those teachers who thus corrupted the purity of the Gospel. Note, That those, whether ministers or others, who set themselves to overthrow the faith of the Gospel, and disturb the peace of Christians do thereby forfeit the privileges of Christian communion, and deserve to be cut off from them.

Eighthly. To dissuade these Christians from hearkening to their Judaizing teachers, and to recover them from the ill impressions they had made upon them, he represents them as men who had used very base and disingenuous methods to compass their designs, for they had misrepresented him, that they might the more easily gain their ends upon them. That which they were endeavouring was, to bring them to submit to circumcision, and to mix Judaism with their Christianity; and, the better to accomplish this design, they had given out among them that Paul himself was a preacher of circumcision; for when he says, ver. 11, "And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision," it plainly appears that they had reported him to have done so, and that they had made use of this as an argument to prevail with them to submit to it. It is likely they grounded this report upon his having circumcised Timothy, Acts xvi. 3. But though for good reasons he had yielded to circumcision in that instance, yet that he was a preacher of it, and especially in that sense wherein they imposed it, he utterly denies; and, to prove the injustice of this charge upon him he offers such arguments as, if they would allow themselves to consider, could not fail to convince them of it, namely,

1. That if he would have preached circumcision, he might have avoided persecution: If I yet preach circumcision, says he, "Why do I yet suffer persecution?" It was evident, and they could not but be sensible of it, that he was hated and persecuted by the Jews. But what account could be given of this their behaviour towards him, if he had so far symbolised with them as to preach up circumcision and the observation of the law of Moses as necessary to salvation? This was the great point they were contending for; and if he had fallen in with them herein, instead of being exposed to their rage he might have been received into their favour. When, therefore, he was suffering persecution from them, this was a plain evidence he had not complied with them, yea, that he was so far from preaching the doctrine he was charged with, that rather than do so he was willing to expose himself to the greatest hazards.

2. That if he had yielded to the Jews herein, then would the offence of the cross have ceased. They would not have took so much offence against the doctrine of Christianity as they did, nor would he and others have been exposed to so much suffering on the account of it as they were. He acquaints us, 1 Cor. i. 23, that the preaching of the cross of Christ (or the doctrine of justification and salvation only by faith in Christ crucified) was to the Jews a stumblingblock. That which they were most offended at in Christianity was, that thereby circumcision, and the whole frame of the legal administration was set aside as no longer in force. This raised their greatest outcries against it, and stirred them up to oppose and persecute the professors of it. Now if Paul and others could have given in to this opinion that circumcision was still to be retained, and the observation of the law of Moses joined with faith in Christ as necessary to salvation, then their offence against it would have been in a great measure removed, and they might have avoided those sufferings they underwent for the sake of it. But, though others, and particularly those who were so forward to asperse him as a preacher of this doctrine, could easily come into, yet so could not he; he rather chose to hazard his ease and credit, yea, his very life itself, than thus to corrupt the truth, and give up the liberty of the Gospel. And hence it was that the Jews continued to be so much offended against Christianity, and against him as the preacher of it. Thus the apostle clears himself from the unjust reproach which his enemies had cast upon him, and at the same time shews how little regard was due to those men who could treat him in such an injurious manner, and how much reason he had to wish that they were even cut off.

13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. 14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. 16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. 17 For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would. 18 But if ye be led of the Spirit, ye are not under the law. 19 Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, 20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, 21 Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. 22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, 23 Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law. 24 And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. 25 If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. 26 Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

In the latter part of this chapter the apostle comes to exhort these Christians to serious practical godliness, as the best antidote against the snares of the false teachers. Two things especially he presses upon them,

First. That they should not strive with one another, but love one another. He tells them, ver. 13, that they had "been called unto liberty;" and he would have them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free; but yet he would have them be very careful that they did not "use this liberty as an occasion to the flesh," that they did not from thence take occasion to indulge themselves in any corrupt affections and practices, and particularly such as might create distance and disaffection, and be the ground of quarrels and contentions among them. But, on the contrary, he would have them by love to serve one another, to maintain that mutual love and affection which, notwithstanding any lesser differences there might be among them, would dispose them to all those offices of respect and kindness to each other which the Christian religion obliged them to. Note, 1. That the liberty we enjoy as Christians is not a licentious liberty. Though Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, yet he has not freed us from the obligation of it. The Gospel is a doctrine according to godliness, 1 Tim. vi. 3, and is so far from giving the least countenance to sin, that it lays us under the strongest obligations to avoid and subdue it. 2. That though we ought to stand fast in our Christian liberty, yet we should not insist upon it to the breach of Christian charity. We should not use it as an occasion of strife and contention with our fellow Christians, who may be differently minded from us, but should always maintain such a temper towards each other as may dispose us by love to serve one another. This the apostle endeavours to persuade these Christians to, and there are two considerations which he sets before them to this purpose:—

1st. That "all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," ver. 14. Love is the sum of the whole law; as love to God comprises the duties of the first table, so love to our neighbour those of the second. The apostle takes notice of the latter here, because he was speaking of their behaviour towards one another: and when he makes use of this as an argument to persuade them to mutual love, he intimates both that this would be a good evidence of their sincerity in religion and also the most likely means of rooting out those dissensions and divisions that were among them. It will appear that we are the disciples of Christ indeed when we have love one to another, Jno. xiii. 35; and where this temper is kept up, if it do not wholly extinguish those unhappy discords that are among Christians, yet at least it will so far accommodate them as that the fatal consequences of them may be prevented.

2nd. The sad and dangerous tendency of a contrary behaviour, ver. 15. But, says he, if instead of serving one another in love, and therein fulfilling the law of God, "ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." If, instead of acting like men and Christians, they would behave themselves more like brute beasts in tearing and rending one another, they could expect nothing else as the consequence of it but that they would be consumed one of another; and therefore they had the greatest reason not to indulge themselves in such quarrels and animosities. Note, That mutual strifes among brethren, if persisted in, are like to prove a common ruin; they that devour one another are in a fair way to be consumed one of another. Christian churches cannot be ruined but by their own hands; but if Christians, that should be helps to one another, and a joy one to another, be as brute beasts, biting and devouring each other, what can be expected but that the God of love should deny his grace to them, and the Spirit of love should depart from them, and that the evil spirit that seeks the destruction of them all should prevail?

Secondly. That they would all strive against sin; and happy would it be for the church if Christians would let all their quarrels be swallowed up of this, even a quarrel against sin,—if, instead of biting and devouring one another on the account of their different opinions, they would all set themselves against sin in themselves and the places where they live. This is what we are chiefly concerned to fight against, and that which above every thing else we should power is also alluded to in other passages; see, for example, 1 Cor. v. 6.

v. 11, 12. It seems from this that St. Paul had been accused of preaching circumcision. Alford renders verse 12 thus: "Would that they which unsettle you would even cut themselves off." Many think that the words "cut off" stand in antithesis to circumcision. Lightfoot paraphrases, "Why do they stop at circumcision? Why do they not mutilate themselves, like your priests of Cybele?"

v. 13. "Use not liberty:" or, rather, "turn not your liberty into," &c.

v. 17. "Ye cannot do:" Alford has, "so that ye may not do." The parallel passage (Rom. vii. 15, 16) perhaps best determines the meaning.

v. 19—21. The sins enumerated may be divided into four classes: (1) sensual—fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness (or wantonness); (2) idolatrous practices—idolatry, witchcraft (or sorcery); make it our business to oppose and suppress. To excite Christians hereunto, and to assist them herein, the apostle shews,

1. That there is in every one a struggle between the flesh and the spirit; ver. 17, "The flesh," that is, the corrupt and carnal part of us, "lusteth," that is, strives and struggles with strength and vigour, "against the Spirit;" it opposes all the motions of the Spirit, and resists every thing that is spiritual. On the other hand, "the Spirit," that is, the renewed part of us, strives "against the flesh," and opposes the will and desire of it; and from hence it comes to pass "that we cannot do the things that we would;" as the principle of grace in us will not suffer us to do all the evil which our corrupt nature would prompt us to, so neither can we do all the good that we would, by reason of the oppositions we meet with from that corrupt and carnal principle. Even as in a natural man there is something of this struggle, the convictions of his conscience, and the corruption of his own heart, strive with one another; his convictions would suppress his corruptions, and his corruptions silence his convictions,—so in a renewed man, where there is something of a good principle, there is a struggle between the old nature and the new nature, the remainders of sin and the beginnings of grace; and this Christians must expect will be their exercise as long as they continue in this world.

2. That it is our duty and interest in this struggle to side with the better part, to side with our convictions against our corruptions, and with our graces against our lusts. This the apostle represents as our duty, and directs us to the most effectual means of success in it. If it should be asked, what course must we take that the better interest may get the better? he gives us this one general rule, which, if duly observed, would be the most sovereign remedy against the prevalence of corruption, and that is to walk in the Spirit; ver. 16, "This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh." By the Spirit here may be meant either the Holy Spirit himself, who condescends to dwell in the hearts of those whom he has renewed and sanctified, to guide and assist them in the way of their duty, or that gracious principle which he implants in the souls of his people, and which lusts against the flesh, or that corrupt principle which still remains in them, as that does against it. Accordingly the duty here recommended to us is, that we set ourselves to act under the conduct and influence of the blessed Spirit, and agreeably to the motions and tendency of the new nature in us. And if this be our care in the ordinary course and tenor of our lives, we may depend upon it that, though we may not be freed from the stirrings and oppositions of our corrupt nature, yet we shall be kept from fulfilling it in the lusts thereof, so that, though it remain in us, yet it shall not obtain a dominion over us. Note, [1st. There is not any possibility of getting the power of inbred corruption subdued, or the lusts of sinful flesh curbed to any saving purpose by a natural man, or by any man, without a work of saving grace wrought in his heart by the Spirit of God; for he prescribeth unto them "walking in the Spirit," as the only remedy against "fulfilling the lusts of the flesh," which supposeth that the Spirit, or the work of saving grace and regeneration wrought by the Spirit, must be first in them.] 2nd. That the best antidote against the poison of sin is, to walk in the Spirit, to be much in conversing with spiritual things, to mind the things of the soul, which is the spiritual part of man, more than those of the body, which is his carnal part,—to commit ourselves to the guidance of the word, wherein the Holy Spirit makes known the will of God concerning us, and in the way of our duty to act in a dependence on his aids and influences. And as this would be the best means of preserving them from fulfilling the lusts of the flesh, so it would be a good evidence that they were Christians indeed; for, says the apostle, ver. 18, "If ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law," as if he had said, you must expect a struggle between flesh and spirit, as long as you are in the world, that the flesh will be lusting against the spirit, as well as the spirit against the flesh; but if in the prevailing bent and tenor of your lives you are led by the Spirit,—if you act under the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit, and of that spiritual nature and disposition he has wrought in you, if you make the word of God your rule, and the grace of God your principle,—it will from hence appear that you are not under the law, not under the condemning, though you are still under the commanding, power of it; for "there is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit; and as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God," 1-John viii. 1-14.

3. The apostle instances the works of the flesh, which must be watched against and mortified, and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be cherished and brought forth, ver. 19, &c.; and by instancing particulars he farther illustrates what he is here upon. He begins,

1st. With "the works of the flesh," which, as they are many, so they are "manifest." It is past dispute that the things he here speaks of are the works of the flesh, or the product of corrupt and depraved nature; most of them are condemned by the light of nature itself, and all of them by the light of Scripture. The particulars he instances are of various sorts; some are sins against the seventh commandment, such as "adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness," by which are meant not only the gross acts of these sins, but all such thoughts, or words, or actions, as have a tendency towards the great transgression. Some are sins against the first and second commandments, as idolatry and witchcraft; others are sins against our neighbour, and contrary to the royal law of brotherly love, such as hatred, variance, emulations, [not that good emulation whereby we strive to excel others in that which is good, not for love of applause or other by-respects, but merely from the love which we carry unto that which is good, (this is commanded, 1 Cor. xiv. 12.) but carnal emulations, whereby we are grieved at the good which is in others, not so much from hatred to their good as because it overshadoweth us, and therefore is joined with a desire to outstrip them in that good, which we are grieved for, wherewith it differeth from envy:] wrath, strife, which too often occasion seditions, heresies, envyings, and sometimes break out into murders, not only of the names and reputation, but even of the very lives of our fellow-creatures. Others are sins against ourselves, such as drunkenness and revellings; and he concludes the catalogue with an et cætera, and gives fair warning to all to take care of them, as they hope to see the face of God with comfort. Of these, and "such like," says he, "I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things," how much soever they may flatter themselves with vain hopes, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. These are sins which will undoubtedly shut men out of heaven. The world of spirits can never be comfortable to those that plunge themselves in the filth of the flesh; nor will the righteous and holy God ever admit such into his favour and presence, unless they are first "washed, and sanctified, and justified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 11.

2nd. He instances the fruits of the Spirit, or the renewed nature, which as Christians we are concerned to bring forth, ver. 22, 23. And here we may observe, that as sin is called the work of the flesh, because the flesh, or corrupt nature, is the principle that moves and excites men to it, so grace is said to be the fruit of the Spirit, because it wholly proceeds from the Spirit, as the fruit does from the root. And whereas, before the apostle had chiefly instanced those works of the flesh which were not only hurtful to men themselves, but tended to make them so to one another, so here he chiefly takes notice of those fruits of the Spirit which had a tendency to make Christians agreeable one to another, as well as easy to themselves. And this was very suitable to the caution or exhortation he had before given, ver. 13, that they would "not use their liberty as an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another;" particularly he recommends to us love, namely, to God especially, and to one another for his sake; joy, by which may be understood cheerfulness in conversation with our friends, or rather a constant delight in God; peace, namely, with God and conscience, or a peaceableness of temper and behaviour towards others; longsuffering, that is, patience to defer anger, and a contentedness to bear injuries; gentleness, that is, such a sweetness of temper, and especially towards our inferiors, as disposes us to be affable and courteous, and easy to be entreated when any have wronged us; goodness, that is kindness and beneficence, which shews itself in a readiness to do good to all, as we have opportunity; faith, that is, fidelity, justice, and honesty in what we profess and promise to others; meekness, wherewith to govern our passions and resentments, so as not to be easily provoked, and when we are so, to be soon pacified; and temperance, namely, in meat and drink, and other enjoyments of life, so as not to be excessive and immoderate in the use of them. And concerning these things, or those in whom these fruits of the Spirit are found, the apostle says, "there is no law against them," that is, to condemn and punish them. Yea, from hence it appears that they are not under the law, but under grace; for these fruits of the Spirit, in whomsoever they are found, do plainly shew that such are "led by the Spirit," and consequently that they are not "under the law," as ver. 18. [In these words, (against which there is no law,) by a figure, or flower of speech, more is to be understood than is spoken, as Ps. li. 17, even that the moral law (concerning the standing whereof, as to its directing power, there was no controversy betwixt Paul and his adversaries) doth expressly command and commend them, which could not be said of those ceremonial abstinences or performances, so much urged by the false apostles.]

And as by instancing these works of the flesh, and fruits of the Spirit, the apostle directs us both what we are to avoid and oppose and what we are to cherish and cultivate, so, ver. 24, he acquaints us that this is the sincere care and endeavour of all real Christians. "And they that are Christ's," says he, "that is, they who are Christians indeed, not only in shew and profession, but in sincerity and truth, [all they who are led by and walk in the Spirit, or who are truly regenerate, and who are actually engaged in the work of mortifying their corrupt nature,] are Christ's in a peculiar manner, [to wit, by right of donation from the Father, John. vi. 37, by right of emption or redemption, 1 Cor. vi. 20, and by right of resignation, all such having actually resigned themselves unto Christ, as a mansion for him to dwell and walk in, 1 Cor. vi. 19, and in every thing to be guided by him, Acts ix. 6; for the apostle useth those expressions indifferently as being of equal extent; "Walk in the Spirit," ver. 16, and "if ye be led by the Spirit," ver. 18, and in this verse, "They who are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts," that is, the root of corruption, and then they have crucified all its branches, not only affections, or vexing passions, but also desirable lusts.] As in their baptism they were obliged hereunto, being baptized into Christ they were baptized into his death, Rom. vi. 3, so they are now sincerely employing themselves herein, and, in conformity to the Lord and head, are endeavouring to die unto sin, as he had died for it. They have not yet obtained a complete victory over it, they have still flesh as well as spirit in them, and that has its affections and lusts, which continue to give them no little disturbance; but as it does not now "reign in their mortal bodies, so as that they obey it in the lusts thereof," Rom. vi. 12, so they are seeking the utter ruin and destruction of it, and to put it to the same shameful and ignominious, though lingering, death which our Lord Jesus underwent for our sakes. [Note, 1. There is not any argument more moving or effectually exciting unto the work of mortification with a sincere Christian than that which is taken from his engagement to it by profession, and the first beginnings thereof wrought in him already by the Spirit of God; for this is the apostle's scope, that they would not walk in or fulfil the lusts of the flesh, because all of them were engaged by profession to crucify the flesh, and some had actually begun to do so already; "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh," saith he.] 2. That if we would approve ourselves to be Christ's, such as are united to him, and interested in him, we must make it our constant care and business to crucify the flesh with its corrupt affections and lusts. Christ will never own those as his who yield themselves the servants of sin. But though the apostle here only mentions crucifying of the flesh with the affections and lusts, as the care and character of real Christians, yet no doubt it is also implied that on the other hand we should shew forth those fruits of the Spirit which he had just before been instancing. This is no less our duty than that, nor is it less necessary to evidence our sincerity in religion. It is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. Our Christianity obliges us not only to die unto sin, but to live unto righteousness; not only to oppose the works of the flesh, but to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit too. If, therefore, we would make it appear that we do indeed belong to Christ, this must be our sincere care and endeavour as well as the other. And that it was the design of the apostle to represent both the one and the other of these as our duty, and as necessary to support our character as Christians, may be gathered from what follows, ver. 25, where he adds, "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit," that is, if we profess to have received the Spirit of Christ, or that we are renewed in the spirit of our minds, and ended with a principle of spiritual life, let us make it appear by the proper fruits of the Spirit in our lives. He had before told us that the Spirit of Christ is a privilege bestowed on all the children of God, ch. iv. 6. Now, says he, if we profess to be of this number, and as such to have obtained this privilege, let us shew it by a temper and behaviour agreeable hereunto, let us evidence our good principles by good practices. Our conversation will always be answerable to the principle which we are under the conduct and government of; as "they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh, so they that are after the Spirit do mind the things of the Spirit," Rom. vii. 5. If, therefore, we would have it appear that we are Christ's, and that we are partakers of his Spirit, it must be by our "walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." We must set ourselves in good earnest both to mortify the deeds of the body and to walk in newness of life.

[The Lord's method in bestowing grace upon graceless sinners is, first, to infuse the principles of a new life, or gracious habits and powers in the soul; and next, to actuate these powers, making them actually to do those works which are spiritually good. Spiritual motion and action presupposeth a principle of a spiritual life, as a thing previous unto, and different from it; for, saith he, "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit."]

4th. The apostle concludes this chapter with a caution against pride and envy, ver. 26. He had before been exhorting these Christians by love to serve one another, ver. 13; and had put them in mind of what would be the consequence if, instead of that, they did "bite and devour one another," ver. 15. Now, as a means of engaging them to the one, and preserving them from the other of these, he here cautions them against being desirous of vain glory, or giving way to an undue affectation of the esteem and applause of men, because this, if it were indulged, would certainly lead them to provoke one another, and to envy one another. As far as this temper prevails among Christians

(3) unbrotherly feelings, growing in intensity—hatred, variance (or strife), emulations (or jealousy and rivalry), wrath, strife (or self-seeking or factious cabals), seditions (or divisions), heresies—the first being the temporary, the second the more permanent form—envyings, the wish to deprive another of what he has; (4) the outcome of all, the sin bringing forth death—murder.

v. 22, 23. The list falls into three groups of three: (1) Christian habits of mind—love, joy, peace; (2) social qualities—long-suffering, gentleness (or kindness), goodness; (3) general conduct—faith (or rather faithfulness, honesty), meekness (or gentleness), temperance.

v. 24. "Have crucified;" the word should be rendered "crucified." The tense expresses an act of the past, complete and decisive.

v. 26. "Desirous of vain-glory;" or, "let us not become vain-glorious."

vi. 1. The earnestness of this appeal, Lightfoot thinks, may be they will be ready to slight and despise those whom they look upon as inferior to them, and to be out of humour if they are denied that respect which they think is their due from them; and they will also be apt to envy those by whom their reputation is in any danger of being lessened; and thus a foundation is laid for those quarrels and contentions which, as they are inconsistent with that love which Christians ought to maintain towards each other, so are greatly prejudicial to the honour and interest of religion itself. This therefore the apostle would have us by all means to watch against. Note, First. That the glory which comes from men is vain glory, which, instead of being desirous of, we should be dead to. Note, Secondly. That an undue regard to the approbation and applause of men is one great ground of the unhappy strifes and contentions that are among Christians.

CHAPTER VI.

This chapter chiefly consists of two parts: in the former the apostle gives us several plain and practical directions, which more especially tend to instruct Christians in their duty to one another, and to promote the communion of saints in love, from ver. 1—10. In the latter he revives the main design of the epistle, which was to fortify the Galatians against the arts of their Judaizing teachers, and to confirm them in the truth and liberty of the Gospel; to which purpose he, 1. Gives them the true character of these teachers, and shews them from what motives and with what views they acted, from ver. 11—14. And, 2. On the other hand he acquaints them with his own temper and behaviour; from both which they might easily see how little reason they had to slight him, and to fall in with them. And then he concludes the epistle with a solemn benediction.

BRETHREN, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. 2 Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. 3 For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. 4 But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. 5 For every man shall bear his own burden. 6 Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things. 7 Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. 8 For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. 9 And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. 10 As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

The apostle having in the foregoing chapter exhorted Christians by love to serve one another, ver. 13, and also cautioned us, ver. 26, against a temper which, if indulged, would hinder us from shewing that mutual love and serviceableness which he had recommended, in the beginning of this chapter he proceeds to give us some farther directions, which, if duly observed, would both promote the one and prevent the other of these, and render our behaviour both more agreeable to our Christian profession and more useful and comfortable to one another; particularly,

First. We are here taught to deal tenderly with those that are overtaken in a fault, ver. 1. He puts a common case, "If a man be overtaken in a fault; he is brought to sin by the surprise of temptation. It is one thing to overtake a fault by contrivance, and deliberation, and full resolution in sin, and another thing to be overtaken in a fault. The latter is the case here supposed, and herein the apostle shews that great tenderness should be used. They which are spiritual, by whom is meant not only the ministers, as if none but they were to be called spiritual persons, but other Christians too, especially those of the higher forms in Christianity, these must 'restore such a one with the spirit of meekness.'" Here observe, 1. The duty we are directed to, which is to restore such: we should labour by faithful reproofs, and pertinent and reasonable counsels, to bring them to repentance. The original word καταρτίσκει, signifies to set in joint, as a dislocated bone is; accordingly we should endeavour to set them in joint again, to bring them to themselves, by convincing them of their sin and error, persuading them to return to their duty, and comforting them in a sense of pardoning mercy thereupon; and, having thus recovered them, to confirm our love to them. 2. The manner wherein this is to be done, namely, with the spirit of meekness; not in wrath and passion, as those that triumph in a brother's falls, but with meekness, as those that rather mourn for them. Many needful reproofs lose their efficacy by being given in wrath; but when they are managed with calmness and tenderness, and appear to proceed from a sincere affection to them, and concern for their welfare, they are like to make a due impression. 3. A very good reason why this should be done with meekness; "Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." We ought to deal very tenderly with those that are overtaken in sin, because we none of us know but it may some time or other be our own case. We also may be tempted, yea, and overcome, by the temptation; and therefore, if we rightly consider ourselves, this will dispose us to do by others as we desire to be done by in such a case.

Secondly. We are here directed to bear "one another's burdens," ver. 2. This may be considered either as referring to what goes before, and so may teach us to exercise forbearance and compassion towards one another in the case of those weaknesses, and follies, and infirmities which too often attend us,—that though we should not wholly connive at them, yet we should not be severe against one another on the account of them,—or as a more general precept, and so it directs us to sympathize with one another under the various trials and troubles that we may meet with, and to be ready to afford each other that comfort and counsel, that help and assistance, which our circumstances may require. And, to excite us hereunto, the apostle adds, by way of motive, that so we shall "fulfil the law of Christ." This is to act agreeably to the law of his precept, which is the law of love, and obliges us to a mutual forbearance and forgiveness, to sympathy with, and compassion towards, each other; and it would also be agreeable to his pattern and example, which has the force of a law to us. He bears with us under our weaknesses and follies; he is touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities; and therefore there is good reason we should maintain the same temper towards one another. Note, Though as Christians we are freed from the law of Moses, yet we are under the law of Christ; and therefore, instead of laying unnecessary burthens upon others, as those that urged the observation of Moses' law did, it much more becomes us to fulfil the law of Christ by bearing one another's burthens.

The apostle, being aware how great a hindrance pride would be to that mutual condescension and sympathy which he had been recommending, and that a conceit of ourselves would dispose us to censure and condemn our brethren, instead of bearing with their infirmities, and endeavouring to restore them when overtaken with a fault, he therefore, ver. 3, takes care to caution us against this. He supposes it as a very possible thing (and it would be well if it were not too common,) for a man to "think himself to be something," to entertain a fond opinion of his own sufficiency, to look upon himself as wiser and better than other men, and as fit to dictate and prescribe to them, when in truth he is nothing, has nothing of substance or solidity in him, or that can be a ground of that confidence and superiority which he assumes. And, to dissuade us from giving way to this temper, he tells us that such a one does but deceive himself; while he imposes upon others by pretending to what he has not, he puts the greatest cheat upon himself, and sooner or later will find the sad effects of it. This will never gain him that esteem either with God or men which he is ready to expect; he is neither the freer from mistakes nor will he be the more secure against temptations for the good opinion he has of his own sufficiency, but rather the more liable to fall into them, and to be overcome by them; for "he that thinks he stands had need to take heed lest he fall." Instead therefore of indulging such a vain-glorious humour, which is both destructive of that love and kindness we owe to our fellow Christians and also injurious to ourselves, it would much better become us to accept the apostle's exhortation, Phil. ii. 3, "To do nothing through strife or vain glory; but that in lowliness of mind we should each esteem other better than ourselves." Note, That self-conceit is but self-deceit. As it is inconsistent with that charity we owe to others, for "charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up," 1 Cor. xiii. 4, so it is a cheat upon ourselves, and there is not a more dangerous cheat in the world than self-deceit is. As a means of preventing this evil, Thirdly. We are advised every one to prove his own work, ver. 4. By our own work is chiefly meant our own actions or behaviour. These the apostle directs us to prove; that is, seriously and impartially to examine them by the rule of God's word, to see whether or no they are agreeable to it, and therefore such as God and conscience do approve of. And this he represents as the duty of every man; instead of being forward to judge and censure others, it would much more become us to search and try our own ways: our business lies more at home than abroad, with ourselves than with other men; for what have we to do to judge another man's servant? And from the connexion of this exhortation with what goes before, it appears that, if Christians did duly employ themselves in this work they might easily discover those defects and failings in themselves which would soon convince them how little reason they have either to be conceited of themselves or severe in their censures of others. And so it gives us occasion to observe, that the best way to keep us from being proud of ourselves is to prove our ourselves; the better we are acquainted with our own hearts and ways, the less liable shall we be to despise, and the more disposed to compassionate and help, others under their infirmities and afflictions. And that we might be persuaded to this necessary and profitable duty of proving our own work, the apostle urges two considerations very proper for this purpose.

1. That this is the way to have rejoicing in ourselves alone. If we set ourselves in good earnest to prove our own work, and upon the trial can approve ourselves to God, as to our sincerity and uprightness towards him, then may we expect to have comfort and peace in our own souls, having the testimony of our own consciences for us, as 2 Cor. i. 12. And this he intimates would be a much better ground of joy and satisfaction than to be able to rejoice in another, either in the good opinion which the false teachers were wont to glory in, as we see ver. 13; or by comparing ourselves with others, as it should seem some did, who were ready to think well of themselves, because they were not so bad as some others. Too many are apt to value themselves upon such accounts as these; but the joy that results from thence is nothing to that which arises from an impartial trial of ourselves by the rule of God's word, and our being able thereupon to approve ourselves to him. Note, 1st. That though we have nothing in ourselves to boast of, yet we may have matter of rejoicing in ourselves. Our works can merit nothing at the hand of God, but if our consciences can witness for us, that they are such as he [hath wrought in us, and] for Christ's sake approves and accepts, we may upon good ground rejoice therein. 2nd. That the true way to have rejoicing in ourselves is to be much in proving our own works; in examining ourselves by the unerring rule of God's word, and not by the false measure of what others are, or may think of us. 3rd. That it is much more desirable to have matter of glorying in ourselves than in another. If we have the testimony of our consciences that we are accepted of God, we need not much concern ourselves about what others think or say of us; and without this the good opinion of others will stand us in little stead.

2. The other argument which the apostle uses to press upon us this duty of proving our own work is, that "every man shall bear his own burden," ver. 5; the meaning of which is, that at the great day every one shall be reckoned with according as his behaviour here has been. He supposes that there is a day coming when we must all give an account of ourselves to God; and he declares that then the judgment will proceed, and the sentence pass, not according to the sentiments of the world concerning us, or any ungrounded opinion we may have had of ourselves, or upon our having been better or worse than others, but according as our state and behaviour had really been in the sight of God. And if there be such an awful time to be expected, when he will render to every one according to his works, sure there is the greatest reason why we explained by circumstances which were probably engaging St. Paul's attention when he wrote this epistle, viz., the grave offence committed at Corinth, and the almost undue severity which some there had been disposed to show to the offender. Compare 2 Cor. ii. 6—8, where the tone is similar to this. "Overtaken in a fault;" not betrayed into sin, as in the Commentary, but if a man be caught in the act before escaping. "Considering thyself;" the transition in this clause to the singular from the plural gives point to the exhortation—each one of those who had to deal with the offender should remember his own weakness.

vi. 2. "Burdens," "law;" the words seem used with reference to the ritualistic tendencies of the Galatians (see chap. v. 13, 14). "If you must have these burdens, &c., bear one another's," and the more so when a brother has fallen; and so fulfil Christ's law."

vi. 5. "Burden;" not the same word which is used in verse 2. The word there points to a load which may be fairly got rid of;

should prove our own works now; if we must certainly be called to an account hereafter, sure we ought to be often calling ourselves to an account here, to see whether or no we are such as God will own and approve then; and as this is our duty, so if it were more our practice, we should entertain more becoming thoughts both of ourselves and our fellow Christians; and instead of bearing hard upon one another, on the account of any mistakes or failings we may be guilty of, we should be more ready to fulfil that law of Christ by which we must be judged in bearing one another's burthens.

Fourthly, Christians are here exhorted to be free and liberal in maintaining their ministers; ver. 6, "Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things." Where we may observe,

1. That the apostle speaks of it as a thing known and acknowledged, that as there are some to be taught, so there are others who are appointed to teach them. The office of the ministry is a Divine institution, which does not lie open in common to all, but is confined to those only whom God has qualified for it, and called to it. Even reason itself directs us to put a difference between the teachers and the taught; for if all were teachers there would be none to be taught, and the Scriptures sufficiently declare that it is the will of God we should do so.

2. That it is the word of God wherein ministers are to teach and instruct others; that which they are to preach is the word, 2 Tim. iv. 2; that which they are to declare is the counsel of God, Acts xx. 27; they are not "lords of our faith, but helpers of our joy," 2 Cor. i. 24. It is the word of God which is the only rule of faith and life; this they are concerned to study, and to open, and improve for the edification of others, but are no farther to be regarded than as they speak according to this rule.

3. That it is the duty of those who are taught in the word to support those who are appointed to teach them; for they are to communicate to them in all good things; that is, freely and cheerfully to contribute of the good things which God has blessed them with, what is needful for their comfortable subsistence. Ministers are to "give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine," 1 Tim. iv. 13; they are not to "entangle themselves with the affairs of this life," 2 Tim. ii. 4; and therefore it is but fit and equitable that, while they are sowing to others spiritual things, they should reap their carnal things. And this is the appointment of God himself; for as, under the law, they who ministered about holy things lived of the things of the temple, so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 11, 13, 14.

4. The church's maintenance is only due unto such ministers as have abilities to preach the Gospel, and are faithful and diligent labourers in the word, according to those abilities wherewith they are endued; and therefore, though private men are not hereby warranted to withdraw the ordinary and allowed maintenance from their ministers upon pretence that they are either not able, or not painful, Mat. xiii. 2, 3, yet it concerneth those whom Christ hath intrusted to be overseers of his house to be careful that such who are either really unfit or unwilling to preach be removed from their charge, and not suffered to eat up the church's maintenance, feeding themselves, and starving the souls of people committed to their charge; therefore the apostle, while he pleadeth for maintenance to a minister, doth describe him from the actual exercise of his calling, "Let him communicate to him that teacheth."

Fifthly, Here is a caution to take heed of mocking God, or of deceiving ourselves, by imagining that he can be imposed upon by mere pretensions or professions; ver. 7, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." This may be considered as referring to the foregoing exhortation, and so the design of it is to convince those of their sin and folly who endeavoured by any plausible pretences to excuse themselves from doing their duty in supporting their ministers. Or, it may be taken in a more general view, as respecting the whole business of religion, and so as designed to take men off from entertaining any vain hopes of enjoying the rewards of it, while they live in the neglect of the duties of it. The apostle here supposes that many are apt to excuse themselves from the work of religion, and especially the more self-denying and chargeable parts of it, though at the same time they may make a show and profession of it; but he assures them that this their way is their folly, for though hereby they may possibly impose upon others, yet they do but deceive themselves if they think to impose upon God, who is perfectly acquainted with their hearts as well as actions, and as he cannot be deceived so will not be mocked.

[Note, 1. As the sin of backwardness in people to bestow any thing for upholding the Gospel in the public ministry thereof is very common, and hath begun early in the Christian church, so the minister of Christ may not, upon pretence of modesty, as being unwilling to kyth [appear] much in that wherein his particular advantage is any way concerned, suffer this sin to go unreprieved more than others; seeing it tendeth so much to the Gospel's prejudice, and that it is excess of modesty which impeded the practice of a necessary duty; for Paul, observing this sin to have been too common, even in his time, doth sharply admonish and rebuke those who were guilty of it, while he saith, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." 2. Neglecters of duty, and chiefly of expensive duties, such as is that of giving competent maintenance to the ministry, are very quick and witty to find out pretexts and excuses to colour their sin, and so to seal the eyes of those whom they have to do with; and this all that they may enjoy the profit of sin, and yet eschew the shame and imputation of it before men; for Paul doth here meet with such witty excuses, and with those who made use of them: "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." 3. Though God be always the sinner's party, whatever sin he doth commit, Pr. li. 4, yet, seeing ministers are Christ's ambassadors, 2 Cor. v. 20, and that the contemning or discouraging of them by withholding competent maintenance from them doth so directly tend to the utter overthrow of religion and decay of all public worship; therefore he is in a singular manner party, and will kyth [show] himself to be so unto all who are guilty of so doing; for the apostle representeth the Lord as the party whom they had to deal with, while he saith, "Be not deceived, God is not mocked."] And therefore, to prevent this, he directs us to lay it down as a rule to ourselves, that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap; or that according as we behave ourselves now, so will our account be in the great day. Our present time is seedtime, in the other world there will be a great harvest; and as the husbandman reaps in the harvest according as he sows in the seedness, so we shall reap then as we sow now. And he farther acquaints us, ver. 8, that as there are two sorts of seedness, namely, sowing to the flesh and sowing to the spirit, so accordingly will the reckoning be hereafter: "If we sow to the flesh, we shall of the flesh reap corruption; if we sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind." They that live a carnal, sensual life, who, instead of employing themselves to the honour of God, and the good of others, spend all their thoughts, and care, and time about the flesh, must expect no other fruit of such a course but corruption, a mean and short-lived satisfaction at present, and ruin and misery at the end of it. But, on the other hand, they that sow to the Spirit, who under the conduct and influence of the Spirit do live a holy and spiritual life, a life of devotedness to God, and of usefulness and serviceableness to others, may depend upon it that of the Spirit they "shall reap life everlasting;" they shall have the truest comfort in their present course, and an eternal life and happiness at the end of it.

And therefore, to prevent this, he directs us to lay it down as a rule to ourselves, that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap; or that according as we behave ourselves now, so will our account be in the great day. Our present time is seedtime, in the other world there will be a great harvest; and as the husbandman reaps in the harvest according as he sows in the seedness, so we shall reap then as we sow now. And he farther acquaints us, ver. 8, that as there are two sorts of seedness, namely, sowing to the flesh and sowing to the spirit, so accordingly will the reckoning be hereafter: "If we sow to the flesh, we shall of the flesh reap corruption; if we sow the wind, we shall reap the whirlwind." They that live a carnal, sensual life, who, instead of employing themselves to the honour of God, and the good of others, spend all their thoughts, and care, and time about the flesh, must expect no other fruit of such a course but corruption, a mean and short-lived satisfaction at present, and ruin and misery at the end of it. But, on the other hand, they that sow to the Spirit, who under the conduct and influence of the Spirit do live a holy and spiritual life, a life of devotedness to God, and of usefulness and serviceableness to others, may depend upon it that of the Spirit they "shall reap life everlasting;" they shall have the truest comfort in their present course, and an eternal life and happiness at the end of it.

the word here is the term used for a "pack," or perhaps a soldier's "kit," which each is expected to bear.

vi. 6. Insert the word "but" at the beginning of this verse. Each is to bear his own, but the temporal wants of your teachers are to be supplied by you. "Taught;" i.e., instructed. "Communicate;" go shares with. "In all good things;" in his temporal blessings.

vi. 7, 8. "Be not deceived;" it has been noticed that avarice was a besetting sin of the Galatians. They had been asked (1 Cor. xvi. 1) to Note, 1. That they who go about to mock God do but deceive themselves; hypocrisy in religion is the greatest folly as well as wickedness, since the God we have to do with can easily see through all our disguises, and will certainly deal with us hereafter, not according to our professions, but our practices. [2. Whatever sin a man committeth, it is most properly his own work, as flowing from the root of his own corrupt flesh; but the good which he doth is not so properly his own as God's, in so far as it floweth from the Spirit of God, and habits of grace which were wrought in him by the self-same Spirit, Phil. ii. 13; Col. iii. 10; for speaking of the flesh, he setteth it forth by the appropriating pronoun his, "He that soweth to his flesh;" but not so while he speaketh of the Spirit, "He that soweth to the Spirit;" not to his spirit.]

Sixthly, Here is a farther caution given us, "not to be weary in well doing," ver. 9. As we should not excuse ourselves from any part of our duty, so neither should we grow weary in it. There is in all of us too great a proneness hereunto; we are very apt to flag and tire in duty, yea, to fall off from it, particularly that part of it which the apostle here has a special regard to, namely, that of doing good to others. This, therefore, he would have us carefully to watch and guard against, and he gives this very good reason for it, because "in due season we shall reap if we faint not;" where he assures us, that there is [from free grace] a recompence of reward in reserve for all that sincerely employ themselves in well doing; that this reward will certainly be bestowed on us in the proper season,—if not in this world, yet to be sure in the next,—but then that it is upon supposition that we faint not in the way of our duty. If we grow weary of it, and withdraw from it, we shall not only miss of this reward, but lose the comfort and advantage of what we have already done; but if we hold on and hold out in well doing, though our reward may be delayed, yet it will surely come, and will be so great as to make us an abundant recompence for all our pains and constancy. Note, That perseverance in well doing is our wisdom and interest, as well as duty, for to this only is the reward promised.

Seventhly, Here is an exhortation to all Christians to do good in their places; ver. 10, "As we have therefore opportunity," &c. It is not enough that we be good ourselves, but we must do good to others, if we would approve ourselves to be Christians indeed. The duty here recommended to us is the same that is spoken of in the foregoing verses; and as there the apostle exhorts us to sincerity and perseverance in it, so here he directs us both as to the objects and the rule of it.

1. The objects of this duty are more generally all men; we are not to confine our charity and beneficence within too narrow bounds, as the Jews and Judaizing Christians were apt to do, but should be ready to extend it to all that partake of the same common nature with us, as far as we are capable, and they stand in need of us. But yet in the exercise of it we are to have special regard to the household of faith, or to those who profess the same common faith, and are members of the same body of Christ with us; though others are not to be excluded, yet these are to be preferred. The charity of Christians should be extensive charity, but yet therein a particular respect is to be had to good people. God doth good to all, but in an especial manner he is good to his own servants; and we must in doing good be followers of God as dear children.

2. The rule we are to observe in doing good to others is, as we have opportunity; which implies, 1st. That we should be sure to do it while we have opportunity, or while our life lasts, which is the only season wherein we are capable of doing good to them. If, therefore, we would behave ourselves aright in this matter, we must not, as too many do, neglect it in our lifetime, and defer it till we come to die, under pretence of doing something of this nature then; for as we cannot be sure that we shall then have an opportunity for it, so neither, if we should, have we any grounds to expect that what we do will be so acceptable to God, much less that we can atone for our past neglects by leaving something behind us for the good of others, when we could no longer keep it ourselves. But we should take care to do good in our lifetime, yea, to make this the business of our lives. And, 2nd. That we be ready to improve every opportunity for it; we should not content ourselves in having done some good already, but whenever fresh occasions offer themselves, as far as our capacity reaches, we should be ready to embrace them too, for we are directed to "give a portion to seven, and also to eight," Eccl. xi. 2. Note, First. That as God has made it our duty to do good to others, so he takes care in his providence to furnish us with opportunities for it: "The poor we have always with us," Mat. xxvi. 11. Secondly. That whenever God gives us an opportunity of being useful to others, he expects we should improve it, according to our capacity and ability. Thirdly. That we have need of godly wisdom and discretion to direct us in the exercise of our charity and beneficence, and particularly in the choice of the proper objects of it; for though none who stand in need of us are to be wholly overlooked, yet there is a difference to be made between some and others.

11 Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. 12 As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. 13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh. 14 But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world. 15 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature. 16 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God. 17 From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus. 18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

aid in the collection for the poor in Judæa; they do not seem to have responded heartily. This rebuke may have a double force, alluding to the collection and generally to the support of their teachers. In the illustration employed—sowing and reaping—it is well to note the double comparison; in verse 7 the kind of seed, in verse 8 the nature of the ground.

vi. 9, 10. "Weary;" or turn cowards, lose heart. "Due season," "opportunity;" the two words are the same, signifying season. "At

The apostle having at large established the doctrine of the Gospel, and endeavoured to persuade these Christians to a behaviour agreeable to it, seems as if he intended here to have put an end to the epistle, especially when he had acquainted them that, as a particular mark of his respect to them, he had written this large letter with his own hand, and had not made use of another as his amanuensis, and only subscribed his name to it, as he was wont to do in his other epistles. But such was his affection to them, and concern to recover them from the ill impressions made upon them by their false teachers, that he cannot break off till he has once again given them the true character of those teachers, and an account of his own contrary temper and behaviour, that by comparing these together they might the more easily see how little reason they had to depart from the doctrine he had taught them, and to comply with theirs.

First. He gives them the true character of those teachers that were industrious to seduce them, in several particulars. As,

1. That they were men who desired "to make a fair show in the flesh," ver. 12. They were very zealous for the externals of religion, forward to observe, and to oblige others to observe, the rites of the ceremonial law, though at the same time they had little or no regard to real piety; for, as the apostle says of them in the following verse, "neither did they themselves keep the law." Proud, and vain, and carnal hearts desire nothing more than to make a fair show in the flesh, and they can easily be content with so much religion as will help them to keep up such a fair show; but many times those have least of the substance of religion who are most solicitous to make a show of it.

2. They were men that were afraid of suffering, for they constrained the Gentile Christians to be circumcised, only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. It was not so much out of a regard to the law as to themselves; they were willing to sleep in a whole skin, and to save their worldly cargo, and cared not though they made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. That which they chiefly aimed at was to please the Jews, and to keep up their reputation among them, and so to prevent the trouble that Paul and other faithful professors of the doctrine of Christ lay open to. And,

3. Another part of their character was, that they were men of a party spirit, and who had no farther zeal for the law than as it subserved their carnal and selfish designs, for they desired to have these Christians circumcised, "that they might glory in their flesh," ver. 13, that they might say they had gained them over to their side, and made proselytes of them, of which they carried the mark in their flesh. And thus, while they pretended to promote religion, they were the greatest enemies of it, for nothing has been more destructive to the interest of religion than men's siding and party making.

Secondly. He acquaints us, on the other hand, with his own temper and behaviour, or makes profession of his own faith, and hope, and joy, particularly,

1. That his principal glory was in the cross of Christ. "God forbid," says he, "that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 14. By the cross of Christ is here meant his sufferings and death on the cross, or the doctrine of salvation by a crucified Redeemer. This was what the Jews stumbled at, and the Greeks accounted foolishness; and the Judaizing teachers themselves, though they had embraced Christianity, yet were so far ashamed of it, that in compliance with the Jews, and to avoid persecution from them, they were for mixing the observation of the law of Moses with faith in Christ, as necessary to salvation; but Paul had a very different opinion of it: he was so far from being offended at the cross of Christ, or ashamed of it, or afraid to own it, that he glories in it, yea, he desires to glory in nothing else, but rejects the thought of setting up anything in competition with it as the object of his esteem with the utmost abhorrence; "God forbid," &c. This was the ground of all his hope as a Christian. This was the doctrine which as an apostle he was resolved to preach, and whatever trials his firm adherence to it might bring upon him, he was ready for his sake, not only to submit to them, but to rejoice in them. Note, That the cross of Christ is a good [true] Christian's chiefest glory, and there is the greatest reason why we should glory in it, for to it we owe all our joys and hopes.

2. That he was dead to the world. By Christ, or by the cross of Christ, the world was crucified to him, and he to the world; he had experienced the power and virtue of it in weaning him from the world, and this was one great reason of his glorying in it. The false teachers were men of a worldly temper, their chief concern was about their secular interests, and therefore they accommodated their religion thereto. But Paul was a man of another spirit; as the world had no kindness for him, so neither had he any great regard to it; he was got above both the smiles and the frowns of it, and was become as indifferent to it as one that is dying out of it. This is a temper of mind that all Christians should be labouring after; and the best way to attain it is to converse much with the cross of Christ; the higher esteem we have of him the meaner opinion shall we have of the world, and the more we contemplate the sufferings our dear Redeemer met with from the world the less likely shall we be to be in love with it.

3. That he did not lay the stress of his religion on one side or other of the contesting interests, but on sound Christianity, ver. 15. There was at that time an unhappy division among Christians, and circumcision and uncircumcision were become names by which they were distinguished from each other; for, ch. ii. 9, 12, the Jewish Christians are called the circumcision, and they of the circumcision. The false teachers were very zealous for circumcision, yea, to that degree as to represent it as necessary to salvation, and therefore they did all they could to constrain the Gentile Christians to submit to it; wherein they had carried the matter much farther than others did, for though the apostles connived at the use of it among the Jewish converts, yet they were by no means for imposing it upon the Gentiles. But what they laid so great a stress upon Paul made very little account of. It was indeed of great importance to the interest of Christianity that circumcision should not be imposed on the Gentile converts, and therefore this he had set himself with the utmost vigour to oppose; but as for mere circumcision or uncircumcision, whether those who had embraced the Christian religion had been Jews or Gentiles, and whether they were for or against continuing the use of circumcision, so that they did not place their religion in it, this was comparatively a matter of little moment with him, for he very well knew that in Christ Jesus, that is, in his account, or under the Christian dispensation, "neither circumcision availed anything, nor uncircumcision," namely, as to men's acceptance with God, "but a new creature." Here he acquaints us both wherein real religion does not and wherein it does consist: it does not consist in circumcision or uncircumcision, in our being in this or the other denomination of Christians, but it consists in our being new creatures; not in having a new name, or putting on a new face, but in our being renewed in the spirit of our minds, and having Christ formed in us. This is of greatest account with God, and so it was with the apostle. If we compare this text with some others, we may more fully see what it is that renders us most acceptable to God, and which therefore we should be chiefly concerned about. Here we are told that it is "a new creature," and, ch. v. 6, that it is "faith which worketh by love," and 1 Cor. vii. 19 that it is "the keeping the commandments of God;" from all which it appears, that it is such a change of mind and heart whereby we are disposed and enabled to believe on the Lord Jesus, and to live a life of devotedness to God, and that where this inward, vital, practical religion is wanting, no outward professions or particular names will ever stand us in any stead, or be sufficient to recommend us to him. And were Christians duly concerned to experience this in themselves, and to promote it in others, if it did not make them lay aside their distinguishing names, yet it would at least take them off from laying so great a stress upon them as they too often do. Note, That Christians should take care to lay the stress of their religion where God has laid it, namely, on those things which are available to our acceptance with him, [which do evidence his acceptance by, and interest in, Christ.] So we see the apostle did, and it is our wisdom and interest herein to follow his example.

The apostle having shewn what was of chief consideration in religion, and what he laid the greatest stress upon, namely, not a mere empty name or profession, but a sound and saving change, in ver. 16 he pronounces a blessing upon all those that walk according to this rule, "And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be upon them, and mercy upon the Israel of God." The rule which he here speaks of may be considered as signifying, either more generally the whole word of God, which is the complete and perfect rule of faith and life, or that doctrine of the Gospel, or way of justification and salvation, which he had laid down in this epistle, namely, by faith in Christ without the works of the law; or as more immediately referring to the new creature, which he had just before been speaking of. The blessings which he desires for those that walk according to this rule, or which he gives them the hope and prospect of, (for the words may be taken either as a prayer or a promise,) are peace and mercy: peace, that is, with God and conscience, and all the comforts of this life, as far as they are needful for them; and mercy, namely, an interest in the free love and favour of God in Christ, which is the spring and fountain of all other blessings. A foundation is laid for these in that gracious change which is wrought in them; and while they behave themselves as new creatures, and govern their lives and hopes by the rule of the Gospel, they may most assuredly depend upon them. And these he declares shall be the portion of all the Israel of God, by whom he means all sincere Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, all that are Israelites indeed, who, though they may not be the natural, yet are become the spiritual seed of Abraham; these being heirs of his faith, are also heirs together with him of the same promise, and consequently entitled to the peace and mercy here spoken of. The Jews and Judaizing teachers were for confining these blessings only to such as were circumcised and kept the law of Moses; but, on the contrary, the apostle declares that they belong to all who walk according to the rule of the Gospel, or of the new creature, even to all the Israel of God, intimating that those only are the true Israel of God who walk according to this rule, and not that of circumcision, which they insisted so much upon, and therefore that this was the true way to obtain peace and mercy. Note, 1st. That real Christians are such as walk by rule, not a rule of their own devising, but that which God himself has prescribed to them. 2nd. That even those who walk according to this rule do yet stand in need of the mercy of God. But, 3rd. That all who sincerely endeavour to walk according to this rule may be assured that peace and mercy shall be upon them; this is the best way to have peace with God, ourselves, and others; and hereupon, as we may be sure of the favour of God now, so we shall find mercy with him hereafter.

4. That he had cheerfully suffered persecution for the sake of Christ and Christianity, ver. 17. As the cross of Christ, or the doctrine of salvation by a crucified Redeemer, was what he chiefly gloried in, so he had been willing to run all hazards rather than he would betray this truth, or suffer it to be corrupted. The false teachers were afraid of persecution, and this was the great reason why they were so zealous for circumcision, as we see ver. 12. But this was the least of Paul's concern; he was not moved at any of the afflictions he met with, "nor did he count his life dear to him, so that he might finish his course with joy, and the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God," Acts xx. 24. He had already suffered much in the cause of Christ, for "he bare in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus," the scars of those wounds which he had sustained from persecuting enemies, for his steady adherence to him and that doctrine of the Gospel which he had received from him. And as from hence it appeared that he was firmly persuaded of the truth and importance of it, and that he was far from being a favourer of circumcision, as they had falsely reported him to be, so hereupon, with a becoming warmth and vehemence, suitable to his authority as an apostle, and to the deep concern of mind he was under, he insists upon it "that no man should henceforth trouble him," namely, by opposing his doctrine and authority, or by any such calumnies and reproaches as had been cast upon him; for, as both from what he had said and what he had suffered they appeared to be highly unjust and injurious, so also that they were very unreasonable who either raised or received them. Note, 1. That it may justly be presumed men are fully persuaded of those truths which they are willing to suffer in the defence of. And, 2. That it is very unjust to charge those things upon others which are contrary, not only to their profession but their sufferings too.

Thirdly. The apostle, having now finished what he intended to write for the conviction and recovery of the churches of Galatia, concludes the epistle with his apostolical benediction, ver. 18. He calls them his brethren, wherein he shews his great humility, and the tender affection he had for them, notwithstanding the ill treatment he had met with from them; and takes his leave of them with this very serious and affectionate prayer, that "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirit." This was an usual farewell wish of the apostles, as we see, Rom. xvi. 20, 21; 1 Cor. xvi. 23. And herein he prays that they might enjoy the favour of Christ both in the special effects and the sensible evidences of it, that they might receive from him all that grace which was needful to guide them in their way, to strengthen them in their work, to establish them in their Christian course, and to encourage and comfort them under all the trials of life and the prospect of death itself. This is fitly called "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," as he is both the sole purchaser and the appointed dispenser of it; and though these churches had done enough to forfeit it, by suffering themselves to be drawn into an opinion and practice which was highly dishonourable to Christ, as well as dangerous to them, yet out of his great concern for them, and knowing of what importance it was to them, he earnestly desires it on their behalf, yea, that it might be with their spirit, that they might continually experience the influences of it upon their souls, disposing and enabling to act with sincerity and uprightness in religion. We need desire no more to make us happy than the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. This the apostle begs for these Christians, and therein shews us what we are chiefly concerned to obtain; and, both for their and our encouragement to hope for it, he adds his Amen.

its own season, the fit time, the harvest, we shall reap; at the fit season (the opportunity, or the spring) sow in doing good."

vi. 11. Lightfoot says, "At this point the apostle takes the pen from his amanuensis, and writes the concluding paragraph himself." "How large a letter:" "see in how large letters," &c. The reference is to the size of the characters, not to the length of the epistle. Various reasons have been assigned for this calling attention to the size of the handwriting. Lightfoot says, "The size of the characters will arrest the attention of the readers." Ellicott inclines to the view that he calls attention to the handwriting of the "whole epistle," written by himself, to prevent any possible mistake about the authorship, as epistles had been forged in his name (2 Thess. ii. 2, iii. 17).

vi. 15. "Availeth:" the oldest authorities read "is anything."

vi. 17. "The marks of Jesus:" such is the reading adopted by Alford, Ellicott, and Lightfoot. These marks were the scars of persecution. There is a distinct allusion to the marks burnt on slaves, to denote to whom they belonged.

vi. 18. "Brethren:" in the Greek this word comes last, for the sake of emphasis. He had censured them, but they were still his brethren.

AN

OF THE EPISTLE OF

ST. PAUL TO THE EPHESIANS,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

SOME think that this epistle to the Ephesians was a circular letter sent to several churches, and that the copy directed to the Ephesians happened to be taken into the canon, and so it came to bear that particular inscription. And they have been induced the rather to think this, because it is the only one of all St. Paul's epistles that has nothing in it peculiarly adapted to the state or case of that particular church, but has much of common concernment to all Christians, and especially of all who, having been Gentiles in times past, were converted to Christianity. But then it may be observed, on the other hand, that the epistle is expressly inscribed (ch. i. 1) to the saints which are at Ephesus; and in the close of it he tells them that he had sent Tychicus unto them, whom, in 2 Tim. iv. 12, he says he had sent to Ephesus. It is an epistle that bears date out of a prison. And some have observed that what this apostle wrote when he was a prisoner had the greatest relish and savour in it of the things of God. When his tribulations did abound, his consolations and experiences did much more abound. From whence we may observe that the afflictive exercises of God's people, and particularly of his ministers, do oftentimes tend to the advantage of others, as well as to their own. The apostle's design is to settle and establish the Ephesians in the truth, and, farther, to acquaint them with the mystery of the Gospel in order to it. In the former part he represents the great privileges of the Ephesians, who, being in time past idolatrous heathens, were now converted to Christianity, and received into covenant with God, which he illustrates from a view of their deplorable state before their conversion, ch. i.—iii. In the latter part (which we have in the 4th, 5th, and 6th chapters) he instructs them in the principal duties of religion, both personal and relative, and exhorts and quickens them to the faithful discharge of them. Zanchy observes that we have here an epitome of the whole Christian doctrine, and of almost all the chief heads of divinity.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The introduction to the whole epistle, which is much the same as in others, ver. 1, 2. II. The apostle's thanksgivings and praises to God for his inestimable blessings bestowed on the believing Ephesians, ver. 3—14. III. His earnest prayers to God in their behalf, ver. 15—23. This great apostle was wont to abound in prayers, and in thanksgivings to almighty God, which he generally so disposes and orders as that at the same time they carry with them and convey the great and important doctrines of the Christian religion, and the most weighty instructions to all those who seriously peruse them.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus: 2 Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Here is, First. The title St. Paul takes to himself, as belonging to him; "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ," &c. He reckoned it a great honour to be employed by Christ as one of his messengers to the sons of men. The apostles were prime officers in the Christian church, being extraordinary ministers appointed for a time only. They were furnished by their great Lord with extraordinary gifts, and the immediate assistance of the Spirit, that they might be fitted for publishing and spreading the Gospel, and for the governing the church in its infant state. Such a one St. Paul was, and that not by the will of man conferring that office upon him, not by his own intrusion into it, but by the will of God, very expressly and plainly signified to him, he being immediately called (as the other apostles were) by Christ himself to the work. And every faithful minister of Christ (though his call and office are not of so extraordinary a nature, yet) may, with our apostle, reflect on it as an honour and comfort to himself that he is what he is by the will of God.

Secondly. The persons to whom this epistle is sent. "To the saints which are at Ephesus," that is, to the Christians who were members of the church at Ephesus, the metropolis of Asia. He calls them saints, for so they were in profession, and such they were bound to be in truth and reality, and many of them were so. All Christians must be saints; and, if they come not under that character on earth, they will never be saints in glory. [Hence none ought to be considered as members of Christ's church but such as in the judgment of charity are holy persons called by Divine grace out of darkness into marvellous light.] He calls them "the faithful in Christ Jesus;" that is, believers in him, and firm and constant in their adherence to him, and to his truths and ways. They are not saints who are not faithful, believing in Christ, firmly adhering to him, and true to the profession they make of relation to their Lord. Note, It is not only the honour of ministers, but of private Christians too, to have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful in Christ Jesus, from whom they derive all their grace and spiritual strength, and in whom their persons, and all that they perform, are made accepted.

Thirdly. The apostolical benediction. "Grace be to you," &c. This is the token in every epistle; and it speaks the apostle's goodwill to his friends, and a real desire of their welfare; by grace we are to understand the free and undeserved love and favour of God, and those graces of the Spirit which proceed from it; by peace all other blessings, spiritual and temporal, the fruits and product of the former. No peace without grace; no peace, nor grace, but "from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." These peculiar blessings proceed from God, not as a Creator, but as a Father by special relation. And they come from our Lord Jesus Christ, who, having purchased them for his people, has a right to bestow them upon them. Indeed, the saints and the faithful in Christ Jesus had already received grace and peace; but the increase of these is very desirable, and the best saints stand in need of fresh supplies of the graces of the Spirit, and cannot but desire to improve and grow. And, therefore, they should pray, each one for himself, and for one another, that such blessings may still abound unto them.

After this short introduction he comes to the matter and body of the epistle; and, though it may seem somewhat peculiar in a letter, yet the Spirit of God saw fit that his discourse of Divine things in this chapter should be cast into prayers and praises, which, as they are solemn addresses to God, so they convey weighty instructions to others. Prayer may preach, and praise may do so too.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: 4 According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: 5 Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, 6 To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved. 7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace; 8 Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence; 9 Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself: 10 That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might Introductory.—This epistle was unanimously received by the early Church as Pauline. It is generally admitted that it was written from Rome, where St. Paul was detained waiting for trial (Acts xxviii. 30), between A.D. 61 and 63. The epistle is divided into two portions—the first doctrinal, the second hortatory and practical.

i. 1, 2. The omission of the words "at Ephesus" in some earlier MSS. has given rise to the idea that this epistle was not solely addressed to the church at Ephesus, but was encyclical. The "saints" and "faithful:" these expressions refer to the same persons, but, as Alf rd remarks, denote their spiritual life from its two sides—that of God who calls and sanctifies, that of themselves who believe.

i. 3. Ellicott gives the following summary: verses 3—6, the Father's work of love; verses 7—12, the Son's; verses 13, 14, the Holy Spirit's. "Who blessed us:" not "hath blessed us." The reference is to God's past work, "the historical fact in the councils of the gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him: 11 In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: 12 That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ. 13 In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, 14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory.

He begins with thanksgivings and praise, and enlarges with a great deal of fluency and copiousness of affection upon the exceeding great and precious benefits which we enjoy by Jesus Christ. For the great privileges of our religion are very aptly recounted and enlarged upon in our praises to God.

In general, ver. 3, he blesses God for spiritual blessings, where he styles him "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" for as Mediator, the Father was his God: as God, and the second person in the blessed Trinity, God was his Father. And it speaks the mystical union betwixt Christ and believers, that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is their God and Father; and that in and through him all blessings come from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. No good can be expected from a righteous and holy God to sinful creatures but by his mediation; he "hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings." Note, Spiritual blessings are the best blessings with which God blesseth us, and for which we are to bless him. He blesses us by bestowing such things upon us as make us really blessed. We cannot thus bless God again, but must do it by praising, and magnifying, and speaking well of him on that account. And whom God blesses with some he blesses with all spiritual blessings; to whom he gives Christ, he freely gives all these things. It is not so with temporal blessings; some are favoured with health, and not with riches, some with riches, and not with health, &c. But where God blesses with spiritual blessings he blesses with all. They are "spiritual blessings in heavenly places," that is, say some, in the church distinguished from the world, and called out of it. Or, it may be read, in heavenly things, such as come from heaven, and are designed to prepare men for it, and to secure their reception into it. We should hence learn to mind spiritual and heavenly things as the principal things, spiritual and heavenly blessings as the best blessings, with which we cannot be miserable, and without which we cannot but be so. Set not your affections on things on the earth, but on those things which are above; these we are blessed with in Christ. For as all our services ascend to God through Christ, so all our blessings are conveyed to us the same way—he being the Mediator betwixt God and us.

The particular spiritual blessings with which we are blessed in Christ, and for which we ought to bless God, are (many of them) here enumerated and enlarged upon.

First. Election and predestination, which are the secret springs from whence the others flow, ver. 4, 5, 11. Election, or choice, respects that lump or mass of mankind out of which some are chosen, from which they are separated and distinguished. Predestination hath respect to the blessings they are designed for, particularly "the adoption of children;" it being the purpose of God that in due time we should become his adopted children, and so have a right to all the privileges and to the inheritance of children. We have here the date of this act of love; it was "before the foundation of the world." Not only before God's people had a being, but before the world had a beginning; for they were chosen in the counsel of God from all eternity. And it magnifies these blessings to a high degree that they are the products of eternal counsel. The alms which you give to beggars at your doors proceed from a sudden resolve; but the provision which a parent makes for his children is the result of many thoughts, and is put into his last will and testament with a great deal of solemnity. And as this magnifies Divine love, so it secures the blessings to God's elect; for the purpose of God according to election shall stand. He acts in pursuance of his eternal purpose in bestowing spiritual blessings upon his people. He hath blessed us, "according as he hath chosen us in him;" that is, in Christ the great Head of the election, who is emphatically called God's elect, his chosen; and in the chosen Redeemer an eye of favour was cast upon them. Observe here one great end and design of this choice; chosen, "that we should be holy;" not because he foresaw they would be holy, but because he determined to make them so. All who are chosen to happiness as the end are chosen to holiness as the means. Their sanctification, as well as their salvation, is the result of the counsels of Divine love. "And without blame before him;" that is, that their holiness might not be only external, and in outward appearance, so as to prevent blame from men, but internal and real, and what God himself will account such, who looketh at the heart. Such holiness proceeds from love, that is, to God and to our fellow-creatures, this charity being the principle of all true holiness. The original word signifies such an innocence as no man can carp at; and therefore some understand it of that perfect holiness that the saints shall attain to in the life to come, which will be eminently before God, they being in his immediate presence for ever.

Here is also the rule and the fountal cause of God's election: it is "according to the good pleasure of his will," ver. 5; not for the sake of any thing in them foreseen, but because it was his sovereign will, and a thing highly pleasing to him. It is "according to the purpose," that is, the fixed and unalterable will of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," ver. 11; who powerfully accomplishes whatever concerns his elect, as he has wisely and freely foreordained and decreed; the last and great end and design of all which is his own glory.

[Εὐδοκία is a compound word: δόκη is a clear, eternal intention of that which is most agreeable to himself, most worthy of him, and which will afford him world without end, an infinite satisfaction in the being and accomplishment of it. Εὐδοκία is a perception that it is right: that all seen together in one view, in their place, order and connexion, are highly consistent with infinite, eternal, and unchangeable being, power, wisdom and love." Θελημα, a determination in consequence of intention of himself." This is the critical notice of Dr. Samuel Benson, on which M. Henry has remarked with approbation in his Life of the Doctor, (Miscellaneous Works),—p. 1022: "He (says M. Henry) was sure God did not decree sin, nor did he see any necessity of asserting a positive decree to permit sin; nor could he by any means admit a decree to damn any man but upon the foresight of his being a sinner; but he thought the doctrine of particular, personal, absolute election and eternal life, so plainly revealed in Scripture, that he wondered how any who pretend to regulate their faith by the Bible should make any doubt of it. He was clear that it fastened upon the persons in their fallen state, and that it depended indeed upon foreknowledge and foresight, but not of any merit in their faith and repentance, but purely upon the victorious efficacy of Divine grace.]

"To the praise of the glory of his grace," ver. 6. [This is one of those strong and beautiful Hebraisms that the apostle frequently uses when his heart seems to glow with admiration and gratitude to the God of all grace. The original may be expressed, 'To the praise of his glorious grace.'] "That we should be to the praise of his glory," ver. 12; that is, that we should live and behave ourselves in such a manner that his rich grace might be magnified, and appear glorious and worthy of the highest praise. All is of God, and from him and through him, and therefore all must be to him, and centre in his praise. Note, "The glory of God is his own end, and it should be ours in all that we do." The next spiritus¹ blessing the apostle takes notice of is,

Secondly. Acceptance with God through Jesus Christ; "Wherein," or by which grace, "he hath made us accepted in the beloved," ver. 6. Jesus Christ is the beloved of his Father, (Mat. iii. 17.) as well as of angels and saints. It is our great privilege to be accepted of God, which implies his love to us, and his taking us under his care and into his family. We cannot be thus accepted of God but in and through Jesus Christ. He loves his people for the sake of the beloved.

Thirdly. Remission of sins and redemption through the blood of Jesus, ver. 7. No remission without redemption. It was by reason of sin that we were captivated, and we cannot be released from our captivity but by the remission of our sins. This redemption we have in Christ, and this remission through his blood. The guilt and the stain of sin could be no otherwise removed than by the blood of Jesus. All our spiritual blessings flow down to us in that stream. This great benefit, which comes freely to us, was dearly bought and paid for by our blessed Lord; and yet it is according to the riches of God's grace. Christ's satisfaction and God's rich grace are very consistent in the great affair of man's redemption. God was satisfied by Christ as our substitute and surety; but it was rich grace that would accept of a surety, when he might have executed the severity of the law upon the transgressor. And it was rich grace to provide such a surety as his own Son, and freely to deliver him up, when nothing of that nature could have entered into our thoughts, or have been any otherwise found out for us. In which instance he has not only manifested riches of grace, but "hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence," ver. 8; wisdom in contriving the dispensation, and prudence in executing the counsel of his will, as he has done. How illustrious have the Divine wisdom and prudence rendered themselves in so happily adjusting the matter between justice and mercy in this grand affair; in securing the honour of God and his law, at the same time that the recovery of sinners and their salvation are ascertained and made sure?

Fourthly. Another privilege which the apostle here blesseth God for is, Divine revelation, that God hath "made known unto us the mystery of his will," ver. 9. [We are not to suppose that this signifies a mystery which no man can understand, but only a truth before veiled in types and shadows, or not fully revealed,] that is, so much of his goodwill to men, which had been concealed for a long time, and is still concealed from so great a part of the world. This we owe to Christ, who, having laid in the bosom of the Father from eternity, came to declare his will to the children of men. "According to his good pleasure;" that is, his secret counsels concerning man's redemption, which he had purposed, or resolved upon, merely in and from himself, and not for any thing in them. In this revelation, and in his making "known unto us the mystery of his will," the wisdom and the prudence of God do abundantly shine forth. It is described at ver. 13 as "the word of truth, and the Gospel of your salvation." Every word of it is true; it contains and instructs us in the most weighty and important truths, and it is confirmed and sealed by the very oath of God; from whence we should learn to betake ourselves to it in all our searches after Divine truth. It is the Gospel of our salvation. It publishes the glad tidings of salvation, and contains the offer of it. It points out the way that leads to it, and the blessed Spirit renders the reading and the ministration of it effectual to the salvation of souls. Oh! how ought we to prize this glorious Gospel, and to bless God for it. This is the light shining in a dark place, for which we have reason to be thankful, and to which we should take heed.

Fifthly. Union in and with Christ is a great privilege, a spiritual blessing, and the foundation of many others. He does "gather together in one all things in Christ," ver. 10. All the lines of Divine revelation meet in Christ; all religion centres in him. Jews and Gentiles were united to each other by being both united to Christ. Things in heaven and things on earth are gathered together in him; peace made, correspondence settled, betwixt heaven and earth through him; the innumerable company of angels become one with the church through Christ. This God purposed in himself, and it was his design in that dispensation which was to be accomplished by his sending of Christ "in the fulness of time;" that is, at the exact time that God had prefixed and settled.

Sixthly. The eternal inheritance is the great blessing with which we are blessed in Christ: "In whom also we have obtained an inheritance," ver. 11. Heaven is the inheritance, the happiness of which is a sufficient portion for a soul. It is conveyed in the way of an inheritance, being the gift of a father to his children. If children, then heirs. All the blessings that we have in hand are but small if compared with the inheritance. What is laid out upon an heir in his minority is nothing to what is reserved for him when he comes to age. Christians are said to have obtained this inheritance, as they have a present right to it, and even actual possession of it, in Christ their head and representative.

Seventhly. The seal and earnest of the Spirit are of the number of these blessings. We are said to be "sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise," ver. 13. [This is a Hebraism for the promised Spirit. It is by no means improbable that the apostle did here allude to the custom of the priests of Diana, who gave a ring with the figure of a he-goat, as a mark of initiation into the mysteries of the Ephesian goddess. The apostle there says, You have here a different seal from that which you once bore,—the seal of the Holy Spirit.] The blessed Spirit is holy himself, and he makes us holy. He is called "the Spirit of promise," as he is the promised Spirit. By him believers are sealed, that is, separated and set apart for God, and distinguished and marked as belonging to him. The Spirit "is the earnest of our inheritance," ver. 14. The earnest is part of payment, and it secures the full sum. So is the gift of the Holy Ghost; all his

* This passage has been understood by some in a very different sense, and with a special reference to the conversion of these Ephesians to Christianity. Those who have a mind to see what is said to this purpose may consult Mr. Locke, and other well-known writers on the place.

i. 5. See Rom. viii. 29, 30.

i. 6. The second clause of this verse is read by Alford, "which he bestowed upon us in the Beloved;" by Conybeare, "wherewith he favoured us in his Beloved;" by Tischendorf, "whereby he made us accepted in."

i. 7. Not "redemption," as in the Authorised Version, but "the redemption," that which was the subject of prophecy and revelation. "Through:" i.e., by means of; his blood was the price of it.

Father" (Alford). "In the heavenly places" (Alford); "in the heavens" (Conybeare). (Phil. iii. 20; Matt. vi. 20, 21; Col. iii. 1, 2; 1 Peter i. 4.) As Christians our hopes tend heavenwards, and will be fulfilled in heaven.

i. 4. See 2 Tim. i. 9. "Love:" "That which man lost at the fall, but which God is, and to which God restores man by redemption, is the great element in which, as in their abode and breathing-place, all Christian graces subsist," &c. (Alford).

influences and operations, both as a sanctifier and a comforter, are heaven begun, glory in the seed and bud. The Spirit's illumination is an earnest of everlasting light; sanctification is an earnest of perfect holiness, and his comforts are earnest of everlasting joys. He is said to be the earnest, "until the redemption of the purchased possession." It may be called here the possession, because this earnest makes it as sure to the heirs as though they were already possessed of it; and it is purchased for them by the blood of Christ. The redemption of it is mentioned, because it was mortgaged and forfeited by sin, and Christ restores it to us, and so is said to redeem it, in allusion to the law of redemption. Observe from all this, what a gracious promise that is which secures the gift of the Holy Ghost to them who ask him.

The apostle mentions the great end and design of God in bestowing one and all these spiritual privileges; "That we should be to the praise of his glory who first trusted in Christ," that is, we to whom the Gospel was first preached, and who were first converted to the faith of Christ, and to the placing our hope and trust in him. Note, Seniority in grace is a preference, ("Who were in Christ before me," says the apostle, Rom. xvi. 7;) and they who have for a longer time experienced the grace of Christ are under more special obligations to glorify God. They should be strong in faith, and more eminently glorify him; but this should be the common end of all. For this we were made, and for this we were redeemed; this is the great design of our Christianity, and of God in all that he has done for us. "Unto the praise of his glory," ver. 14. He intends that his grace and power, and other perfections, should by this means become conspicuous and illustrious, and that the sons of men should magnify him.

15 Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, 16 Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers; 17 That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him: 18 The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, 19 And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, 20 Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, 21 Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come: 22 And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, 23 Which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

We are come to the last part of this chapter, which consists of St. Paul's earnest prayer to God in behalf of these Ephesians. We should pray for the persons for whom we give thanks. Our apostle blesses God for what he had done for them, and then he prays he would do more for them. He gives thanks for spiritual blessings, and prays for farther supplies of them. For God will for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them. He has laid up these spiritual blessings for us in the hands of his Son the Lord Jesus; but then he has appointed us to draw them out and fetch them in by prayer. We have no part nor lot in the matter, any farther than we claim it by faith and prayer.

One inducement to pray for them was the good account he had of them, of their faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints; ver. 15. Faith in Christ and love to the saints will be attended with all other graces. Love to the saints, as such, and because they are such, must include love to God. They who love saints, as such, love all saints, how weak in grace, how mean in the world, how fretful and peevish soever, some of them may be. Another inducement to pray for them was because they had received the earnest of the inheritance. This we may observe from the words being connected with the preceding ones by the particle wherefore. Perhaps you will think that having received the earnest, it should follow, therefore ye are happy enough, and need take no farther care; you need not pray for yourselves, nor I for you. No, quite the contrary. Wherefore I "cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers," ver. 16. While he blesses God for giving them the Spirit, he ceases not to pray that he would give unto them the Spirit, ver. 17; that is, that he would give greater measures of the Spirit. Observe, Even the best of Christians need to be prayed for: and while we hear well of our Christian friends we should think ourselves obliged to intercede with God for them, that they may abound and increase yet more and more.

Now what is it that St. Paul prays for in their behalf? Why, not that they might be freed from persecution; nor that they might possess the riches, honours, or pleasures of the world; but the great thing he prays for is, the illumination of their understandings, and that their knowledge might increase and abound; he means it of a practical and experimental knowledge. The graces and comfort of the Spirit are communicated to the soul by the enlightening of the understanding. In this way he gains and keeps possession. Satan takes a contrary way; he gets possession by the senses and passions—Christ by the understanding. Observe.

First. Whence this knowledge must come; from "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 17. The Lord is a God of knowledge; and there is no sound, saving knowledge but what comes from him, and therefore to him we must look for it, who is "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ," see ver. 3, and "the Father of glory." It is a Hebraism; God is infinitely glorious in himself; all glory is due to him from his creatures, and he is the author of all that glory with which his saints are, or shall be, invested. Now he gives knowledge by giving the spirit of knowledge; for the Spirit of God is the teacher of the saints, [we can have no right knowledge of the mysteries of religion, but as the Holy Spirit unfolds them to the understanding.] the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. We have the revelation of the Spirit in the word. But will that avail us, if we have not the wisdom of the Spirit in the heart? If the same Spirit who indited the sacred Scriptures do not take the veil from off our hearts, and enable us to understand and improve them, we shall be never the better. In the knowledge of him, or for the acknowledgment of him; not only a speculative knowledge of Christ, and of what relates to him, but an acknowledgment of Christ's authority by an obedient conformity to him, which must be by the help of "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation." This knowledge is first in the understanding. He prays that "the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened," ver. 18. Observe, Those who have their eyes opened, and have some understanding in the things of God, have need to be more and more enlightened, and to have their knowledge more clear, and distinct, and experimental. Christians should not think it enough to have warm affections, but they should labour to have clear understandings; they should be ambitious of being knowing Christians, and judicious Christians.

Secondly. What is it he more particularly desires they should grow in the knowledge of? 1. "The hope of his calling," ver. 18. Christianity is our calling. God has called us to it, and on that account it is said to be his calling. There is a hope in his calling, for those who deal with God deal upon trust, and it is a desirable thing to know what this hope of our calling is; that is, to have such an acquaintance with the immense privileges of God's people, and the expectations they have from God, and with respect to the heavenly world, as to be quickened thereby to the utmost diligence and patience in the Christian course. We ought to labour after, and pray earnestly for, a clearer insight into, and a fuller acquaintance with, the great objects of a Christian's hopes and expectations. 2. "The riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints." Besides the heavenly inheritance, prepared for the saints, there is a present inheritance in the saints; for grace is glory begun, and holiness is happiness in the bud. There is a glory in this inheritance, riches of glory, [or 'glorious riches,'] rendering the Christian more excellent and more truly honourable than all about him. And it is desirable to know this experimentally, to be acquainted with the principles, pleasures and powers, of the spiritual and Divine life. It may be understood of the glorious inheritance in, or among, the saints in heaven, where God does, as it were, lay forth all his riches to make them happy and glorious, and where all that the saints are in possession of is transcendently glorious; as much knowledge of which as is attainable upon earth is very desirable, and must be exceedingly entertaining and delightful. Let us endeavour then by reading, contemplation, and prayer, to know as much of heaven as we can, that we may be desiring and longing to be there. 3. The exceeding greatness of God's power towards them who believe, ver. 19. The practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, and of the omnipotence of Divine grace, is absolutely necessary to a close and steady walking with him. It is a desirable thing to know experimentally the mighty power of that grace beginning and carrying on the work of faith in our souls. It is a difficult thing to bring a soul to believe fully in Christ, and to venture its all upon his righteousness, and upon the hope of eternal life. It is nothing less than an almighty power that will work this in us. [Eminent critics have all noticed the strong emphasis and force of the apostle's language, which has been rendered 'according to the energy of the power of his might.'] The apostle speaks here with a mighty fluency and copiousness of expression, and yet, at the same time, as if he wanted words to express the exceeding greatness of God's almighty power—that power which God exerts towards his people, and by which he raised Christ from the dead, ver. 20. That indeed was the great proof of the truth of the Gospel to the world. But the transcript of that in ourselves, (that is, our sanctification, and rising from the death of sin in conformity to Christ's resurrection,) is the great proof to us. Though this cannot prove the truth of the Gospel to another who knows nothing of the matter, (there the resurrection of Christ is the proof,) yet to be able to speak experimentally, as the Samaritans, We have heard him ourselves, we have felt a mighty change in our own hearts, will make us able to say with the fullest satisfaction, Now we believe and are sure that this is the Christ, the Son of God. Many understand the apostle here as speaking of that exceeding greatness of power which God will exert for the raising the bodies of believers to eternal life, even the same mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him, &c. And how desirable a thing must it be to become acquainted with that power at length, by being raised out of the grave thereby unto eternal life?

Having said something of Christ and his resurrection, the apostle digresses a little from the subject he is upon, to make some farther honourable mention of the Lord Jesus and his exaltation. He is set at the Father's "right hand in the heavenly places," &c., ver. 20, 21. Jesus Christ is advanced above all, and he is set in authority over all, they being made subject to him. All the glory of the upper world, and all the powers of both worlds, are entirely devoted to him. The Father "hath put all things under his feet," ver. 22, according to the promise, Ps. cx. l. All creatures whatsoever are in subjection to him; they must either yield him sincere obedience or fall under the weight of his sceptre, and receive their doom from him. God "gave him to be head over all things." It was a gift to Christ, considered as Mediator, to be advanced to such dominion and headship, and to have such a mystical body prepared for him; and it was a gift to the church, to be provided with a head endued with so much power and authority. God "gave him to be the head" (over all things); he gave him all power both in heaven and in earth. The Father loves the Son, and hath given all things into his hands. But that which completes the comfort of this is, that he is the head over all things to the church; that is, he is therefore intrusted with all power, that he may dispose of all the affairs of the providential kingdom in subserviency to the designs of his grace concerning his church. With this, therefore, we may answer the messengers of the nations, that the Lord hath founded Zion. The same power that supports the world supports the church; and we are sure he loves his church, for it is his body, ver. 23, his mystical body, and he will care for it. It is "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Jesus Christ filleth all in all; he supplies all defects in all his members, filling them with his Spirit, and even with "the fulness of God," ch. iii. 19. [Some render it 'with all.' Christ fills his members with all spiritual gifts and graces.] And yet the church is said to be his fulness, because Christ as Mediator would not be complete if he had not a church. How could he be a King if he had not a kingdom? This, therefore, comes into the honour of Christ, as Mediator, that the church is his fulness.

CHAPTER II.

This chapter contains an account, I. Of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature, ver. 1—3; and again, ver. 11, 12. II. Of the glorious change that was wrought in them by converting grace, ver. 4—10; and again, ver. 13. III. Of the great and mighty privileges that converted Jews and Gentiles both receive from Christ, ver. 14—22. The apostle endeavours to affect them with a due sense of the wonderful change which i. 8. "Which he shed abundantly forth to us," &c. (Alford), "which he bestowed upon us above measure." "In all wisdom," &c.: Olshausen, Ellicott, and Harless maintain that these words cannot be applied to God. We may say of him, they argue, "in him is all wisdom," but not "he did this or that in all wisdom," as if commanding God, or as if he might not have acted most wisely. Olshausen, therefore, explains, "which he bestowed abundantly upon us, that we might walk in all wisdom, &c." Conybeare places a semicolon after "us," and joins "in all wisdom," &c., to the following "having made known."

i. 11. "In whom we also received the portion of our lot, having been predestined thereto," &c. (Conybeare). "In whom also we are called, being," &c. (Tischendorf). So the best MSS.

i. 13. "In whom ye also;" i.e., Gentile Christians. "And you believed in him, and received his seal, the Holy Spirit of promise" (Conybeare).

Divine grace had wrought in them; and this is very applicable to that great change which the same grace works in all those who are brought into a state of grace: so that we have here a lively picture both of the misery of unregenerate men and of the happy condition of converted souls; enough to awaken and alarm those who are yet in their sins, and to put them upon hastening out of that state, and to comfort and delight those whom God hath quickened with a consideration of the mighty privileges with which they are invested.

AND you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; 2 Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience: 3 Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

The miserable condition of the Ephesians by nature is here in part described. [Man by nature is spiritually dead. He can perform none of the functions of spiritual life, but lies a lifeless corpse in the grave of corruption. The mighty energy (ἐνέργεια, ch. ii. 19) necessary to raise the dead body from the grave must be put forth to raise the sinner from the death of sin to a life of righteousness. Not, indeed, that he is not a responsible creature, and this makes his condition the more awful,—for his inability to perform what is good and acceptable in the sight of God is what may be termed passive wickedness; for, while there is this deadness of the soul to God it is yet alive in the service of sin, walking and making progress in it.]

Observe, First. That unregenerate souls are “dead in trespasses and sins.” All those who are in their sins are dead in sins, yea, “in trespasses and sins;” which may signify all sorts of sins, habitual and actual, sins of heart and of life. Sin is the death of the soul. Wherever that prevails there is a privation of all spiritual life. Sinners are dead in state, being destitute of the principles and powers of spiritual life, and cut off from God, the Fountain of life; and they are dead in law, as a condemned malefactor is said to be a dead man.

Secondly. A state of sin is a state of conformity to this world, ver. 2. In the first verse he speaks of their internal state, in this of their outward conversation. “Wherein” that is, in which trespasses and sins, “in time past ye walked,” &c., that is, you lived and behaved yourselves in such a manner as the men of the world are used to do. [Walking is strikingly expressive of the habit and course of life, Ps. i. 1, Rom. vi. 4, as a progressive action is expressive of the tendency of sin from bad to worse.]

Thirdly. We are by nature bondslaves to sin and Satan. They who walk in trespasses and sins, and according to the course of this world, walk “according to the prince of the power of the air.” The devil, or the prince of devils, is thus described: see Mat. xii. 24, 26. The legions of apostate angels are as one power united under one chief; and therefore what is called the “powers of darkness” elsewhere is here spoken of in the singular number. “The air” is represented as the seat of his kingdom. And it was the opinion of the Jews and heathens both that the air is full of spirits, and that there they exercise and exert themselves. The devil seems to have some power (by God’s permission) in the lower region of the air; there he is at hand to tempt men, and to do as much mischief to the world as he can. But it is the comfort and joy of God’s people that he who is “Head over all things to the church” hath conquered the devil, and has him in his chain: but wicked men are slaves to Satan, for they walk according to him; that is, they conform their lives and actions to the will and pleasure of this great usurper. The course and tenor of their lives are according to his suggestions, and in compliance with his temptations; they are subject to him, and are led captive by him at his will; whereupon he is called the god of this world, and “the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience.” The children of disobedience are such as choose to disobey God, and to serve the devil; in these he works very powerfully and effectually. As the good Spirit works that which is good in obedient souls, so this evil spirit works that which is evil in wicked men; and he now works, not only heretofore, but even since the world has been blessed with the light of the glorious Gospel. The apostle adds, “among whom also we all had our conversation in times past,” which words refer to the Jews, whom he signifies here to have been in the like sad and miserable condition by nature, and to have been as vile and wicked as the unregenerate Gentiles themselves, and whose natural state he farther describes in the next words. [It has been remarked here, that the apostle delicately includes himself, to shew that he did not claim to be better by nature than they were, and that all which any of them had of value was to be traced to the grace of God. “In the lusts of the flesh:” living to gratify the flesh, or the propensities of a corrupt nature.]

Fourthly. We are by nature drudges to the flesh, and to our corrupt affections, ver. 3. By fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, men contract that filthiness of flesh and spirit which the apostle exhorts Christians to cleanse themselves from, 2 Cor. vii. 1. The “fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind” includes all that sin and wickedness that are acted in, and by, both the inferior and the higher and nobler powers of the soul. We lived in the actual commission of all those sins which corrupt nature inclined us unto. The carnal mind makes a man a perfect slave to his vicious appetite. “Fulfilling the wills of the flesh,” &c., so the word may be rendered, noting the efficacy of these lusts, and what power they have over those who yield themselves up unto them.

Fifthly. We are “by nature the children of wrath, even as others.” The Jews were so as well as the Gentiles, and one man is as much so as another by nature; that is, not only by custom and imitation, but from the time when we began to exist, and by reason of our natural inclinations and appetites. All men being naturally “children of disobedience,” are also by nature “children of wrath.” God is angry with the wicked every day. Our state and course are such as deserve wrath, and would end in eternal wrath, if Divine grace did not interpose. What reason have sinners then to be looking out for that grace that will make them, of children of wrath, children of God, and heirs of glory! Thus far the apostle has described the misery of a natural state in these verses which we shall find him pursuing again in some following ones.

4 But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, 5 Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;) 6 And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: 7 That in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus. 8 For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: 9 Not of works, lest any man should boast. 10 For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them. 11 Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; 12 That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world: 13 But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

Here the apostle begins his account of the glorious change that was wrought in them by converting grace; where observe,

First. By whom, and in what manner, it was brought about and effected. 1. Negatively; “Not of yourselves,” ver. 8. Our faith, our conversion, and our eternal salvation, are not the mere product of any natural abilities, or of any merit of our own. “Not of works, lest any man should boast,” ver. 9. These things are not brought to pass by any thing done by us, and therefore all boasting is excluded, that he who glories must not glory in himself, but in the Lord. There is no room for any man’s boasting of his own abilities and power, or as though he had done any thing that might deserve such immense favours from God. 2. Positively; “But God, who is rich in mercy,” &c., ver. 4. God himself is the author of this great and happy change, and his great love is the spring and fountal cause of it; from thence he resolved to shew mercy. Love is his inclination to do us good, considered simply as creatures. Mercy respects us as apostate and as miserable creatures. Observe, God’s eternal love of goodwill towards his creatures is the fountain from whence all his mercies vouchsafed to us proceed; and that love of God is great love, and that mercy of his is rich mercy, inexpressibly great and inexhaustibly rich. [This is another of the apostle’s strong expressions. “Mercy,” as one observes, “is the wealth of God.” Who can exhaust the riches of infinity? The poor and the needy may here find a perpetual supply. This bank can never be exhausted.] And then by grace ye are saved, ver. 5, and by grace are ye saved through faith. It is the gift of God, ver. 8. Note, Every converted sinner is a saved sinner: such are delivered from sin and wrath; they are brought into a state of salvation, and have a right given them by grace to eternal happiness. The grace that saves them is the free undeserved goodness and favour of God; and he saves them, not by the works of the law, but through faith in Christ Jesus, by means of which they come to partake of the great blessings of the Gospel; and both that faith and that salvation, on which it has so great an influence, are the gift of God. The great objects of faith are made known by Divine revelation, and made credible by the testimony and evidence which God hath given us; and that we believe to salvation, and obtain salvation through faith, is entirely owing to Divine assistance and grace. God has ordered all so that the whole shall appear to be of grace. Observe,

Secondly. Wherein this change consists. In several particulars, answering to the misery of our natural state, some of which are enumerated in this section, and others are mentioned below. 1. We who were dead are quickened, ver. 5; that is, we are saved from the death of sin, and have a principle of spiritual life implanted in us. Grace in the soul is a new life in the soul. As death locks up the senses, seals up all the powers and faculties, so doth a state of sin, as to any thing that is good; grace unlocks and opens all, and enlarges the soul. Observe, A regenerate sinner becomes a living soul. He lives a life of sanctification, being born of God; and he lives in the sense of the law, being delivered from the guilt of sin by pardoning and justifying grace. He “hath quickened us together with Christ.” Our spiritual life results from our union with Christ; it is in him that we live: “Because I live, ye shall live also.” 2. We who were buried are raised up, ver. 6. What remains yet to be done is here spoken of as though it were already past, though indeed we are raised up in virtue of our union with him whom God hath raised from the dead. When he raised Christ from the dead he did in effect raise up all believers together with him, he being their common head; and when he placed him at his right hand in heavenly places he advanced and glorified them in and with him, they raised and exalted head and forerunner. “And made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.” This may be understood in another sense. Sinners roll themselves in the dust; sanctified souls sit in heavenly places, are raised above the world; the world is as nothing to them, compared with what it has been, and compared with what the other world is. Saints are not only Christ’s freemen, but they are assessors with him; by the assistance of his grace they have ascended with him above this world, to converse with another, and they live in the constant expectation of it. They are not only servants to the best of masters in the best world, but they are exalted to reign with him; they sit upon the throne with Christ, as he is set down with his Father on his throne.

Thirdly. Observe what is the great design and aim of God in producing and effecting this change. And this, 1. With respect to others; “That in the ages idea; the spirit of man indwelt by the Spirit of God” (Alford). “In the knowledge;” rather, “in full knowledge.” The Greek is explained by Culverwell as “the bringing me better acquainted with a thing that I knew before.”

i. 18. “The eyes of your heart:” so best MSS. (Matt. vi. 22, 23.) “The hope of his calling:” see 1 John iii. 3. “The riches of the glory of his inheritance:” “The inheritance which God has in his saints, and they in him” (Stier).

i. 14. “Which,” or “who is the earnest:” “The word means the first instalment paid as a pledge that the rest will follow” (Alford). See Rom. viii. 23. Not “until,” but “for”—i.e., “in order to,” or “with a view to the full redemption,” &c.

i. 17. “The Father of glory:” “God is the Father, by being the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Christ, of that glory . . . which shone forth in the manhood of the only-begotten Son” (John i. 14; 2 Cor. iv. 6). “The spirit of wisdom and revelation:” “A complex to come he might slay." &c., ver. 7; that is, that he might give a specimen and proof of his great goodness and mercy, for the encouragement of sinners in future time. Observe, That the goodness of God in converting and saving sinners heretofore is a proper encouragement to others in after time to hope in his grace and mercy, and to apply themselves to these. God having this in his design, poor sinners should take great encouragement from it. And what may we not hope for from such grace and kindness, from riches of grace, and from exceeding riches of grace, to which this change is owing? "through Christ Jesus," by and through whom God conveys all his favours and blessings to us. 2. With respect to the regenerated sinners themselves; "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works," &c., ver. 10. It appears that all is of grace, because all our spiritual advantages are from God; "We are his workmanship;" he means in respect of the new creation, not only as men, but as saints. The new man is a new creature, and God is its Creator. It is a new birth, and we are born or begotten of his will. "In Christ Jesus;" that is, on the account of what he hath done and suffered, and by the influence and operation of his blessed Spirit. "Unto good works." The apostle having before ascribed this change to Divine grace, in exclusion of works, lest he should seem thereby to discourage good works, he here observes, that though the change is to be ascribed to nothing of that nature, for we are the workmanship of God, yet God in this new creation has designed and prepared us for good works. "Created unto good works;" that is, with a design that we should be fruitful in them. Wherever God by his grace implants good principles, they are intended to be for good works. "Which God hath before ordained;" that is, decreed and appointed. Or, the words may be read, "to which God hath before prepared us;" that is, by blessing us with the knowledge of his will, and with the assistance of his Holy Spirit, and by producing such a change in us. "That we should walk in them;" that is, glorify God by an exemplary conversation, and by our perseverance in holiness.

In the 11th and 12th verses the apostle proceeds in his account of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature. "Wherefore remember" &c., ver. 11; as if he had said, You should remember what you have been, and compare it with what you now are, in order to humble yourselves, and to excite your love and thankfulness to God. Note, Converted sinners ought frequently to reflect upon the sinfulness and misery of that estate they were in by nature. Gentiles in the flesh; that is, lying in the corruption of their natures, and being destitute of circumcision, the outward sign of an interest in the covenant of grace. "Who are called uncircumcision by that," &c.; that is, you were reproached and upbraided for it by the formal Jews, who made an external profession, and who looked no farther than the outward ordinance. Note, Hypocritical professors are wont to value themselves chiefly on their external privileges, and to reproach and despise others who are destitute of them. The apostle describes the misery of their case in several particulars; ver. 12, "At that time," that is, while ye were Gentiles, and in an unconverted state, ye were, 1. In a Christless condition, without the knowledge of the Messiah, and without any saving interest in him, or relation to him. It is true of all unconverted sinners, all those who are destitute of faith, that they have no saving interest in Christ; and it must be a sad and deplorable thing for a soul to be without Christ. Being without Christ, they were, 2. "Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel;" that is, they did not belong to Christ's church, and had no communion with it, that being confined to the Israelitish nation. It is no small privilege to be placed in the church of Christ, and to share with the members of it in the advantages peculiar to it. 3. They were "strangers from the covenants of promise." The covenant of grace hath ever been the same for substance; though, having undergone various editions and improvements in the several ages of the church, it is called covenants; and the covenants of promise, because it is made up of promises, and particularly contains the great promise of the Messiah, and of eternal life through him. Now, the Ephesians in their Gentileism were strangers from this covenant, having never had any information or overture of it; and all unregenerate sinners are strangers to it, as they have no interest in it. Those who are without Christ, and so have no interest in the Mediator of the covenant, have none in the promises of the covenant. 4. They had no hope, that is, beyond this life; no well-grounded hope in God, no hope of spiritual and eternal blessings. They who are without Christ, and strangers from the covenant, can have no good hope; for Christ and the covenant are the ground and foundation of all the Christian's hopes. 5. They were in a state of distance and estrangement from God; "without God in the world." Not without some general knowledge of a Deity, for they worshipped idols; but living without any due regard to him, any acknowledged dependence on him, and any special interest in him. The words are, atheists in the world; for though they worshipped many gods, yet they were without the true God.

The apostle proceeds, ver. 13, farther to illustrate the happy change that was made in their state; "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off," &c. They were far off from Christ, from his church, from the promises, from the Christian hope, and from God himself, and therefore from all good; like the prodigal son in the far country. This has been represented in the preceding verses. Unconverted sinners remove themselves at a distance from God, and God puts them at a distance. He beholds the proud afar off. "But now in Christ Jesus" &c.; that is, upon their conversion, by virtue of their union with Christ, and their interest in him by faith, "are made nigh." They were brought home to God, received into the church, taken into the covenant, and possessed of all other privileges consequent upon these. Note, The saints are a people near to God. Salvation is far from the wicked, but God is a help at hand to his people; and this is "by the blood of Christ," that is, by the merit of his sufferings and death. Every believing sinner owes his nearness to God, and his interest in his favour, to the death and sacrifice of Christ.

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us; 15 Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace; 16 And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby: 17 And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh. 18 For through him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father. 19 Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellowcitizens with the saints, and of the household of God; 20 And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; 21 In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: 22 In whom ye also are built together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.

REMAINS OF THE GREAT TEMPLE AT EPHESUS.

We are now come to the last part of the chapter, which contains an account of the great and mighty privileges that converted Jews and Gentiles both receive from Christ. The apostle here shews that they who were in a state of enmity are reconciled. Betwixt the Jews and the Gentiles there had been a great enmity; so there is betwixt God and every unregenerate man. Now Jesus Christ "is our peace," ver. 14. He made peace by the sacrifice of himself; and came to reconcile,

First, Jews and Gentiles to each other. He made both one, by reconciling these two divisions of men, who were wont to malign, to hate, and to reproach each other before. He broke down "the middle wall of partition," namely, the ceremonial law, that made the great feud, and was the badge of the Jews' peculiarity, called the partition wall by way of allusion to the partition in the temple, which separated the court of the Gentiles from that into which the Jews only had liberty to enter. Thus he "abolished in his flesh the enmity," ver. 15; by his sufferings in the flesh taking away the binding power of the ceremonial law, so removing that cause of enmity and distance betwixt them, which is here called "the law of commandments contained in ordinances," because it did enjoin a multitude of external rites and ceremonies, and consisted of many institutions and appointments about the outward parts of Divine worship. The legal ceremonies were abrogated by Christ, having their accomplishment in him. By taking those out of the way he formed one church of believers, whether they had been Jews or Gentiles. Thus he made "in himself of twain one new man." He framed both these parties into one new society, or body of God's people, uniting them to himself as their common Head; they being renewed by the Holy Ghost, and now concurring in a new way of gospel worship; "So making peace," that is, betwixt these two parties who were so much at variance before.

Secondly, There is an enmity betwixt God and sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, and Christ came to slay that enmity, and to reconcile them both to God, ver. 16. Sin breeds a quarrel betwixt God and men; Christ came to take up the quarrel, and to bring it to an end, by reconciling both Jew and Gentile, now collected and gathered into one body, to a provoked and offended God; and this by the cross, or by the sacrifice of himself upon the cross, "having slain the enmity thereby." He being slain or sacrificed, slew the enmity that there was betwixt God and poor sinners. The apostle proceeds to illustrate the great advantages which both parties gain by the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, ver. 17. Christ, who purchased peace on the cross, came, partly in his own person, as to the Jews, who are here said to have been nigh, and partly in his apostles, whom he commissioned to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, who are said to have been afar off, in the sense that has been given before. "And preached peace," or published the terms of reconciliation with God, and of eternal life. Note here, that when the messengers of Christ deliver his truths it is in effect the same as if he did it immediately himself. He is said to preach by them, inasmuch that he who receiveth them receiveth him, and he who despiseth them (acting by virtue of his commission, and delivering his message,) despiseth and rejecteth Christ himself. Now the effect of this peace is, the free access which both Jews and Gentiles have unto God: ver. 18, "For through him," &c. that is, in his name, and by virtue of his mediation, "we both have an access," that is, admission into the presence of God, who is become the common reconciled Father of both. The throne of grace is erected for us to come to, and liberty of approach to that throne is allowed us. Our access is by the Holy Spirit. Christ purchased for us leave to come to God, and the Spirit gives us a heart to come, and strength to come, even grace to serve God acceptably. Observe We draw nigh to God, through Jesus Christ, by the

i. 19. "His power;" in both raising us to spiritual life and raising Christ from the dead.

i. 22. "Head over all things to the Church;" "Sovereign Head of the Church" (Conybeare). "As Head over all things, as Head to the Church" (Ellicott).

i. 23. See John i. 16. His is the "fulness," and he imparts it to his Church; so, by virtue of her union with him, she is identified with him (Col. ii. 10). "Filleth all with all" (Col. i. 16-19).

ii. 1. "Dead in trespasses," &c.: "Dead of your sins, as we say dead of cholera" (Alford). "Hath he quickened" is not expressed, but the meaning is evident from the context.

ii. 2. "Of disobedience;" Tyndal and the Vulgate read "of unbelief;" but, as Alford, though unbelief is the source of disobedience, the actual conduct is here spoken of.

ii. 3. "We all;" all who are now Christians—Jews and Gentiles. "Had our conversation;" i.e., "lived." "Of the mind;" better, "of of the Spirit, the Ephesians upon their conversion having such an access to God, as well as the Jews; and by the same Spirit the apostle tells them, "Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners," &c., ver. 19. This he mentions by way of opposition to what he had observed of them in their heathenism. They were now no longer "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," and no longer what the Jews were wont to account all the nations of the earth besides themselves, namely, strangers to God, "but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God;" that is, members of the church of Christ, and having a right to all the privileges of it. Observe here, that the church is compared to a city, and every converted sinner is free of it. It is also compared to a house, and every converted sinner is one of the domestics, one of the family; a servant and a child in God's house. In ver. 20 the church is compared to a building; the foundations of that building are "the apostles and prophets." They may be so called in a secondary sense, Christ himself being the primary foundation; but we are rather to understand it of the doctrine delivered by the prophets of the Old Testament and the apostles of the New. It follows, "Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone;" in him both Jews and Gentiles meet, and constitute one church. And Christ supports the building by his strength; "In whom all the building fitly framed together," &c., ver. 21, that is, all believers of which it does consist being united to Christ by faith, and amongst themselves by Christian charity, "grow unto an holy temple," become a sacred society, in which there is much communion betwixt God and his people, as in the temple; "in worshiping and serving him, he manifesting himself unto them; they offering up spiritual sacrifices to God, and he dispensing his blessings and answers to them. Thus the building, for the nature of it, is a temple, an holy temple; for the church is the place which God hath chosen to put his name there; and it becomes such a temple by grace and strength derived from himself, in the Lord. The universal church being built upon Christ as the foundation-stone, and united in Christ as the corner-stone, comes at length to be glorified in him as the top-stone; "In whom ye also are built together," &c., ver. 22. Observe, not only the universal church is called the temple of God, but particular churches; and even every true believer is a living temple, is "an habitation of God through the Spirit." God dwells in all believers now, they being become the temple of God through the operations of the blessed Spirit; and his dwelling with them now is an earnest of their dwelling together with him to eternity.

CHAPTER III.

This chapter consists of two parts. I. Of the account which St. Paul gives the Ephesians concerning himself, as he was appointed by God to be the apostle of the Gentiles, ver. 1—13. II. Of his devout and affectionate prayer to God for the Ephesians, ver. 14—21. We may observe it to have been very much the practice of this apostle to intermix with his instructions and counsels intercessions and prayers to God for those to whom he wrote, as knowing that all his instructions and teachings would be useless and vain, except God did co-operate with them and render them effectual. This is an example that all the ministers of Christ should copy after, praying earnestly that the efficacious operations of the Divine Spirit may attend their ministrations, and crown them with success.

OR this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, 2 If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: 3 How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery; (as I wrote afore in few words, 4 Whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ) 5 Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; 6 That the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel: 7 Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power. 8 Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; 9 And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ: 10 To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, 11 According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord: 12 In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him. 13 Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

Here we have the account which St. Paul gives the Ephesians concerning himself, as he was appointed by God the apostle of the Gentiles.

First. We may observe that he acquaints them with the tribulations and sufferings which he endured in the discharge of that office, ver. 1. The first clause refers to the preceding chapter, and may be understood either of these two ways. "For this cause," 1. For having preached the doctrine contained in the foregoing chapter, and for asserting that the great privileges of the Gospel belong not only to the Jews, but to believing Gentiles also, though they are not circumcised. For this I am now a prisoner, but a "prisoner of Jesus Christ," as I suffer in his cause and for his sake, and continuing his faithful servant, and the object of his special protection and care, while I am thus suffering for him. Observe, Christ's servants, if they come to be prisoners, are his prisoners, and he despiseth not his prisoners. He thinks never the worse of them for the ill character which the world gives them, or the evil treatment that they meet with in it. Paul adhered to Christ, and Christ owned him when he was in the prison. "For you Gentiles." The Jews did therefore persecute and imprison him, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and preached the Gospel to them. We may learn hence that the faithful ministers of Christ are to dispense his sacred truths, however disagreeable they may be to some, and whatever they themselves may suffer for doing so. Or, 2. The words may be thus understood, "For this cause," &c., that is, since you are no more strangers and foreigners, &c., as ch. ii. 19, but are united to Christ, and admitted into communion with his church, "I Paul," who am "the prisoner of Jesus Christ," &c., pray that you may be enabled to act as becomes persons thus favoured by God, and made partakers of so great privileges. To this purpose you find him expressing himself, ver. 14, where, after the digression contained in the several verses intervening, he proceeds with what he began in this first verse. Observe, Those who have received grace and signal favours from God stand in need of prayer, that they may improve and advance, and continue to act as becomes them. And seeing Paul, while he was a prisoner, employed himself in such prayers to God in behalf of the Ephesians, we should learn that no particular sufferings of our own should make us so solicitous about ourselves as to neglect the cases of others in our supplications and addresses to God.

He speaks again of his sufferings; "Wherefore I desire that you faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory," ver. 13. While he was in prison he suffered much there; and though it was upon their account that he suffered, yet he would not have them discouraged or dismayed at this, seeing God had done such great things for them by his ministry. What a tender concern was here for these Ephesians! The apostle here seems to have been more solicitous lest they should be discouraged and faint, upon his tribulations, than about what he himself endured; and to prevent this, he tells them that his sufferings were their glory, and would be so far from being a real discouragement, if they duly considered the matter, that they ministered cause to them for glorying and for rejoicing, as this discovered the great esteem and regard which God bore to them, in that he not only sent his apostles to preach the Gospel to them, but even to suffer for them, and to confirm the truths they delivered by the persecutions they underwent. Observe, Not only the faithful ministers of Christ themselves, but their people too, have some special cause for joy and glorying, when they suffer for the sake of dispensing the Gospel.

Secondly. The apostle informs them of God's appointing him to the office, and eminently fitting and qualifying him for it, by a special revelation that he made unto him. God appointed him to the office; "If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward," ver. 2. They could not but have heard of this, and therefore he does not design to speak doubtfully of the matter; eye is sometimes an affirmative particle, and we may read it, 'since you have heard,' &c. He styles the Gospel "the grace of God" here, as in other places, because it is the gift of Divine grace to sinful men; and all the gracious overtures that it makes, and the joyful tidings that it contains, proceed from the rich grace of God; and it is the great instrument in the hands of the Spirit by which God works grace in the souls of men. He speaks of the dispensation of this grace given to him; he means as he was authorised and commissioned by God to dispense the doctrine of the Gospel, which commission and authority were given to him chiefly for the service of the Gentiles, "to you-ward." And again, speaking of the Gospel, he says, "Whereof I was made a minister," &c., ver. 7. Here he again asserts his authority; he "was made a minister," he did not make himself such; he took not to himself that honour. And he was made such "according to the gift of the grace of God" unto him. God did supply and furnish him for his work, and in the discharge of it did suitably assist and help him with all needful gifts and graces, both ordinary and extraordinary; and that "by the effectual working of his power," in himself more especially, and also in great numbers of those to whom he preached, by which means his labours amongst them were successful. Observe, that what God calls men to he fits them for, and doth it with an almighty power. There is an effectual working of Divine power attending the gifts of Divine grace. As God appointed him to the office, so he did eminently qualify him for it by a special revelation that he made unto him; and he makes mention both of the mystery that was revealed and of the revelation of it.

1. The mystery revealed is, "that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the Gospel," ver. 6; that is, that they should be joint heirs with the believing Jews of the heavenly inheritance, and that they should be members of the same mystical body, that is, be received into the church of Christ, and be interested in the gospel promises as well as the Jews, and particularly in that great promise of the Spirit. And this "in Christ," that is, being united to Christ in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen, and "by the Gospel," that is, in the times of the Gospel, as some understand it. Or, by the Gospel preached to them, which is the great instrument and means by which God works faith in Christ, as others. This was the great truth revealed to the apostle, namely, that God would call the Gentiles to salvation by faith in Christ, and that without the works of the law.

2. Of the revelation of this truth he speaks ver. 3—5; where we may observe that the coalition of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church was a mystery, a great mystery; what was designed in the counsel of God before all worlds, but what could not be fully understood for many ages, till the accomplishment expounded the prophecies of it. It is called a mystery, because the several circumstances and peculiarities of it, such as the time, and manner, and means by which it should be effected, were concealed and kept secret in God's own breast, till by an immediate revelation he made them known to his servant: see Acts xxvi. 16—18. And it is called the mystery of Christ, because it was revealed by him, Gal. i. 12, and because it relates so very much unto him. Of this the apostle had given him some hints "afore," or a little before, that is, in the preceding chapters; "whereby when ye read," or, as those words may be read, "unto which attending;" and it is not enough for us barely to read the Scriptures, unless we attend unto them, and seriously consider and lay to heart our thoughts" (Alford); or "of our imagination" (Conybeare). "And were by nature," &c.: "It was once our state and condition, it is now so no longer" (Ellicott). This expression of the apostle's amounts to an assertion of the doctrine of original sin (Alford, Harless, Eadie).

ii. 4. See Ezek. xviii. 23.

ii. 5. Not "hath quickened," but "quickened." "Together with Christ;" "God vivified us together with Christ; in the one act and fact of his resurrection he raised all his people to spiritual life, and in that to victory over death, both spiritual and therefore necessarily physical also" (Alford).

ii. 6. "In Christ Jesus:" our union with him is the means of our resurrection and glorification.

ii. 7. "Ages to come:" the successive ages till Christ's coming.

ii. 8. "For by grace:" taking up and expanding the parenthesis of verse 5. "And that:" i.e., "your salvation is not your own doing."

what we read. "Ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ," so as to perceive how God had fitted and qualified him to be an apostle to the Gentiles, which might be to them an evident token of his Divine authority. "This mystery," he says, "in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit," ver. 5; that is, it was not so fully and clearly discovered in the ages before Christ as it is now revealed unto the prophets, that is, of that age—the prophets of the New Testament, who were immediately inspired and taught by the Spirit. Let us observe, that the conversion of the Gentile world to the faith of Christ was an adorable mystery, and we ought to bless God for it. Who would have imagined that those who had been so long in the dark, and at so great a distance, should be enlightened with the marvellous light, and be made nigh? Let us learn from hence not to despair of the worst, of the worst of persons, and of the worst of nations. Nothing is too hard for Divine grace to do; none so unworthy but God may please to confer great grace upon them. And how much are we ourselves interested in this affair; not only as we live in a time in which this mystery is revealed, but particularly as we are a part of the nations which in times past were foreigners and strangers, and lived in gross idolatry, but are now enlightened with the everlasting Gospel, and partake of the promises of it.

Thirdly. The apostle acquaints them how he was employed in this office, and that with respect to the Gentiles and to all men.

1. With respect to the Gentiles, he preached to them "the unsearchable riches of Christ," ver. 8. Observe in this verse how humbly he speaks of himself, and how highly he speaks of Jesus Christ. 1st. How humbly he speaks of himself; "I am less than the least of all saints." [This expression must not be slightly passed over. It has been justly remarked by a popular modern commentator, that it is one of the class of expressions peculiar to Paul. The ordinary terms of language do not express the idea which he wishes to convey, and a word is therefore coined to convey an idea more emphatically. It is a comparative made from a superlative. The word means here, 'who am incomparably the least of all the saints, or who am not worthy to be reckoned among the saints.'] St. Paul, who was the chief of the apostles, calls himself "less than the least of all saints;" he means on the account of his having been formerly a persecutor of the followers of Christ. He was, in his own esteem, as little as could be. What can be less than the least? To speak himself as little as could be, he speaks himself less than could be. [Perhaps there was also in the apostle's mind a humbling sense of his own attainments in religion. The apostle never thought that he had reached perfection; and while he recommends to others to press towards the mark for the prize, he said of himself, 'I count not myself to have apprehended.'] Observe, Those whom God advances to honourable employments he humbles and makes low in their own eyes; and where God gives grace to be humble, there he gives all other grace. You may also observe in what a different manner the apostle speaks of himself and his office; while he magnifies that he debases himself. Observe, A faithful minister of Christ may be very humble, and think very meanly of himself, even when he thinks and speaks very highly and honourably of his sacred function. 2nd. How highly he speaks of Jesus Christ; "The unsearchable riches of Christ." [The commentator just referred to observes, "There is no more emphatic expression in the New Testament than this. It shows that the heart of the apostle was full of admiration of the sufficiency and glory that was in the Saviour, and that he wanted words to express it." There is a mighty treasury of mercy, grace, and love, laid up in Christ Jesus, and that for Jews and Gentiles both. Or, the riches of the Gospel are here spoken of as the riches of Christ; the riches which Christ purchased for, and bestows upon, all believers; and they are unsearchable riches, which we cannot find the bottom of, and which human sagacity could never have discovered, and men could no otherwise attain to the knowledge of them but by revelation. Now it was the apostle's business and employment to preach these unsearchable riches of Christ among the Gentiles; and it was a favour he greatly valued, and looked upon it as an unspeakable honour to him. "Unto me is this grace given," this special favour God hath granted to such an unworthy creature as I am. And it is an unspeakable favour to the Gentile world that to them the unsearchable riches of Christ are preached. Though many remain poor, and are not enriched with these riches, yet it is a favour to have them preached among us, to have an offer of them made to us; and if we be not enriched with them it is owing to ourselves.]

2. With respect to all men, ver. 9. His business and employment was "to make all men see," that is, to publish and make known to the whole world, "what is the fellowship of the mystery" (that is, that the Gentiles, who have hitherto been strangers to the church, shall be admitted into communion with it), "which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God," kept secret in his purpose, "who created all things by Jesus Christ;" as Jno. i. 3, "All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made;" and therefore no wonder that he saves the Gentiles as well as the Jews, for he is the common Creator of them both; and we may conclude that he is able to perform the work of their redemption, seeing he was able to accomplish the great work of creation. It is true that both the first creation, when God made all things out of nothing, and the new creation, whereby sinners are made new creatures by converting grace, are of God by Jesus Christ. The apostle adds, "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known, by the church, the manifold wisdom of God," ver. 10. This was one thing, among others, which God had in his eye in revealing this mystery, that the good angels, who have a pre-eminence in governing the kingdoms and principalities of the world, and who are endued with great power to execute the will of God on this earth, (though their ordinary residence and place of abode is in heaven,) may be informed, from what passes in the church, and is done in and by it, "of the manifold wisdom of God," that is, of the great variety with which God wisely dispenses things; or of his wisdom manifested in the many ways and methods he takes in ordering his church, in the several ages of it, and especially in receiving the Gentiles into it. The holy angels who look into the mystery of our redemption by Christ, could not but take notice of this branch of that mystery, that among the Gentiles is preached the unsearchable riches of Christ. And this is "according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord," ver. 11. Some read the words (κατὰ πρόθεσιν τῶν αἰώνων) thus, "according to the fore-disposing of the ages which he made," &c.; so Dr. Whitby, &c. "In the first of the ages," (says the mentioned author), "his wisdom seeing fit to give the promise of a Saviour to a fallen Adam; in the second age to typify and represent him to the Jews in sacred persons, rites, and sacrifices; and in the age of the Messiah, or the last age, to reveal him to the Jews and preach him to the Gentiles." Others understand it, according to our translation, of the eternal purpose which God purposed to execute in and through Jesus Christ the whole of what he has done in the great affairs of man's redemption being in pursuance of his eternal decree about that matter. [There is no evading of this truth: if God has any plan it must be eternal. He has no new schemes; he has no intentions which he did not always have.] The apostle, having mentioned our Lord Jesus Christ, subjoins concerning him, "In whom we have boldness and access with confidence, by the faith of him," ver. 12; that is, by or through whom we have liberty to open our minds freely to God as to a Father, and a well-grounded persuasion of audience and of acceptance with him, and this by means of the faith we have in him as our great Mediator and Advocate. We may come with humble boldness to hear from God, knowing that the terror of the curse is done away; and we may expect to hear from him good words and comfortable. We may have access with confidence to speak to God, knowing that we have such a Mediator between God and us, and such an Advocate with the Father: see upon ver. 13, above. [It is a delightful truth that the believing Gentile has the same privileges with the believing Jew; and, unlike the Eleusinian mysteries, which were practised among the Ephesians as idolaters, Christianity has no gradations of knowledge for the purpose of distinguishing one from another: all are initiated into the same truth, and the privilege of every believer is to have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.]

14 For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, 16 That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; 17 That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, 18 May be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; 19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God. 20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, 21 Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

We are now come to the second part of this chapter, which contains St. Paul's devout and affectionate prayer to God for his beloved Ephesians.

"For this cause." This may be referred either to the immediately foregoing verse, "That ye faint not" &c., or, rather, the apostle is here resuming what he began at the first verse, from which he digressed in those which are interposed. Observe to whom he prays; to God, as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," of which see ch. i. 3. Observe farther, his outward posture in prayer, which was humble and reverent; "I bow my knees." Note, When we draw nigh to God we should reverence him in our hearts, and express it in the most suitable and becoming behaviour and gesture. And here, having mentioned Christ, he cannot pass without an honourable encomium on his love, ver. 15. The universal church hath a dependence upon the Lord Jesus Christ. "Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." The Jews were wont to boast of Abraham as their father; but now Jews and Gentiles both are denominated from Christ, so some; while others understand it of the saints in heaven, who wear the crown of glory, and of saints on earth, who are going on in the work of grace here. Both the one and the other make but one family, one household; and from him they are named Christians, as they really are such, acknowledging their dependence upon, and their relation to, Christ. Observe what the apostle asks of God for these his friends—spiritual blessings, which are the best blessings, and the most earnestly to be sought and prayed for by every one of us, both for ourselves and for our friends.

First. Spiritual strength for the work and duty to which we are called, and in which we are employed; "That he would grant you according to the riches of his glory, [out of the inexhaustible stores of the glorious riches of his grace,] to be strengthened" &c.; "The inner man" is the heart or soul. To be "strengthened with might" is to be mightily strengthened, much more than they were at present; to be endued with a high degree of grace, and spiritual abilities for the discharging duty, the resisting temptations, the enduring persecutions, &c. And the apostle prays that this may be "according to the riches of his glory," or according to his glorious riches; that is, answerable to that great abundance of grace, mercy, and power, &c., which resides in God, and is his glory; and this by his Spirit, who is the immediate worker of grace in the souls of God's people, ["In the inner man;" that is, the heart, the mind, the soul.] Observe from these things, that strength from the Spirit of God in the inner man is the best and most desirable strength; strength of the soul; the strength of faith and other graces; strength to serve God and to do our duty, and to persevere in our Christian course with vigour and with cheerfulness. And let us farther observe, that as the work of grace is first begun, so it is continued and carried on, by the blessed Spirit of God.

Secondly. The indwelling of Christ in our hearts, ver. 17. Christ is said to dwell in his people, as he is always present with them by his gracious influences and operations. Observe that it is a desirable thing to have Christ dwell in our hearts; and if the law of Christ be written there, and the love of Christ be shed abroad there, then Christ dwells there. Christ is an inhabitant in the soul of every good Christian; where his Spirit dwells, there he dwells; and he dwells in the heart by faith, by means of the continual exercise of faith upon him. Faith opens the door of the soul to receive Christ; faith admits him, and submits to him. By faith we are united to Christ, and have an interest in him.

Thirdly. The fixing of pious and devout affections in the soul. "That ye being rooted and grounded in love," that is, steadfastly fixed in your love to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to all the saints the beloved of our Lord Jesus Christ. Many have some love to God, and to his servants, but it is a flash, like the crackling of thorns under a pot, it makes a great noise, but is gone presently. We should earnestly desire that good affections may be fixed in us, that we may be "rooted and grounded in love." Some understand it of their being settled and established in the sense of God's love to them, which would inspire them with greater ardours of holy love to him, and to one another. And how very desirable is it to have a settled, fixed sense of the love of God and Christ to our souls, so as to be able to say with the apostle, at all times, "He has loved me." Now, the best way to attain to this is to be careful that we maintain a constant love to God in our souls; this will be the evidence

"God justifies the believing man, not for the worthiness of his belief, but for the worthiness of Him in whom he believes" (Hooker).

ii. 10. See Titus iii. 5.

ii. 11. "The Gentiles were called, and were the uncircumcision; the Jews were called, but were not truly the circumcision" (Ellicott). (Col. ii. 11.)

ii. 12. "Here are three heads of misery—ye were without Christ, without the Holy Spirit, without God" (Bengel).

ii. 13. See chap. i. 7.

ii. 14–16. "For he:" he and none else. "Both one:" Jews and Gentiles. "And hath broken down the middle wall of partition, the enmity (between us) in his flesh, even the law," &c.: "The reconciliation which Christ effected between Jew and Gentile was in fact only a subordinate step of the reconciliation of both to God, which he effected by his sacrifice in the flesh" (Alford).

ii. 17, 18. See John xx. 20, 21; Acts xxvi. 23.

of the love of God to us. We love him because he first loved us. In order to this he prays.

Fourthly. For their experimental acquaintance with the love of Jesus Christ. The more intimate acquaintance we have with Christ's love to us, the more love will be drawn out to him, and to those who are his, for his sake. "That you may be able to comprehend with all saints," &c., ver. 18, 19; that is, more clearly to understand and firmly to believe the wonderful love of Christ to his, which the saints do understand and believe in some measure, and shall understand more hereafter. Christians should not aim to comprehend above all saints, but be content that God deals with them as he uses to do with those who love and fear his name. We should desire to comprehend with all saints; that is, to have so much knowledge as the saints are allowed to have in this world. We should be ambitious of coming up with the first three; but not of going beyond what is the measure of the stature of other saints.

It is observable how magnificently the apostle speaks of the love of Christ. The dimensions of redeeming love are admirable: "The breadth, and length, and depth, and height." By enumerating these dimensions the apostle designs to signify the exceeding greatness of the love of Christ, the unsearchable riches of his love, (which is higher than heaven, deeper than hell, longer than the earth, and broader than the sea,) to allude to Job xi. 7, 8. Some describe the particulars thus: by the breadth of it we may understand the extent of it to all ages, nations, and ranks of men; by the length of it, its continuance from everlasting to everlasting; by the depth of it, its stooping to the lowest condition, with a design to relieve and save those who are sunk into the depths of sin and misery; by its height, its entitling and raising us up to the heavenly happiness and glory. We should desire to comprehend this love. It is the character of all the saints that they do so; for they all have a complacency and a confidence in the love of Christ: "And to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge," ver. 19. [No human or created intellect can describe its nature, fathom its motives, or conceive of its eternal effects.] It passeth knowledge, how can we know it? Why, we must pray and endeavour to know something, and should still covet and strive to know more and more of it, though after the best endeavours none can fully comprehend it; in its full extent it passeth knowledge. Though the love of Christ may be better perceived and known by Christians than it generally is, yet it cannot be fully understood on this side heaven. [And it will doubtless furnish the grand subject of contemplation in the heavenly world itself, even angels desiring to look into it, just as the never-ending theme of praise will be "Unto him who hath loved us." Note, The love of Christ, though incomprehensibly great, may yet be experimentally known.]

Fifthly. He prays that they "might be filled with all the fulness of God." It is a high expression; we dare not use it if we did not find it in the Scriptures. It is like those other expressions of being "partakers of a Divine nature," and of being "perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect." We are not to understand it of his fulness as God, in himself, but of his fulness as a God in covenant with us, as a God to his people; such a fulness as God is ready to bestow, who is willing to fill every one to the utmost of his capacity, and that with all those gifts and graces which he sees they need. They who receive grace for grace from Christ's fulness may be said to be filled with the fulness of God, according to their capacity; all which is in order to their arriving to the highest degree of the knowledge and enjoyment of God, and an entire conformity to him.

["Filled with all the fulness of God" is another of the apostle's astonishing expressions. We may conceive of the contents of the largest vessel that was ever made by human hands, for example, of the brazen sea—we may conceive of the fulness of the sea itself, though even that requires an extraordinary stretch of mind; but to conceive of the fulness of the Fountain of happiness and blessedness,—of God who fills all things,—entirely "passeth knowledge." Yet this blessedness is to be communicated to believers. Here, by degrees, we derive much from it, "grace upon grace," 1 John i. 17. In heaven our capacities will be more and more enlarged; and, as they increase, that same fulness will supply them, always filling, always increasing, yet always full; each vessel having as much as it can contain. Then the apostle's sublime and fervent prayer will be realised to its fullest extent, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God. Note, Though God's fulness is not to be expressed, it is nevertheless to be enjoyed.]

The apostle closes the chapter with a doxology, ver. 20, 21. It is proper to conclude our prayers with praises. Our blessed Saviour hath taught us to do so. Take notice how he describes God, and how he ascribes glory to him. He describes him as a God that "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." There is an inexhaustible fulness of grace and mercy in God, which the prayers of all the saints can never draw dry. Whatever we may ask, or think to ask, still God is able to do more, abundantly more, exceedingly abundantly more. Open thy mouth never so wide, and he hath wherewithal to fill it. Note, In our applications to God we should encourage our faith by a consideration of his all-sufficiency and almighty power. "According to the power which worketh in us," as if he had said, We have already had a proof of this power of God, in what he hath wrought in us, and done for us, having quickened us by his grace, and converted us to himself. The power that still worketh for the saints is according to that power that hath wrought in them. Wherever God gives of his fulness he gives to experience his power. Having thus described God, he ascribes glory to him. When we come to ask for grace from God, we ought to give glory to God. Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus. In ascribing glory to God we ascribe all excellencies and perfections to him, glory being the effluency and result of them all. Observe that the seat of God's praises is in the church. That little rent of praise which God receives from this world is from the church, a sacred society constituted for the glory of God, every particular member of which, both Jew and Gentile, does concur in this work of praising God. The Mediator of these praises is Jesus Christ. All God's gifts come from him to us through the hand of Christ, and all our praises pass from us to him through the same hand. And God should and will be praised thus "throughout all ages, world without end;" for he will ever have a church to praise him, and he will ever have his tribute of praise from his church. "Amen." So be it! and so it will certainly be.

[We may pause and meditate on these closing verses for hours, till the soul becomes completely wrapped in ecstasy, soaring with the apostle into the third heavens, and catching something of the devout enthusiasm of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. Devout critics have pondered over it with amazement, and have confessed that the passage has baffled all their learned skill in conveying any suitable idea of its force and beauty. It contains what one of the learned calls one of the apostle's "self-invented phrases." It is an example of Paul's redundant expressions, as if his heart could not fully utter his feelings, and as if the richest of all languages was too poor to express what his heart was able to utter. It has been rendered literally "unto all generations of the ages of ages," and "unto all the generations of the eternity of eternities, or the eternity of ages." When long ages shall have rolled away, he shall still be glorified in his saints, and the glory shall still be given him in and by the church. The church triumphant will glorify him in far greater perfection than the church militant, reflecting back the glory with which itself is glorified, with an effluence conceivable by those only who dwell in the regions of unalloyed bliss.]

CHAPTER IV.

We have gone through the former part of this epistle, which consists of several important doctrinal truths, contained in the three preceding chapters. We enter now on the latter part of it, in which we have the most weighty and serious exhortations that can be given. We may observe, that in this (as in most others of St. Paul's epistles) the former part is doctrinal, and fitted to inform the minds of men in the great truths and doctrines of the Gospel; the latter is practical, and designed for the direction of their lives and manners, all Christians being obliged to endeavour after soundness in the faith, and regularity in life and practice. In what has gone before we have heard of Christian privileges, which are the matter of our comfort. In what follows we shall hear of Christian duties, and what the Lord our God requires of us, in consideration of such privileges vouchsafed to us. The best way to understand the mysteries and partake of the privileges of which we have read before, is conscientiously to practise the duties prescribed to us in what follows; as, on the other hand, a serious consideration and belief of the doctrines that have been taught us in the foregoing chapters will be a good foundation on which to build the practice of the duties prescribed in those which are yet before us: Christian faith and Christian practice do mutually benefit each other. In this chapter we have divers exhortations to important duties. I. One that is more general, ver. 1. II. An exhortation to mutual love, unity, and concord, with the proper means and motives to promote them, ver. 2—16. III. An exhortation to Christian purity and holiness of life; and that both more general, ver. 17—24, and in several particular instances, ver. 25—32.

THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

This is a general exhortation to walk as becomes our Christian profession. St. Paul was now a prisoner at Rome, and he was the "prisoner of the Lord," or, in the Lord, which signifies as much as for the Lord: see of this, ch. iii. 1. He mentions this once and again to shew that he was not ashamed of his bonds, well knowing that he suffered not as an evil doer; and likewise to recommend what he wrote to them with the greater tenderness, and with some special advantage. It was a doctrine he thought worthy suffering for, and therefore surely they should think it worthy their serious regards and their dutiful observance. We have here the petition of a poor prisoner, one of Christ's prisoners; "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you," &c. Considering what God hath done for you, and to what a state and condition he has called you, as has been discoursed before, I now come with an earnest request to you, (not to send me relief, or to use your interest for the obtaining my liberty, the first thing which poor prisoners are wont to solicit from their friends, but) that you would approve yourselves good Christians, and live up to your profession and calling; "That ye walk worthy," &c.; that is, agreeably, suitably, and congruously to those happy circumstances into which the grace of God hath brought you, whom he hath converted from heathenism to Christianity. [To walk, in Scripture, is expressive of the mode of a man's life; and in this passage it intimates that a Christian's life should be consistent, active, progressive, and persevering.] Observe, Christians ought to accommodate themselves to the Gospel, by which they are called, and to the glory to which they are called: both are their vocation. We are called Christians, we must answer that name, and live like Christians. We are called to God's kingdom and glory; that kingdom and glory therefore we must mind, and walk as becomes the heirs of them.

2 With all lowliness and meekness, with longsuffering, forbearing one another in love; 3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. 4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; 5 One Lord, one faith, one baptism, 6 One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. 7 But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. 8 Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. 9 (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? 10 He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.) 11 And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; 12 For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: 13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the

iii. 3. "By revelation was made known:" so best MSS. "The mystery:" the admission of the Gentiles. "I wrote afore:" in chap. i. 9, 10, and chap. ii. 11—13.

iii. 10. "By the Church:" "That the holy angels are capable of a knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ: 14 That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; 15 But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ: 16 From whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

CAPTIVES LED IN CHAINS AFTER THE TRIUMPHAL CAR.—VER. 8.

Here the apostle proceeds to more particular exhortations. Two he enlarges upon in this chapter; namely, to unity and purity, holiness and love, which Christians should very much study. We do not "walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called" if we be not faithful friends to all Christians, and sworn enemies to all sin. This section contains the exhortation to mutual love, unity, and concord, with the proper means and motives to promote them. Nothing is pressed upon us more earnestly in the Scriptures than this. Love is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school, the livery of his family. Observe,

First. The means of unity; "Lowliness and meekness, long-suffering and forbearing one another in love," ver. 2. By lowliness we are to understand humility, and the entertaining mean thoughts of ourselves, which is opposed to pride. By meekness, that excellent disposition of soul which makes men unwilling to provoke others, and not easily to be provoked or offended with their infirmities; and it is opposed to angry resentments and peevishness. Long-suffering implies a patient bearing of injuries without seeking revenge; and forbearing one another in love signifies the bearing their infirmities out of a principle of love, and so as not to cease to love them on the account of these. The best Christians have need to bear one with another, and to make the best one of another, to provoke one another's graces, and not their passions. We find much in ourselves which it is hard to forgive ourselves; and therefore we must not think it much if we find that in others which we think hard to forgive them, and yet must forgive them as we forgive ourselves. Now, without these things, unity cannot be preserved. The first step towards unity is humility; without that there will be no meekness, no patience, nor forbearance, and without these no unity. Pride and passion break the peace, and make all the mischief. Humility and meekness, &c., restore the peace and keep it. Only by pride comes contention; only by humility comes love. The more lowly-mindedness the more like-mindedness. We do not walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called if we be not meek and lowly of heart; for he by whom we are called, he to whom we are called, was eminent for meekness and lowliness of heart, and hath commanded us therein to learn of him.

Secondly. We have an account of the nature of that unity which the apostle prescribes. It is "the unity of the Spirit," ver. 3. The seat of Christian unity is in the heart or spirit. It does not lie in one set of thoughts, nor in one form and mode of worship, but in one heart and one soul. This unity of heart and affection may be said to be of the Spirit of God; it is wrought by him, and is one of the fruits of the Spirit. This we should endeavour to keep. Endeavouring is a Gospel word. We must do our utmost. If others will quarrel with us, we must take all possible care not to quarrel with them. If others will despise and hate us, we must not despise and hate them. "In the bond of peace." Peace is a bond, as it unites persons, and makes them live friendly one with another. A peaceable disposition and conduct binds Christians together; whereas discord and quarrel disband and disunite their hearts and affections. Many slender twigs bound together become strong. "The bond of peace" is the strength of society. Not that it can be imagined that all good people, and all the members of societies, should be in every thing just of the same length, and the same sentiments, and the same judgment; but the bond of peace unites them all together, with a non obstante,—"notwithstanding," to these. As in a bundle of rods, they may be of different lengths, and different strength; but when they are tied together by one bond they are much stronger than any, even the thickest and strongest, were of themselves.

Thirdly. We have next the motives proper to promote this Christian unity and concord. The apostle urges several to persuade us to it.

1. Consider how many unities there are that are the joy and glory of our Christian profession. There should be one heart, for "there is one body and one spirit," ver. 4. Two hearts in one body would be monstrous. If there be but one body, all that belong to that body should have one heart. The catholic church is one mystical body of Christ, and all good Christians make up but one body, incorporated by one charter, that of the Gospel, animated by one Spirit the same Holy Spirit, who, by his gifts and graces, quickens, enlivens, and governs that body. If we belong to Christ, we are all actuated by one and the same Spirit, and therefore should be one, "Even as you are called in one hope of your calling." Hope is here put for its object, the thing hoped for, the heavenly inheritance to the hope of which we are called: all Christians are called to the same hope of eternal life. There is one Christ that they all hope in, and one heaven that they are all hoping for; and therefore they should be of one heart. "One Lord," ver. 5; that is, Christ, the head of the church, to whom, by God's appointment, all Christians are immediately subject. One faith; that is, the Gospel, containing the doctrine of the Christian faith; or it is the same grace of faith (viz., faith in Christ) whereby all Christians are saved. "One baptism," by which we profess our faith, being baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and so the same sacramental covenant, whereby we engage ourselves to the Lord Christ. "One God and Father of all," ver. 6. One God, who owns all the true members of the church for his children; for he is the Father of all such by special relation, as he is "the Father of all" men by creation. And he "is above all," by his essence, and with respect to the glorious perfections of his nature, and as he has dominion over all creatures, and especially over his church; "and through all," by his providence upholding and governing them; "and in you all," in all believers, in whom he dwells, as in his holy temple, by his Spirit and special grace. If then there be so many ones, it is pity but there should be one more—one heart, or one soul.

2. Consider the variety of gifts that Christ has bestowed among Christians. But unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ." Though the members of Christ's church agree in so many things, yet there are some things wherein they differ; but this should breed no difference of affection among them, since they are all derived from the same bountiful Author, and designed for the same great ends. "Unto every one of us" Christians "is given grace," some gift or grace, in some kind or degree or other, for the mutual help of one another. "Unto every one of us" ministers "is given grace," to some a greater measure of gifts, to others a lesser measure. The different gifts of Christ's ministers proved a great occasion of contention among the first Christians. One was for Paul, and another for Apollos. The apostle shews that they had no reason to quarrel about them, but all the reason in the world to agree in the joint use of them, for common edification, because all was given "according to the measure of the gift of Christ," in such a measure as seemed best to Christ to bestow upon every one. Observe, All the ministers and all the members of Christ owe all the gifts and graces that they are possessed of to him; and this is a good reason why we should love one another, because to "every one of us is given grace." All to whom Christ hath given grace, and on whom he hath bestowed his gifts, (though they are of different sizes, different names, and different sentiments,) yet ought to love one another.

The apostle takes this occasion to instance some of the gifts which Christ bestowed. And that they were bestowed by Christ he makes appear by those words of David wherein he foretold this concerning him, Ps. lxxviii. 18, "Wherefore he saith," ver. 3, (that is, the Psalmist saith), "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." David prophesied of the ascension of Christ; and the apostle descants upon it here, and in the three following verses. "When he ascended up on high." We may understand the apostle both of the place into which he ascended in his human nature, that is, the highest heavens, and particularly of the state to which he was advanced, he being then highly exalted and eminently glorified by his Father. Let us set ourselves to think of the ascension of Jesus Christ: that our blessed Redeemer being risen from the dead, is gone to heaven, where he sits at the right hand of the Majesty on high, which completed the proof of his being the Son of God. As great conquerors, when they rode in their triumphal chariots, used to be attended with the most illustrious of their captives led in chains, and were wont to scatter their largesses and bounty among the soldiers and other spectators of their triumphs, so Christ, when he ascended into heaven as a triumphal conqueror, "led captivity captive." It is a phrase used in the Old Testament to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led others captive: see Jud. v. 12. Captivity is here put for captives, and signifies all our spiritual enemies, who brought us into captivity before. He conquered those who had conquered us, such as sin, the devil, and death. Indeed, he triumphed over these on the cross; but the triumph was completed at his ascension, when he became Lord over all, and had the keys of death and Hades put into his hands. And he "gave gifts unto men," in the psalm it is, he "received gifts for men." He received for them, that he might give to them, a large measure of gifts and graces; particularly he enriched his disciples with the gift of the Holy Ghost. The apostle, thus speaking of the ascension of Christ, takes notice specific increase of knowledge, and of a deepening insight into God's wisdom, seems from this passage clear and incontrovertible" (Ellicott). "The angels are instructed in God's wisdom by the great spiritual body constituted in Christ, which they contemplate" (Stier).

iii. 14. "For this cause:" because of their admission into the Church. Best MSS. omit "of our Lord Jesus Christ."

iii. 17. "In your hearts" (Rev. iii. 20). "Being rooted:" rather,

"having been." The next clause speaks of the result of their rooting and grounding in love after the process is completed, not while in progress.

iii. 18. Many explanations of these four terms have been given. Thus Bengel explains its "breadth" of Christ's world-wide love; "length," its extending through all ages; "depth," its profound wisdom; "height," its being beyond the power of enemies to destroy.

that he "descended first," ver. 9; as much as if he had said, When David speaks of Christ's ascension, he intimates the knowledge he had of Christ's humiliation on earth; for when it is said that he ascended, this implies that he first descended, for what is it but a proof or demonstration of his having done so? "Into the lower parts of the earth;" this may refer either to his incarnation, according to that of David, Ps. cxxxix. 15, "My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth;" or to his burial, according to that of Ps. lxxiii. 9, "They that seek my soul to destroy it shall go into the lower parts of the earth." He calls his death (say some of the fathers) his descent into the lower parts of the earth. He descended to the earth in his incarnation. He descended into the earth in his burial. As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so was the Son of man in the heart of the earth. "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens," ver. 10, that is, far above the airy and starry (which are the visible) heavens, into the heaven of heavens, "that he might fill all things," that is, all the members of his church with gifts and graces suitable to their several conditions and stations. Observe, our Lord humbled himself first, and then he was exalted. He descended first, and then ascended.

The apostle next tells us what were Christ's gifts at his ascension: "He gave some apostles," &c., ver. 11. Indeed, he sent forth some of these before his ascension, Mat. x. 1-5. But one was then added, Acts i. 26. And all of them were more solemnly installed, and publicly confirmed in their office, by his visible pouring forth the Holy Ghost in an extraordinary manner and measure upon them. Note, That the great gift that Christ gave to the church at his ascension was that of the ministry of peace and reconciliation. The gift of the ministry is the fruit of Christ's ascension. And ministers have their various gifts, which are all given them by the Lord Jesus.

The officers which Christ gave to his church were of two sorts. Extraordinary ones advanced to a higher office in the church; such were apostles, prophets, and evangelists—the apostles were chief. These Christ immediately called, furnished them with extraordinary gifts, and the power of working miracles, and with infallibility in delivering his truths. And they having been the witnesses of his miracles and doctrine, he sent them forth to spread the Gospel, and to plant and govern churches. The prophets seem to have been such as expounded the writings of the Old Testament, and foretold things to come. The evangelists were ordained persons, 2 Tim. i. 6, whom the apostles took for their companions in travel, Gal. ii. 1, and sent them out to settle and establish such churches as the apostles themselves had planted, Acts xix. 22; and, not being fixed to any particular place, they were to continue till recalled, 2 Tim. iv. 9.

And then there are ordinary ministers employed in a lower and narrower sphere, as pastors and teachers. Some take these two names to signify one office, implying the duties of ruling and teaching belonging to it. Others think they design two distinct offices, both ordinary and of standing use in the church; and then pastors are such as are fixed at the head of particular churches, with a design to guide, instruct, and feed them in the manner appointed by Christ; and they are frequently called bishops and elders. And the teachers were such whose work it was also to preach the Gospel, and to instruct the people by way of exhortation. We see here that it is Christ's prerogative to appoint what officers and offices he pleases in his church. And how rich is the church that had at first such a variety of officers, and hath still such a variety of gifts! How kind is Christ to his church! How careful of it, and of its edification! When he ascended he procured the gift of the Holy Ghost. And the gifts of the Holy Ghost are various; some have greater, others have lesser measures, but all for the good of the body: which brings us to the third argument,

3. Which is taken from Christ's great end and design in giving gifts unto men. The gifts of Christ were intended for the good of his church, and in order to advance his kingdom and interest among men. All these being designed for one common end is a good reason why all Christians should agree in brotherly love, and not envy one another's gifts. All are "for the perfecting of the saints," ver. 12; that is, according to the import of the original, to bring them into an orderly, spiritual state and frame, who had been as it were dislocated and dis-jointed by sin; and then to strengthen, confirm, and advance them therein; that so each in his proper place and function might contribute to the good of the whole. "For the work of the ministry," or, for the work of dispensation; that is, that they might dispense the doctrines of the Gospel, and successfully discharge the several parts of their ministerial function. "For the edifying of the body of Christ," that is, to build up the church, which is Christ's mystical body, by increase of their graces, and an addition of new members; all are designed to prepare us for heaven, "Till we all come," &c., ver. 13. The gifts and offices (some of them) which have been spoken of are to continue in the church till the saints be perfected, which will not be "till they all come in the unity of the faith;" that is, till all true believers meet together, by means of the same precious faith, "and of the knowledge of the Son of God;" by which we are to understand not a bare, speculative knowledge, or acknowledging of Christ to be the Son of God and the great Mediator, but such as is attended with appropriation and affection, with all due honour, trust, and obedience. "Unto a perfect man," to our full growth of gifts and graces, free from those childish infirmities that we are subject to in the present world. "Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," that is, so as to be Christians of a full maturity and ripeness in all the graces derived from Christ's fulness; or, according to the measure of that stature which is to make up the fulness of Christ, which is to complete his mystical body. Now we shall never come to the perfect man till we come to the perfect world. There is a fulness in Christ, and a fulness to be derived from him, and a certain stature of that fulness, and a measure of that stature, assigned in the counsel of God to every believer; and we never come to that measure till we come to heaven. God's children, as long as they are in this world, are in growing. Dr. Lightfoot understands the apostle as speaking here of Jews and Gentiles knit in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God; so making a perfect man, and the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

The apostle farther shews, in the following verses, what was God's design in his sacred institutions, and what effect they ought to have upon us. As, 1st. "That we henceforth be no more children," &c., ver. 14; that is, that we may be no longer children in knowledge, weak in the faith, and inconstant in our judgments; easily yielding to every temptation, readily complying with every one's humour, and being at every one's beck. Children are easily imposed upon; we must take care of that, and of being "tossed to and fro," like ships without ballast, "and carried about," like clouds in the air, with such doctrines as have no truth nor solidity in them, but nevertheless "spread themselves far and wide," and are, therefore, compared to wind. "By the sleight of men;" it is a metaphor taken from gamsters, and signifies the mischievous subtlety of seducers: "and cunning craftiness," by which is meant their skillfulness in finding out ways to seduce and deceive; for it follows, "whereby they lie in wait to deceive," as in an ambush, in order to circumvent the weak, and draw them from the truth. Note, They must be very wicked and ungodly men who set themselves to seduce and deceive others into false doctrines and errors. The apostle describes them here as base men, using a great deal of devilish art and cunning, in order thereunto. And the best method we can take to fortify ourselves against such is to study the sacred oracles, and to pray for the illumination and grace of the Spirit of Christ, that we may know the truth as it is in Jesus, and be established in it.

2d. That we should "speak the truth in love," ver. 15. Or, follow the truth in love; or, be sincere in love, that is, to our fellow Christians. While we adhere to the doctrine of Christ, which is the truth, we should live in love one with another. Love is an excellent thing, but we must be careful to preserve truth together with it. Truth is an excellent thing, yet it is requisite that we speak it in love, and not in contention. These two should go together, truth and peace.

3d. That we should grow up into Christ in all things. Into Christ, so as to be more deeply rooted in him. "In all things;" in knowledge, love, faith, and all the parts of the new man. We should grow up towards maturity, which is opposed to the being children. Those are improving Christians who grow up into Christ. The more we grow in an acquaintance with Christ, faith in him, love to him, dependence upon him, the more we shall flourish in every grace. He is the Head, and we should thus grow, that we may thereby honour our Head. The Christian's growth tends to the glory of Christ.

4th. We should be assisting and helpful one to another, as members of the same body, ver. 16; where the apostle makes a comparison betwixt the natural body and Christ's mystical body, that body of which Christ is the Head. And he observes that, as there must be communion and mutual communications of the members of the body among themselves, in order to their growth and improvement, so there must be mutual love and unity, together with the proper fruits of these, among Christians, in order to their spiritual improvement, and growth in grace. "From whom," says he, that is, from Christ their Head, who conveys influence and nourishment to every particular member, "the whole body" of Christians "fitly joined together and compacted;" that is, being orderly and firmly united among themselves, every one in his proper place and station, "by that which every joint supplieth," by the assistance which every one of the parts thus united gives to the whole; or, by the Spirit, faith, love, sacraments, &c., which (like the veins and arteries in the body) serve to unite Christians to Christ their Head, and to one another as fellow-members. "According to the effectual working in the measure of every part;" that is, say some, according to the power which the Holy Ghost exerts to make God's appointed means effectual for this great end; in such a measure as Christ judges to be sufficient and proper for every member, according to its respective place and office in the body; or, as others, according to the power of Christ, who as Head influenceth and enliveneth every member; or, according to the effectual working of every member, in communicating to others of what it hath received, nourishment is conveyed to all in their proportions, and according to the state and exigence of every part. "Maketh increase of the body;" that is, such an increase as is convenient for the body. Observe, particular Christians receive their gifts and graces from Christ for the sake and benefit of the whole body. "Unto the edifying of itself in love." We may understand this two ways; either, that all the members of the church may attain unto a greater measure of love to Christ and to one another, or that they are moved to act in the manner mentioned from love to Christ and to one another. Observe that mutual love among Christians is a great friend to spiritual growth. It is in love that the body edifies itself; whereas "a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand."

17 This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, 18 Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: 19 Who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. 20 But ye have not so learned Christ; 21 If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus: 22 That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; 23 And be renewed in the spirit of your mind; 24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. 25 Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another. 26 Be ye angry, and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath: 27 Neither give place to the devil. 28 Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth. 29 Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers. 30 And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption. 31 Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice: 32 And be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

The apostle having gone through his exhortation to mutual love, unity, and concord, in the foregoing verses, there follows in these an exhortation to Christian purity and holiness of heart and life; and that both more general, ver. 17—24, and in several particular instances, ver. 25—32. This is solemnly introduced: "This I say, therefore, and testify in the Lord;" that is, seeing the matter is as above described, seeing you are members of Christ's body, and partakers of such gifts, this I urge upon your consciences, and bear witness to as your duty, in the Lord's name, and by virtue of the authority I have derived from him. And then the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life begins thus: "That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk," &c.; that is, that for the time to come you do not live and behave yourselves as ignorant and unconverted heathens do, who are wholly guided by an understanding employed about vain things, (their idols, and their worldly possessions,) things which are no way profitable to their souls, and which will deceive their expectations. Converted Gentiles must not live as unconverted Gentiles do; though they live among them, they must not live like them. Here the apostle takes occasion to describe the wickedness of the Gentile world, out of which regenerate Christians were snatched as brands out of the burning.

First. Their understandings were darkened, ver. 18. They were void of all saving knowledge, yea, ignorant of many things concerning God which the light of nature might have taught them. They sat in darkness, and they loved it rather than light. And by their ignorance they were "alienated from the life of God;" they were estranged from, and had a dislike and an aversion to, a life of holiness, which is not only that way of life which God requires and approves of, and by which we live to him, but which resembles God himself, in his purity, righteousness, truth and goodness. Their wilful ignorance was the cause of their estrangement from this life of God, which begins in light and knowledge. Gross and affected ignorance is destructive to religion and godliness. And what was the cause they were thus ignorant? It was because of the blindness or the hardness of their hearts. It was not because God did not make himself known to them by his works, but because they would not admit the instructive rays of the Divine light. They were ignorant because they would be so. Their ignorance proceeded from their obstinacy and the hardness of their hearts, their resisting the light, and rejecting all the means of illumination and knowledge.

Secondly. Their consciences were debauched and seared: "Who being past feeling," ver. 19. They had no sense of their sin, or of the misery and danger of their case by means of it, whereupon they "gave themselves over unto lasciviousness." They indulged themselves in their filthy lusts, and yielding themselves up to the dominion of these they became the slaves and drudges of sin and the devil "working all uncleanness with greediness." They made it their common practice to commit all sorts of uncleanness, and even the most unnatural and monstrous sins, and that with insatiable desires. Observe. When men's consciences are once seared, there are no bounds to their sins. When they set their hearts upon the gratification of their lusts, what can be expected but the most abominable sensuality and lewdness, and that their horrid enormities will abound?

This was the character of the Gentiles, but these Christians must distinguish themselves from such Gentiles. "Ye have not so learned Christ," ver. 20. It may be read, 'But ye not so;' ye have learned Christ. Those who have learned Christ are saved from that darkness and defilement which others lie under; and as they know more they are obliged to live in a better manner than others. It is a good argument against sin that we have not so learned Christ. Learn Christ! is Christ a book, a lesson, a way, a trade? The meaning is, ye have not so learned Christianity, the doctrines of Christ and the rules of life prescribed by him. Not so as to do as others do. "If so be," or since, "that we have heard him," ver. 21, that is, have heard his doctrine preached by us, "and have been taught by him;" that is, inwardly and effectually by his Spirit. Christ is the lesson, we must learn Christ; and Christ is the teacher, we are taught by him, "as the truth is in Jesus." This may be understood two ways; either, 1. You have been taught the real truth as held forth by Christ himself, both in his doctrine and in his life. Or, 2. Thus the truth has made such an impression on your hearts, in your measure, as it did upon the heart of Jesus. The truth of Christ then appears in his beauty and power when it appears as in Jesus.

Another branch of the general exhortation follows in those words, "That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man," &c., ver. 22—24. This is a great part of the doctrine which has been taught you, and that you have learned. Here the apostle expresses himself in metaphors taken from garments. [Conversation means conduct.] The principles, habits, and dispositions of the soul must be changed before there can be a saving change of the life. There must be sanctification, which consists of these two things:

1st. The old man must be put off. The corrupt nature is called a man, because, like the human body, it consists of divers parts, mutually supporting and strengthening one another. It is the old man, as old as Adam, from whom we derived it; it is bred in the bone, and we brought it into the world with us. It is subtle as an old man; but in all God's saints decaying and withering as an old man, and ready to pass away. It is said to be corrupt,—for sin in the soul is the corruption of its faculties,—and where it is not mortified it grows daily worse and worse, and so tends to destruction. "According to the deceitful lusts." Sinful inclinations and desires are deceitful lusts. They promise men happiness, but render them more miserable, and betray men into destruction if they are not subdued and mortified. These therefore must be put off as an old garment that we would be ashamed to be seen in; that is, they must be subdued and mortified. These lusts prevailed against them in their "former conversation," that is, during the state of unregeneracy and heathenism.

2nd. The new man must be put on. It is not enough to shake off corrupt principles, but we must be actuated by gracious ones. We must embrace them, espouse them, and get them written on our hearts. It is not enough to cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind," ver. 23; that is, use the proper and prescribed means in order to have the mind, which is a spirit, renewed more and more. "And that ye put on the new man," ver. 24. By the new man is meant the new nature, the new creature, which is actuated by a new principle, even regenerating grace, enabling a man to lead a new life, that life of righteousness and holiness which Christianity requires. This new man is created, or produced, out of confusion and emptiness, by God's almighty power, whose workmanship it is, truly excellent and beautiful. After God: in imitation of him, and in conformity to that grand exemplar and pattern. The loss of God's image upon the soul was both the sinfulness and misery of man's fallen state; and that resemblance which it bears to God is the beauty, the glory, and the happiness of the new creature. In righteousness towards men, including all the duties of the second table; and in holiness towards God, signifying a sincere obedience to the commands of the first table; true holiness, in opposition to the outward and ceremonial holiness of the Jews. We are said to put on this new man when, in the use of all God's appointed means, we are endeavouring after this Divine nature, this new creature. This is the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life.

The apostle proceeds to some things more particular, because generals are not so apt to affect; we are told what are those particular limbs of the old man that must be mortified, those filthy rags of the old nature that must be put off, and what the peculiar ornaments of the new man wherewith we should adorn our Christian profession.

First. Take heed of lying, and be ever careful to speak the truth; ver. 25. "Wherefore," &c.; that is, since you have been so well instructed in your duty, and are under such obligations to discharge it, let it appear in your future behaviour and conduct that there is a great and real change wrought in you, particularly by "putting away lying," which sin the heathens were very guilty of, affirming that a profitable lie was better than a hurtful truth; and therefore the apostle exhorts them to cease from lying, that is, from every thing that is contrary to truth. This is a part of the old man that must be put off; and that branch of the new man that must be put on in opposition to it is speaking the truth in all our converse with others. It is the character of God's people that they are children who will not lie, who dare not lie, who hate and abhor lying. All who have grace make conscience of speaking the truth, and would not tell a deliberate lie for the greatest gain and benefit to themselves. The reason here given for veracity is, "We are members of one another." Truth is a debt we owe one another; and if we love one another we shall not deceive nor lie one to another. We belong to the same society or body, which falsehood and lying tend to dissolve, and therefore we should avoid that, and speak truth. Observe. That lying is a very great sin, a peculiar violation of the obligations which Christians are under, and very injurious and hurtful to Christian society.

Secondly. Take heed of anger and ungoverned passions. "Be ye angry, and sin not," ver. 26. This is borrowed from the Septuagint translation of Ps. iv. 4, where we render it, 'Stand in awe, and sin not.' Here is an easy concession, for as such we should consider it, rather than as a command. Be ye angry. This we are apt enough to be, God knows; but we find it difficult enough to observe the restriction, "and sin not." If you have a just occasion to be angry at any time, see that it be without sin, and therefore take heed of excess in your anger. If we would be angry, and not sin, (says one,) we must be angry at nothing but sin. And we should be more jealous for the glory of God than for any interest or reputation of our own. One great and common sin in anger is to suffer it to burn into wrath, and then to let it rest; and therefore we are here cautioned against that. If you have been provoked, and your spirits greatly discomposed, and if you have bitterly resented any affront that has been offered, before night calm and quiet your spirits: be reconciled to the offender, and let all be well again. "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath." If it burn into wrath and bitterness of spirit, O see to it that you suppress it speedily. Observe. Though anger in itself is not sinful, yet there is the utmost danger of its becoming so if it be not carefully watched and speedily suppressed. And therefore, though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, it rests only in the bosom of fools. "Neither give place to the devil," ver. 27. "They who persevere in sinful anger and in wrath let the devil into their hearts, and suffer him to gain upon them, till he bring them to malice, mischievous machinations, &c. Neither give place to the calumniator, or the false accuser, so some read the words; that is, let your ears be deaf to whisperers, talebearers, and slanderers.

Thirdly. We are here warned against the sin of stealing, the breach of the eighth commandment, and advised to honest industry and to beneficence. "Let him that stole steal no more," ver. 28. It is a caution against all manner of wrong-doing by force or fraud. Let those of you who in the time of your Gentilism have been guilty of this enormity be no longer guilty of it. But we must not only take heed of the sin, but conscientiously abound in the opposite duty. Not only take heed of the sin, but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good. Idleness makes thieves, so Chrysostom, το γαρ κλέπτειν ουσίαν βλάπτει,—stealing is the effect of idleness. They who will not work, and who are ashamed to beg, expose themselves greatly to temptations to thievery. Men should therefore be diligent and industrious, not in any unlawful way, but in some honest calling. Working "the thing which is good." Industry in some honest way will keep people out of temptation of doing wrong. But there is another reason why men ought to be industrious, namely, that they may be capable of doing some good, as well as that they may be preserved from temptation. "That he may have to give to him that needeth." They must labour, not only that they may live themselves, and live honestly, but that they may distribute for supplying the wants of others. Observe. Even those who get their living by their labour should be charitable out of their little to those who are disabled for labour. So necessary and incumbent a duty is it to be charitable to the poor, that even labourers and servants, and those who have but little for themselves, must cast their mite into the treasury. God must have his dues, and the poor are his receivers. Observe farther. That those alms that are like to be acceptable to God must not be the produce of unrighteousness and robbery, but of honesty and industry. God hates robbery for burnt offerings.

Fourthly. We are here warned against corrupt communication, and directed to that which is useful and edifying, ver. 29. Filthy and unclean words and discourse are poisonous and infectious as putrid, rotten meat. They proceed from, and prove a great deal of corruption in, the heart of the speaker, and tend to corrupt the minds and manners of others who hear them; and therefore Christians should beware of all such discourse. It may be taken in general for all that which provokes the lusts and passions of others. We must not only put off corrupt communication, but "put on that which is good to the use of edifying." The great use of speech is to edify those with whom we converse. Christians should endeavour to promote an useful conversation, "That it may minister grace unto the hearers;" that is, that it may be good for, and acceptable to, the hearers, either in the way of information, counsel, pertinent reproof, or the like. Observe. It is the great duty of Christians to take care that they offend not with their lips, and that they improve discourse and converse as much as may be for the good of others.

Fifthly. Here is another caution against wrath and anger, and farther advice to mutual love and kindly dispositions towards each other, ver. 31, 32: see upon ver. 31, 32. By bitterness, wrath, and anger, are meant violent inward resentments and displeasure against others; and by clamour, big words, loud threatenings, and other intemperate speeches, by which that bitterness, wrath, and anger do vent themselves. Christians should not entertain these vile passions in their hearts, nor be clamorous with their tongues. Evil speaking signifieth all railing, reviling, and reproachful speeches against such as we are angry with; and by malice we are to understand that rooted anger which prompts men to design and to do mischief to others.

iv. 11. "Resumption of the subject, the diversity of gifts, all bestowed by him as a motive to unity" (Alford).

iv. 12. "For the edifying of the body of Christ:" "building up" better conveys the sense than "edifying."

iv. 13. "True and full unity of faith is found, when all know Christ, the object of faith, alike, and that in his highest dignity as

iv. 15. Not "speaking," but "holding" or "doing the truth in love." "Let us follow the truth in love."

iv. 18. "Life of God:" "Spiritual life in believers is kindled by the very life of God" (Bengel). "Being alienated:" "Having a positive aversion to the very idea of spiritual life" (Webster and

The contrary to all this follows. "Be ye kind one to another;" which implies the principle of love in the heart, and the outward expression of it in an affable, humble, courteous behaviour and carriage. It becomes the disciples of Jesus to be kind one to another, as those who have learned and would teach the art of obliging. "Tender-hearted;" that is, merciful, and having a tender sense of the distresses and sufferings of others, so as to be quickly moved to compassion and pity. "Forgiving one another." Occasions of difference will happen among Christ's disciples, and therefore they must be placable and ready to forgive, therein resembling God himself, who, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them, and that more than they can forgive one another. Note, With God there is forgiveness, and he forgives sin for the sake of Jesus Christ, and on the account of that atonement which he hath made to Divine justice. Note again, That they who are forgiven of God should be of a forgiving spirit; and that they should forgive even as God forgives, sincerely and heartily, readily and cheerfully, universally and for ever, upon the sinner's sincere repentance, as remembering that they pray, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them who trespass against us." Now,

We may observe concerning all these particulars that the apostle has insisted on, that they belong to the second table, from whence Christians should learn the strict obligations they are under to the duties of the second table; and that he who does not conscientiously discharge them can never fear nor love God in truth and in sincerity, whatever he may pretend to. In the midst of these exhortations and cautions the apostle interposes that general one, "And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God," ver. 30. And by looking to what precedes, and to what follows, we may see what it is that grieves the Spirit of God. In the verses before it is intimated that all lewdness and filthiness, lying and corrupt communications that stir up filthy appetites and lusts, grieve the Spirit of God. In what follows it is intimated that those corrupt passions of bitterness and wrath, anger and clamour, evil speaking and malice, do grieve this good Spirit, by which we are not to understand as though that blessed Being could properly be grieved or vexed as we are; but the design of the exhortation is, that we act not towards him in such a manner as is wont to be grievous and disquieting to our fellow-creatures. We must not do that which is contrary to his holy nature and his will; we must not refuse to hearken to his counsels, nor rebel against his government, which things would provoke him to act towards us as men are used to do towards them with whom they are displeased and grieved, withdrawing themselves and their wonted kindness from such, and abandoning them to their enemies. Oh! provoke not the blessed Spirit of God to withdraw his presence and his gracious influences from you! It is a great, good reason why we should not grieve him, because by him "we are sealed unto the day of redemption." There is to be a day of redemption; the body is to be redeemed from the power of the grave at the resurrection day, and then God's people will be delivered from all the effects of sin, as well as from all sin and misery, which they are not till rescued out of the grave, and then their full and complete happiness does commence. All true believers are sealed to that day. God has distinguished them from others, having set his mark upon them; and he gives them the earnest and assurance of a joyful and a glorious resurrection; and the Spirit of God is the seal. Wherever that blessed Spirit is as a sanctifier, he is the earnest of all the joys and glories of the redemption day; and we should be undone should God take away his Holy Spirit from us.

CHAPTER V.

We had several important exhortations in the close of the foregoing chapter, and they are continued in this: particularly, I. We have here an exhortation to mutual love and charity, ver. 1, 2. II. Against all manner of uncleanness, with proper arguments and remedies proposed against such sins; and some farther cautions are added, and other duties recommended, ver. 3—20. III. The apostle directs to the conscientious discharge of relative duties, from ver. 21, throughout this and in the beginning of the next chapter.

Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; 2 And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweetsmelling savour.

Here we have the exhortation to mutual love, or to Christian charity. The apostle had been insisting on this in the former chapter, and particularly in the last verses of it, to which the particle therefore refers, and connects what he had said there with what is contained in these verses; thus, Because God for Christ's sake has forgiven you, therefore be ye followers of God, or imitators of him, for so the word signifies. Pious persons should imitate the God whom they worship as far as he has revealed himself as imitable by them. They must conform themselves to his example, and have his image renewed upon them. This puts a great honour upon practical religion that it is in imitation of God. We must be holy as God is holy, merciful as he is merciful, perfect as he is perfect. But there is no one attribute of God more recommended to our imitation than that of his goodness. Be ye imitators of God, or resemble him in every grace, and especially in his love, and in his pardoning goodness. God is love, and they that dwell in love dwell in God, and God in them. Thus he has proclaimed his name, gracious and merciful, and abundant in goodness. "As children," who are wont to be greatly beloved by their parents, do usually resemble them in the lineaments and features of their faces, and in the dispositions and qualities of their minds; or, as becomes the children of God, who are beloved and cherished by their heavenly Father. Children are obliged to imitate their parents in what is good, especially when dearly beloved by them. The character that we bear of God's children obliges us to resemble him, especially in his love and goodness, in his mercy and readiness to forgive; and they only are God's dear children who do imitate him in these. It follows, "and walk in love," ver. 2. This godlike grace should conduct and influence our whole conversation, which is meant by walking in it. It should be the principle from which we act, it should direct the ends at which we aim. We should be more careful to give proof of the sincerity of our love one to another. "As Christ also hath loved us." Here the apostle directs us to the example of Christ, whom Christians are obliged to imitate, and in whom we have an instance of the most free and generous love that ever was, that great love wherewith he hath loved us. We are all joint sharers in that love, and partakers of the comfort of it, and therefore should love one another—Christ having loved us all, and given such proof of his love to us, for "he hath given himself for us." The apostle designedly enlargeth on the subject, for what may yield us more delightful matter for contemplation than this? Christ gave himself to die for us; and the death of Christ was the great sacrifice of atonement. "An offering and a sacrifice to God;" or, an offering, even a sacrifice; a propitiatory sacrifice to expiate our guilt, which had been prefigured in the legal oblations and sacrifices, and this "for a sweet-smelling savour." Some observe that the sin offerings were never said to be of "a sweet-smelling savour;" but this is said of "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." As he offered himself with a design to be accepted of God, so God did accept, was pleased with, and appeased by that sacrifice. Note, As the sacrifice of Christ was efficacious with God, so his example should be prevailing with us, and we should carefully copy after it.

3 But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; 4 Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks. 5 For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. 6 Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. 7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them. 8 For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light: 9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth;) 10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord. 11 And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. 12 For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. 13 But all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light. 14 Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. 15 See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, 16 Redeeming the time, because the days are evil. 17 Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is. 18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit; 19 Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord; 20 Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

These verses contain a caution against all manner of uncleanness, with proper arguments and remedies proposed; and some farther cautions are added, and other duties recommended. Filthy lusts must be suppressed, in order to the supporting of holy love. Walk in love, and shun fornication and all uncleanness. Fornication is folly committed between unmarried persons. All uncleanness includes all other sorts of filthy lusts, which were too common among the Gentiles. Or covetousness; which being thus connected, and mentioned as a thing which should not be once named, some understand it, in the chaste style of the Scripture, of exorbitant, unnatural lust; while others take it in the more common sense, for an immoderate desire of gain, or an insatiable love of riches, which is spiritual adultery. For by this the soul, which was espoused to God, goes astray from him, and embraceth the bosom of a stranger; and therefore carnal worldlings are called adulterers. Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God?

[Covetousness is here classed with the worst of sins. Where it exists it is

v. 14. "Wherefore?" man must be shone upon by Christ, that he may become light.

one of the most deep-rooted and destructive evils. It becomes a reigning principle in the heart, and is the parent of many other sins. It absorbs the affections of the soul, leaving none in reality for God, and is a dead weight pressing the spiritual part of the man to the earth, and "drawing men into perdition." It wears the garb of prudence, and so easily deceives; and not being generally stigmatized by the world often passes without reproach among even professors of religion, but the apostle couples it with "fornication and all uncleanness."

Now these sins must be dreaded and detested in the highest degree. "Let it not be once named amongst you," that is, never in a way of approbation, and without abhorrence, "as becometh saints," that is, holy persons, who are separated from the world, and dedicated unto God. The apostle not only cautions against the gross acts of sin, but against what some may be apt to make light of, and think to be excusable. "Neither filthiness," ver. 4, by which may be understood all wanton and unseemly gestures and behaviour; "nor foolish talking," that is, obscene and lewd discourse; or more generally such vain discourse as betrays much folly and indiscretion, and is far from edifying the hearers; "nor jesting," the Greek word, εὐτραπελία, is the same which Aristotle, in his Ethics, makes a virtue,—pleasantness of conversation. And there is, no doubt, an innocent and inoffensive jesting, which we cannot suppose the apostle does here forbid. Some understand him of such scurrilous and abusive reflections as tend to expose others, and to make them ridiculous. This is bad enough; but the context seems to restrain it to such pleasantries of discourse as is filthy and obscene, which he may also design by that corrupt, or putrid and rotten, communication that he speaks of, ch. iv. 29. Of these things, he says, they "are not convenient." Indeed there is more than inconvenience, even a great deal of mischief in them. They are so far from being profitable that they pollute and poison the hearers. But the meaning is, those things do not become Christians, and are very unsuitable to their profession and character. Christians are allowed to be cheerful and pleasant; but they must be merry and wise. The apostle adds, "but rather giving of thanks;" so far let the Christian's way of mirth be from that of obscene and profane wit, that he delight his mind, and make himself cheerful, by a grateful remembrance of God's goodness and mercy to him, and by blessing and praising him on the account of these. Note, 1. We should take all occasions to render thanksgivings and praises to God for his kindness and favours to us. 2. A reflection on the grace and goodness of God to us, with a design to excite our thankfulness to him, is proper to refresh and delight the Christian's mind, and to make him cheerful. Dr. Hammond thinks that εὐχαριστία may signify gracious, pious, religious discourse, in the general; by way of opposition to what the apostle condemns. Our cheerfulness, instead of breaking out into what is vain and sinful, and a profanation of God's name, should express itself as becomes Christians, and in what may tend to his glory. If men did abound more in good and pious expressions they would not be so apt to utter ill and unbecoming words; for shall blessing and cursing, lewdness and thanksgivings, proceed out of the same mouth? To fortify us against the sins of uncleanness, &c., the apostle urges several arguments, and prescribes several remedies, in what follows.

First. He urges several arguments. As,

1. Consider that these are sins which shut persons out of heaven; "For this ye know," &c., ver. 5. They knew it, being informed of it by the Christian religion. By a covetous man some understand a lewd, lascivious libertine, who indulges himself in those vile lusts which were accounted the certain marks of a heathen and an idolater. Others understand it in the common acceptance of the word; and such a man is an idolater, because there is spiritual idolatry in the love of this world. As the epicure makes a god of his belly, so the covetous man makes a god of his money, sets those affections upon it, and places that hope, confidence, and delight in worldly good which should be reserved for God only. He serves mammon instead of God. Of these persons it is said that they have no "inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." That may be the kingdom of Christ, who is God; or the kingdom which is God's by nature, and Christ's as he is Mediator,—the kingdom which Christ hath purchased, and which God bestows. Heaven is here described as a kingdom (as frequently elsewhere) with respect to its eminency and glory, its fulness and sufficiency, &c. In this kingdom the saints and servants of God have an inheritance, for it is the inheritance of the saints in light. But those who are impenitent, and allow themselves either in the lusts of the flesh or the love of the world, are not Christians indeed, and so belong not to the kingdom of grace, nor shall they ever come to the kingdom of glory. Let us then be excited to be on our guard against those sins which would exclude and shut us out of heaven.

2. These sins bring the wrath of God upon those who are guilty of them. "Let no man deceive you with vain words," &c., ver. 6. Let none flatter you, as though such things were tolerable, and to be allowed of in Christians; or, as though they were not very provoking and offensive unto God; or, as though you might indulge yourselves in them, and yet escape with impunity. These are vain words. Observe, They who flatter themselves and others with hopes of impunity in sin do but put a cheat upon themselves and others. Thus Satan deceived our first parents "with vain words" when he said to them, "Ye shall not surely die." They are vain words indeed; for those who trust to them will find themselves wretchedly imposed upon, "for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." By children of disobedience may be meant the Gentiles, who disbelieved, and refused to comply with, and to submit themselves to, the Gospel. Or, more generally, all obstinate sinners, who will not be reclaimed, but are given over to disobedience. Disobedience is the very malignity of sin. And it is by an usual Hebraism that such sinners are called children of disobedience; and such indeed they are from their childhood, going astray as soon as they are born. The wrath of God comes upon such, because of their sins, sometimes in this world, but more especially in the next. And dare we make light of that which will lay us under the wrath of God? Oh! no; "be not ye therefore partakers with them," ver. 7. Do not partake with them in their sins, that you may not share in their punishment. We partake with other men in their sins, not only when we live in the same sinful manner that they do, and consent to comply with their temptations and solicitations to sin, but when we encourage them in their sins, prompt them to them, and do not prevent and hinder them, as far as it may be in our power to do so.

3. Consider what obligations Christians are under to live at another guess rate than such sinners do. "For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye," &c., ver. 8. The meaning is, Such courses are very unsuitable to your present condition; for, whereas in your Gentile and your unregenerate state ye were darkness, you have now undergone a great change. The apostle calls their former condition darkness in the abstract, to express the great darkness they were in. They lived wicked and profane lives, being destitute of the light of instruction without, and of the illumination and grace of the blessed Spirit within. Note, A state of sin is a state of darkness. Sinners, like men in the dark, are going they know not whither, and doing they know not what. But the grace of God had produced a mighty change in their souls, "Now are ye light in the Lord," that is, are savingly enlightened by the word and the Spirit of God. Now, that is, upon your believing in Christ, and your receiving the Gospel, "walk as children of light." Children of light, according to the Hebrew dialect, signifies those who are in a state of light, endued with knowledge and holiness. Now being such, let your conversation be suitable to your condition and privileges, and accordingly live up to the obligation you are under by that knowledge and those advantages you enjoy. "Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord," ver. 10; that is, examining and searching diligently what God has revealed to be his will, and making it appear that you approve it by conforming yourselves unto it. Observe, We must not only dread and avoid that which is displeasing unto God, but inquire and consider what will be acceptable to him, searching the Scriptures with this view; thus keeping at the greatest distance from these sins.

Secondly. The apostle prescribes some remedies against them. As, 1. If we would not be entangled by the lusts of the flesh, we must bring forth "the fruits of the Spirit," ver. 9. This is expected from the children of light; that, being illuminated, they be also sanctified by the Spirit, and thereupon bring forth his fruit, which "is in all goodness;" that is, an inclination to do good and to shew mercy, and righteousness, which signifies justice in our dealings. Thus they are taken more strictly. But, more generally, all religion is goodness and righteousness, and in and with these must be truth, that is, sincerity and uprightness of heart.

2. We must have no fellowship with sin, nor sinners, ver. 11. Sinful works are works of darkness. They come from the darkness of ignorance. They keep the darkness of concealment, and they lead to the darkness of hell. These works of darkness are unfruitful works; there is nothing got by them at long run. Whatever profit is pretended by sin, it will by no means balance the loss for they issue in the utter ruin and destruction of the impenitent sinner. We must therefore have no fellowship with these unfruitful works; that is, as we must not practise them ourselves, so we must not countenance others in the practice of them. There are many ways of our being accessory to the sins of others, for example, by commendation, counsel, consent, or concealment. And if we share with others in their sin, we must expect to share with them in their plagues; nay, if we thus have fellowship with them, we shall be in the utmost danger of acting as they do ere long. But, rather than have fellowship with them, we must reprove them; implying that if we do not reprove the sins of others we have fellowship with them. We must prudently, and in our places, witness against the sins of others, and endeavour to convince them of their sinfulness, when we can do it seasonably and pertinently, in our words, but especially by the holiness of our lives, and a religious conversation. Reprove their sins by abounding in the contrary duties. One reason given is, "For it is a shame even to speak of those things," &c., ver. 12. They are so filthy and abominable, that it is a shame to mention them, except in a way of reproof; much more must it be a shame to have any fellowship with them. "The things which are done of them in secret." The apostle seems to speak here of the Gentile idolaters, and of their horrid mysteries, which abounded with detestable wickedness, and which none were permitted to divulge upon pain of death. Observe, A good man is ashamed to speak that which many wicked people are not ashamed to act. But, as far as their wickedness appears, it should be reprov'd by good men. There follows another reason for such reproof: "But all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light," ver. 13; the meaning of which passage may be thus: All those unfruitful works of darkness which you are called upon to reprove are laid open, and made to appear in their proper colours to the sinners themselves, by the light of doctrine, or of God's word, in your mouths, as faithful reprovers; or by that instructive light which is diffused by the holiness of your lives, and by your exemplary walk. Observe, That the light of God's word, and the exemplification of it in a Christian conversation, are proper means to convince sinners of their sin and wickedness. It follows, "For whatsoever doth make manifest is light," that is, it is the light that discovers what was concealed before in darkness. And accordingly it becomes those who are children of light, who are light in the Lord, to discover to others their sins, and to endeavour to convince them of the evil and danger of them, thus shining as lights in the world. The apostle farther urges this duty from the example of God or Christ. "Wherefore he saith," &c., ver. 14, as if he had said, In doing this you will copy after the great God, who hath set himself to awaken sinners from the sleep, and to raise them from the death of sin, that they might receive light from Christ. "He saith:" The Lord is constantly saying, in his word, what is more particularly expressed Isa. lx. 1. Or, Christ, by his ministers, who preach the everlasting Gospel, is continually calling upon sinners to this purpose: "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead." The same thing in the main is designed by these different expressions; and they serve to remind us of the great stupidity, and the wretched security, of sinners; how insensible they are of their danger, and how unapt they naturally are to spiritual motions, sensations, and actions. And when God calls upon them to awake and to arise, his meaning is, that they would break off their sins by repentance, and enter on a course of holy obedience; and he encourages them to essay and to do their utmost that way by that gracious promise, "And Christ shall give thee light;" or, Christ shall enlighten thee, or shall shine upon thee. He shall bring thee into a state of knowledge, holiness, and comfort, assisting thee with his grace, and refreshing thy mind with joy and peace here, and rewarding thee with eternal glory at length. Observe, When we are endeavouring to convince sinners, and to reform them from their sins, we are imitating God and Christ in that which is their great design throughout the Gospel. Some indeed understand this as a call to sinners and to saints: to sinners, to repent and turn; to saints, to stir up themselves to their duty. The former must arise from their spiritual death, and the other must awake from their spiritual deadness.

3. Another remedy against sin is circumspection, care, and caution; ver. 15. "See then," &c. This may be understood either with respect to what immediately precedes, If you are to reprove others for their sins, and would be faithful to your duty in this particular, you must look well to yourselves, and to your own behaviour and conduct, (and indeed they only are fit to reprove others who walk with due circumspection and care themselves); or else, we have here another remedy, or rather preservative, from the before-mentioned sins, and this I take to be the design of the apostle, it being impossible to maintain purity and holiness of heart and life without great circumspection and care. "Walk circumspectly," or, as the word signifies, accurately, exactly, in the right way; in order to which we must be frequently consulting our rule, and the directions we have in the sacred oracles. "Not as fools," who walk at all adventures, and who have no understanding of their duty, nor of the worth of their souls, and through neglect, supineness, and want of care, fall into sin and destroy themselves; "but as wise,"—as persons taught of God, and endued with wisdom from above. Circumspect walking is the effect of true wisdom; but the contrary, of folly. It follows, "redeeming the time," &c., ver. 16; literally, buying the opportunity. It is a metaphor taken from merchants and traders, who diligently observe and improve the seasons for merchandise and trade. It is a great part of Christian wisdom to redeem the time. Good Christians must be good husbands of their time, and take care to improve it to the best purposes, by watching against temptations, by doing good while it is in the power of their hands, by filling it up with proper employment, one special preservative from sin. They should make the best use they can of the present seasons of grace. Our time is a talent given us by God for some good end; and it is mispent and lost when it is not employed according to his design. If we have lost our time heretofore, we must endeavour to redeem it by doubling our diligence in doing our duty for the future. The reason given is, "because the days are evil;" either by reason of the wickedness of those who dwell in them, or rather, as they are troublesome and dangerous times to you who live in them. Those were times of persecution wherein the apostle wrote this. The Christians were in jeopardy every hour. When the days are evil we have one superadded argument to redeem time; especially because we know not how soon they may be worse. People are very apt to complain of bad times; it were well if that would stir them up to redeem time. "Wherefore," says the apostle, ver. 17, that is, because of the badness of the times, "be ye not unwise," that is, ignorant of your duty, and negligent about your souls; "but understanding what the will of the Lord is." Study, consider, and farther acquaint yourselves with the will of God, as determining your duty. Observe, Ignorance of our duty and neglect of our souls are evidences of the greatest folly; while an acquaintance with the will of God, and a care to comply with it, bespeak the best and truest wisdom. In the three following verses the apostle warns against some other particular sins, and urges some other duties.

1st. He warns against the sin of drunkenness; "And be not drunk with wine," ver. 18. This was a sin very frequent among the heathens, and particularly on occasion of the festivals of their gods, and more especially in their Bacchanalia. Then they were wont to inflame themselves with wine, and all manner of inordinate lusts were consequent upon it; and therefore the apostle adds, wherein, or in which drunkenness, is excess. The word deus may signify luxury, or dissoluteness, and it is certain that drunkenness is no friend to chastity and purity of life, but it virtually contains all manner of extravagance, and transports men into gross sensuality and vile enormities. Note, Drunkenness is a sin that seldom goes alone, but often involves men in other instances of guilt. It is a sin very provoking to God, and a great hindrance to the spiritual life. The apostle may design all such intemperance and disorder as are opposite to that sober and prudent demeanour he intends in his advice, to redeem the time.

2nd. Instead of being filled with wine he exhorts them to "be filled with the Spirit." Those who are full of drink are not likely to be full of the Spirit, and therefore this duty is opposed to the former sin. The meaning of the exhortation is, that men should labour for a plentiful measure of the graces of the Spirit, that would fill their souls with holy joy, strength, and courage; which things sensual men expect their wine should inspire them with. We cannot be guilty of any excess in our endeavours after these. Nay, we ought not to be satisfied with a little of the Spirit, but to be aspiring after great measures, so as to be filled with the Spirit. Now by this means we shall come to understand "what the will of the Lord is;" for the Spirit of God is given as a Spirit of wisdom and of understanding. And because those who are filled with the Spirit will be carried out in acts of devotion, and all the proper expressions of it, therefore the apostle exhorts,

3rd. To sing unto the Lord, ver. 19. Drunkards are wont to sing obscene and profane songs. The heathens in their Bacchanals used to sing hymns to Bacchus, whom they called the god of wine. Thus they express their joy; but the Christian's joy should express itself in songs of praise to his God. In these they should speak to themselves in their assemblies and meetings together for mutual edification. By psalms may be meant David's psalms, or such compositions as were fitly sung with musical instruments; by hymns may be meant such others as were confined to matter of praise, as those of Zacharias, Simeon, &c. Spiritual songs may contain a greater variety of matter, doctrinal, prophetic, historical, &c. Observe here, 1. That singing of psalms and hymns is a gospel ordinance; it is an ordinance of God, and appointed for his glory. 2. That though Christianity is an enemy to profane mirth, yet it encourages joy and gladness, and the proper expressions of these in the professors of it. God's people have reason to rejoice and to sing for joy. They are to "sing and to make melody in their hearts," not only with their voices, but with inward affection; and then their doing this will be as delightful and acceptable to God as music used to be to us. And it must be with a design to please him, and to promote his glory, that we do this, and then it will be done to the Lord.

4th. Thanksgiving is another duty that the apostle exhorts to, ver. 20. We are appointed to sing psalms, &c., for the expression of our thankfulness to God; but, though we are not always singing, we should be "always giving thanks," that is, we should never want a disposition for this duty, as we never want matter for it. We must continue it throughout the whole course of our lives; and we should give thanks for all things; not only for spiritual blessings enjoyed and eternal ones expected, for what of the former we have in hand, and for what of the other we have in hope, but for temporal mercies too: not only for our comforts, but also for our sanctified afflictions; not only for what immediately concerns ourselves, but for the instances of God's kindness and favour to others also. It is our duty in every thing to give thanks "unto God and the Father;" to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus-Christ, and our Father in him, in whose name we are to offer up all our prayers and praises, and spiritual services, that they may be acceptable to God.

21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God. 22 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. 23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and he is the saviour of the body. 24 Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing. 25 Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; 26 That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, 27 That he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish. 28 So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself. 29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church: 30 For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones. 31 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. 32 This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church. 33 Nevertheless let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

Here the apostle begins his exhortation to the discharge of relative duties; and, as a general foundation for these duties, he lays down that rule, ver. 21. There is a mutual submission that Christians owe one to another, condescending to bear one another's burthens; not advancing themselves above others, or domineering over one another, and giving laws to one another. St. Paul was an example of this truly Christian temper, who became all things to all men. We must be of a yielding and of a submissive spirit, and ready to all the duties of the respective places and stations that God hath allotted to us in the world. "In the fear of God," that is, so far as is consistent with the fear of God, and for his sake, and out of conscience towards him, and that hereby we may give proof that we truly fear him. Where there is this mutual condescension and submission, the duties of all relations will be the better performed. From ver. 22 to the end he speaks of the duties of husbands and wives; and he speaks of these in a Christian manner, setting the church as an example of the wife's subjection, and Christ as an example of love in husbands.

First. The duty prescribed to wives is, submission to their husbands in the Lord, ver. 22, which submission includes the honouring and the obeying them, and that from a principle of love to them. And they must do this in compliance with God's authority, who has commanded it, which is doing it "as unto the Lord." Or it may be understood by way of similitude and likeness, that the sense may be, as being devoted to God, you submit yourselves unto him. From the former sense we may learn, that by a conscientious discharge of the duties we owe to our fellow-creatures we obey and please God himself; and from the latter, that God not only requires and insists on those duties which immediately respect himself, but such as respect our neighbours too. The apostle assigns the reason of this submission from wives; "For the husband is the head of the wife," ver. 23. The metaphor is taken from the head in the natural body, which, being the seat of reason, of wisdom, and of knowledge, and the fountain of sense and motion, is more excellent than the rest of the body. God has given the man the pre-eminence, and a right to direct and govern by creation, and in that original law of the relation, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." And whatever there is of uneasiness in that it is an effect of sin coming into the world. And generally the man has (what he ought to have) a superiority in wisdom and knowledge. He is therefore the head, "even as Christ is the head of the church." There is a resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, in that superiority and headship which God hath appointed to the husband. The apostle adds, "And he is the Saviour of the body." Christ's authority is exercised over the church for the saving her from evil, and the supplying her with every thing good for her. In like manner should the husband be employed for the protection and comfort of his spouse; and therefore she should the more cheerfully subject herself unto him. So it follows, "Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ," (ver. 24), with cheerfulness, with fidelity, with humility, &c., "so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing, that is, in every thing to which their authority justly extends itself, in every thing lawful and consistent with duty to God.

Secondly. The duty of husbands, on the other hand, is to love their wives, ver. 25; for without this they would abuse their superiority and headship, and wherever this prevails as it ought to do it will infer the other duties of the relation, it being a special and peculiar affection that is required in her behalf. And the love of Christ to the church is proposed as an example of this, which love of his is sincere, a pure, an ardent, and a constant affection, and that notwithstanding the imperfections and failures that she is guilty of. The greatness of his love to the church appeared in his giving himself unto the death for it. Observe, As the church's subjection to Christ is proposed as an exemplar to wives, so the love of Christ to his church is proposed as a pattern to husbands. And while such exemplars are offered to both, and so much required of each, neither has reason to complain of the Divine injunctions. The love which God requires from the husband in behalf of his wife will make an amends for that subjection that he demands from her to her husband. And the prescribed subjection of the wife will be an abundant return for that love of the husband which God hath made her due.

The apostle having mentioned Christ's love to the church, enlarges upon it, assigning the reason why he gave himself for it, namely, that he might sanctify it in this world, and glorify it in the next, ver. 26, 27: "That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water, by the word," ver. 26; that is, that he might cleanse all his members with a principle of holiness, and deliver them from the guilt, the pollution, and the dominion of sin. The instrumental means whereby this is effected are the instituted sacraments, particularly the washing of baptism and the preaching and reception of the Gospel. "And that he might present it to himself," &c. ver. 27. Dr. Lightfoot thinks the apostle alludes here to the Jews' extraordinary great curiousness in their washings for purification. They were careful that there should be no wrinkle to keep the flesh from the water and no spot or dirt which was not thoroughly washed. Others understand him as alluding to a garment come new out of the fuller's hand, purged from spots, stretched from wrinkles; the former newly contracted, the latter by long time and custom. "That he might present it to himself," that is, that he might perfectly unite it to himself in the great day. "A glorious church," that is, perfect in knowledge and in holiness, "not having spot, nor wrinkle, or any such thing," nothing of deformity or defilement remaining, but being entirely amiable and pleasant in his eye, "holy and without blemish," free from the least remains of sin. The church in general, and particular believers, will not be without spot, or wrinkle, till they come to glory. And from this and the former verse together we may take notice that the glorifying of the church is intended in the sanctifying of it; and that those, and those only, who are sanctified now, shall be glorified hereafter. "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies," &c., ver. 28. The wife being made one with her husband, (not in a natural, but in a civil and in a relative sense,) this is an argument why he should love her with as cordial and as ardent an affection as that with which he loves himself. "For no man ever yet hated his own flesh," ver. 29; that is,

vi. 17. "The word of God:" see Isa. lv. 11.

vi. 24. "In sincerity:" rather "in incorruptibility," with spiritual and eternal love. "This only is the word worthy to stand as the crown and climax of this glorious epistle" (Alford).

Additional Notes.—Chap. i.—iii. The following summary is given by Bishop Ellicott:—"The doctrinal portion opens with a brief address to the saints in Ephesus, and rapidly passes into a sublime ascription of praise to God the Father, who has predestinated us to the adoption of sons, blessed and redeemed us in Christ, and made known to us his eternal purpose of uniting all in him (chap. i. 3—14). This not unnaturally evokes a prayer from the apostle that his converts may be enlightened to know the hope of God's calling, the riches of his grace, and the magnitude of that power which was displayed in the resurrection and transcendent exaltation of Christ—the head of his body, the Church (verses 15—23). Then, with a more immediate address to his converts, the apostle reminds them how, dead as they no man in his right senses ever hated himself, however deformed, or whatever his imperfections might be; so far from it, that he "nourisheth and cherisheth it." He uses himself with a great deal of care and tenderness, and is industrious to supply himself with every thing convenient or good for him, with food and clothing, &c., "even as the Lord the church;" as the Lord nourisheth and cherisheth the church, which he furnishes with all things that he sees needful or good for her, with whatever conduces to her everlasting happiness and welfare. The apostle adds, "For we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones," ver. 30. He assigns this as a reason why Christ does nourish and cherish his church, because all that belong to it "are members of his body," &c., that is, of his mystical body. Or, we are members out of his body. All that grace and glory which the church has is from Christ; as Eve was taken out of the man. But (as one observes) it being the manner of the sacred writings to express a complex body by the enumeration of the several parts of it, as the heaven and earth for the world, evening and morning for the natural day, &c., so here, by body, flesh, and bones, we are to understand himself, the meaning of the verse being that we are members of Christ. "For this cause," &c., ver. 31, (because they are one, as Christ and his church are one,) "shall a man leave his father and mother." The apostle refers to the words of Adam, when Eve was given to him for a meet help, Gen. ii. 24. We are not to understand by them as though a man's obligation to other relations were cancelled upon his marriage; but only that this relation is to be preferred to all others, there being a nearer union betwixt these two than betwixt any others; that the man must rather leave any of those than his wife. "And they two shall be one flesh," that is, by virtue of the matrimonial bond. "This is a great mystery," ver. 32. Those words of Adam, just mentioned by the apostle, are spoken literally of marriage; but they have also a hidden, mystical sense in them, relating to the union betwixt Christ and his church, of which the conjugal union betwixt Adam and the mother of us all was a type; though not instituted or appointed by God to signify this, yet it was a kind of natural type, as having a resemblance to it: "I speak concerning Christ and the church."

After this the apostle concludes this part of his discourse with a brief summary of the duty of husbands and wives; ver. 33, "Nevertheless," as if he had said, But though there be such a secret, mystical sense, yet the plain, literal sense concerns you. "Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself," that is, with such a sincere, peculiar, singular, and prevailing affection as that which he bears to himself; "and the wife see that she reverence her husband." Reverence consists of love and esteem, which produce a care to please; and of fear, which awakens a caution lest just offence be given; and that the wife thus reverence her husband is the will of God, and the law of the relation.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter, I. The apostle proceeds in the exhortation to relative duties which he began in the former; particularly he insists on the duties of children and parents, and of servants and masters. ver. 1—9. II. He exhorts and directs Christians how to behave themselves in the spiritual warfare with the enemies of their souls; and to the exercise of several Christian graces, which he proposes to them as so many pieces of spiritual armour, to preserve and defend them in the conflict, ver. 10—18. III. We have here the conclusion of the epistle, in which he takes his leave of them, recommending himself to the prayers of the believing Ephesians, and praying for them, ver. 19—24.

CHILDREN, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. 2 Honour thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise; 3 That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth. 4 And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. 5 Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ; 6 Not with eyeservice, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; 7 With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: 8 Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. 9 And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

Here we have farther directions concerning relative duties, in which the apostle is very particular.

First. The duty of children to their parents; "Come, ye children, hearken to me, I will teach you the fear of the Lord." The great duty of children is to obey their parents, ver. 1. Parents being the instruments of their being, God and nature have given them an authority to command, in subserviency to God. And if children will be obedient to their pious parents, they will be in a fair way to be pious as they are. And that obedience which God demands from their children, in their behalf, includes an inward reverence, as well as the outward expressions and acts: Obey "in the Lord." Some take this as a limitation, and understand it thus, as far as is consistent with your duty to God. We must not disobey our heavenly Father in obedience to earthly parents, for our obligation to God is prior and superior to all others. I take it rather as a reason: Children, obey your parents, for the Lord hath commanded it. Obey them, therefore, for the Lord's sake, and with an eye to him. Or, it may be a particular specification of the general duty. Obey your parents, especially in those things which relate to the Lord. Your parents teach you good manners, and therein you must obey them. They teach you what is for your health, and in that you must obey them; but the chief things in which you are to do it are the things pertaining to the Lord. Religious parents charge their children to keep the ways of the Lord, Gen. xviii. 19. They command them to be found in the way of their duty towards God, and to take heed of those sins that their age is incident to; and in those things especially they must see that they be obedient. There is a general reason given; "For this is right," that is, there is a natural equity in it, and God hath enjoined it; and it highly becomes Christians. It is the order of nature that parents command and children obey. Though this may seem a hard saying, yet it is duty, and it must be done by such as would please God and approve themselves to him. For the proof of this, the apostle quotes the law of the fifth commandment, (which Christ was so far from designing to abrogate and repeal, that he came to confirm it, as appears by his vindicating it, Mat. xv. 4, &c.): "Honour thy father and mother," ver. 2, which honour implies reverence, obedience, and relief and maintenance, if these be needed. The apostle adds, "which is the first commandment with promise." Some little difficulty ariseth from this, which we should not overlook; because some who plead for the lawfulness of images bring this as a proof, that we are not obliged by the second commandment. But there is no manner of force in the argument. The second commandment hath not a particular promise, but only a general declaration, or assertion, which relates to the whole law, of God's keeping mercy for thousands. And then by this is not meant the first commandment of the decalogue that has a promise, for there is no other after it that has, and therefore it would be improper to say it is the first; but the meaning may be this, this is a prime or chief commandment, and it has a promise, and is the first commandment in the second table, and it hath a promise, and the promise is, "That it may be well with thee," &c., ver. 3. Observe, That whereas the promise in the commandment hath reference to the land of Canaan, the apostle hereby shews that that and other promises which we have in the Old Testament, relating to the land of Canaan, are to be understood more generally. That you may not think that the Jews only, to whom God gave the land of Canaan, were bound by the fifth commandment, he here gives it a farther sense, "That it may be well with thee," &c. Outward prosperity and long life are blessings promised to those who keep this commandment. "This is the way to have it well with us." And obedient children are often rewarded with outward prosperity. Not indeed, that it is always so; there are instances of such children who meet with much affliction in this life, but ordinarily it is thus rewarded, and where it is not it is made up with something better. Observe, 1. The Gospel has its temporal promises as well as spiritual ones. 2. Although the authority of God be sufficient to engage us in our duty, yet we are allowed to have respect to the promised reward. And, 3. Though it contain some temporal advantage, even that may be considered as a motive and encouragement to our obedience.

Secondly. The duty of parents; "And ye, fathers," ver. 4, or, ye parents, 1. Do not provoke your children to wrath. Though God has given you power, you must not abuse that power, remembering that your children are in a particular manner pieces of yourselves, and therefore ought to be governed with great tenderness and love. Be not impatient with them, use no unreasonable severities, and lay no rigid injunctions upon them. When you caution them, when you counsel them, when you reprove them, do it in such a manner as not to provoke them to wrath. In all such cases deal prudently and wisely with them, endeavouring to convince their judgments and to work upon their reason. 2. "Bring them up" well, "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" in the discipline of proper and of compassionate correction, and in the knowledge of that duty which God requires of them, and by which they may become better acquainted with him. Give them a good education; it is the great duty of parents to be careful in the education of their children. Not only bring them up as the brutes do, taking care to provide for them, but bring them up in nurture and admonition, in such a manner as is suitable to their reasonable natures. Nay, not only bring them up as men, in nurture and admonition, but as Christians, in the admonition of the Lord. Let them have a religious education; instruct them to fear sinning, and inform them of, and excite them to, the whole of their duty towards God.

Thirdly. The duty of servants; and that also is summed up in one word, which is, obedience. He is largest on this article, as knowing there was the greatest need of it. These servants were generally slaves; civil servitude is not inconsistent with Christian liberty; they may be the Lord's freemen who are slaves to men. "Your masters according to the flesh," ver. 5, that is, who have the command of your bodies, but not of your souls and consciences; God alone has dominion over these. Now with respect to servants he exhorts, 1. That they obey "with fear and trembling." They are to reverence those who are over them, fearing to displease them, and trembling lest they should justly incur their anger and indignation. 2. That they be sincere in their obedience. "In singleness of heart," not dissembling obedience when they design disobedience, but serving them with faithfulness. 3. They should have an eye to Jesus Christ in all the service that they perform to their masters, ver. 5—7. "Doing service as to the Lord, and not to men," that is, not to men only, or principally. When servants, in the discharge of the duty of their places, have an eye to Christ, this puts an honour upon their obedience, and an acceptableness into it. Service done to their earthly masters, with an eye to him, becomes acceptable service to him also. To have an eye to Christ is to remember that he sees them, and is ever present with them, and that his authority obliges them to a faithful and conscientious discharge of the duties of their station. 4. They must not serve their masters "with eyeservice," ver. 6. Not only when their masters' eye is upon them, but they must be as conscientious in the discharge of their duty when they are absent and out of the way, because then their Master in heaven beholds them; and therefore they must not act "as men-pleasers," as though they had no regard to the pleasing of God and approving themselves to him, if they can impose on their masters. Observe, A steady regard to the Lord Jesus Christ will make men faithful and sincere in every station of life. 5. What they do they must do cheerfully. "Doing the will of God from the heart;" serving their masters, as God wills they should, not grudgingly, or by constraint, but from a principle of love to them and their concerns. This is doing it with good-will, ver. 7, which will make their service easy to themselves, pleasing to their masters, and acceptable to the Lord Christ. There should be good-will to their masters, good-will to the families they are in, and especially a readiness to do their duty to God. Observe, Service performed with conscience, and from a regard to God, though it be to unrighteous masters, will be accounted by Christ as service done to himself. 6. Let faithful servants trust God for their wages, while they do their duty in his fear. "Knowing that whatsoever good things," ver. 8, how poor and mean soever it may be, considered in itself, "the same shall he receive of the Lord:" that is, the reward of the same, by a metonymy.

had been in sin, God had quickened them, raised them, and even enthroned them with Christ, and how all was by grace, not by works (chap. ii. 1—10). They were to remember, too, how they had once been alienated and yet were now brought nigh in the blood of Christ; how he was their peace; how by him both they and the Jews had access to the Father, and how on him, as the corner-stone, they had been built into a spiritual temple to God (verses 11—22). On this account, having heard, as they must have done, how to the apostle was revealed the profound mystery of this call of the Gentile world, they were not to faint at his troubles (chap. iii. 1—13). Nay, he prayed to the great Father of all to give them inward strength, to teach them with the love of Christ, and fill them with the fulness of God (verses 13—19). The prayer is concluded by a sublime doxology (verse 20, 21), which serves to usher in the more directly practical portion."

I. 10. "To have it declared when the time was full come, that all

Though his master on earth should neglect or abuse him, instead of rewarding him, he shall certainly be rewarded by the Lord Christ; "whether he be bond or free," whether he be a poor bond-servant, or a freeman, or master. Christ regards not these differences of men at present, nor will he in the great and final judgment. You think a prince, or a magistrate, or a minister, that does his duty here will be sure to receive his reward in heaven; but what capacity am I, a poor servant, in of recommending myself to the favour of God? Why God will as certainly reward thee for the meanest drudgery that is done from a sense of duty, and with an eye to himself. And what can be said more proper both to engage and to encourage servants to their duty?

Fourthly. The duty of masters. "And ye masters do the same things unto them," ver. 9, that is, act after the same manner. Be just to them, as you expect they should be to you; shew the like good-will and concern for them, and be careful herein to approve yourselves to God. Observe, Masters are under as strict obligations to discharge their duty to their servants as those which lie upon servants to be obedient and dutiful to them; "Forbearing threatening," ἀνέχεσθαι, moderating threatening, and remitting the evils which you threaten them with. Remember that your servants are made of the same mould with yourselves, and therefore be not tyrannical or imperious over them. "Knowing that your Master also is in heaven." Some copies read, "both your and their master;" you have a master to obey, who makes this your duty, and you and they are but fellow-servants in respect of Christ; that you will be as punishable by him, for the neglect of your duty, or for acting contrary to it, as any others of meaner condition in the world. You are therefore to shew favour to others, as ever you expect to find favour with him, and you will never be a match for him, though you may be too hard for your servants. "Neither is there respect of persons with him;" a rich, a wealthy, and a dignified master, if he be unjust, imperious, and abusive, is not a jot the nearer being accepted of God for his riches, wealth, and honour. He will call masters and servants to an impartial account for their carriage one to another; and will neither spare the one because they are more advanced, nor be severe towards the other because they are inferior and mean in the world. If masters and servants would both consider their relation and obligation to God, and the account they must shortly give to him, they would be more careful of their duty to each other. Thus the apostle concludes his exhortation to relative duties.

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. 11 Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. 12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. 13 Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. 14 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; 15 And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; 16 Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. 17 And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God: 18 Praying always with all prayer things," &c. (Tyndal). "That it should be dispensed in the fulness of times" (Conybeare). "Gather together in one;" literally, "unite under one head."

i. 12. "We who first trusted (or before hoped) in the Christ;" i.e., the Jewish-Christians, who before Christ came looked forward, waiting for the consolation of Israel. "We" here particularises from amongst "us" in verse 3, where all Christians are meant.

iv. —vi. "The apostle commences the more directly practical por-and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints;

Here is a general exhortation to constancy in our Christian course, and to courage in our Christian warfare. Is not our life a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the common calamities of human life. Is not our religion much more a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the opposition of the powers of darkness, and with many enemies who would keep us from God and heaven. We have enemies to fight against, a Captain to fight for, a banner to fight under, and certain rules of war by which we are to govern ourselves. "Finally, my brethren," ver. 10; as if he had said, There yet remains that you apply yourselves to your work and duty, as Christian soldiers. Now it is requisite that a soldier should have a good heart, and that he be well armed. If Christians be soldiers of Jesus Christ,

First. They must see that they have a good heart on it. This is prescribed here; "Be strong in the Lord," &c. Those who have so many battles to fight, and who in their way to heaven must dispute every step, like a pass, with dint of sword, have need of a great deal of courage. "Be strong, therefore," strong for service, strong for suffering, strong for fighting. Let a soldier be never so well armed without, if he have not within a good heart his armour will stand him in little stead. Note, Spiritual strength and courage are very necessary for our spiritual warfare. Be strong in the Lord; either in his cause and for his sake, or, rather, in his strength. We have no sufficient strength of our own. Our natural courage is as perfect cowardice, and our natural strength as perfect weakness; but all our sufficiency is of God. In his strength we must go forth and go on. By the actings of faith we must fetch in grace and help from heaven, to enable us to do that which of ourselves we cannot do, in our Christian work and warfare. We should stir up ourselves to resist temptations in a reliance upon God's all-sufficiency and the omnipotence of his might.

Secondly. They must be well armed. "Put on the whole armour of God," ver. 11; that is, make use of all the proper defensives and weapons for repelling the temptations and stratagems of Satan; for example, get and exercise all the Christian graces, the whole armour, that no part be naked and exposed to the enemy. Observe, That they who would approve themselves to have true grace must aim at all grace, "the whole armour." It is called the armour of God, because he both prepares and bestows it. We have no armour of our own that will be armour of proof in a trying time; nothing will stand us in stead but the armour of God. This armour is prepared for us, but we must put it on, that is, we must pray for grace; we must use the grace given us, and draw it out into act and exercise, as there is occasion. The reason assigned why the Christian should be completely armed is, "that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil" that is, that ye may be able to hold out, and to overcome, notwithstanding all his assaults both of force and fraud, all the deceits he puts upon us, all the snares he lays for us, and all his machinations against us. This the apostle enlarges upon here, and shews,

1. What our danger is, and what need we have to put on this whole armour, considering what sort of enemies we have to deal with, the devil and all the powers of darkness. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood," &c., ver. 12. The combat for which we are to be prepared is not against ordinary human enemies, not barely with men compounded of flesh and blood, nor against our own corrupt natures singly considered, but against the several ranks of devils who have a government which they exercise in this world. We have to do, 1st. With a subtle enemy; an enemy that uses wiles and stratagems, as ver. 11. He has a thousand ways of beguiling unstable souls; hence he is called a serpent for subtlety, an old serpent, experienced in the art and trade of tempting. 2nd. He is a powerful enemy. Principalities, and powers, and rulers; they are numerous, they are vigorous, and rule in those heathen nations which are yet in darkness. The dark parts of the world are the seat of Satan's empire; yea, they are usurping princes over all men who are yet in a state of sin and ignorance. Satan's is a kingdom of darkness, whereas Christ's is a kingdom of light. 3rd. They are spiritual enemies. "Spiritual wickedness in high places;" or, wicked spirits, so some translate it. The devil is a spirit, a wicked spirit; and our danger is the greater from our enemies because they are unseen, and assault us ere we are aware of them. The devils are wicked spirits, and they do chiefly annoy the saints with, and provoke them to, spiritual wickednesses, pride, envy, malice, &c. These enemies are said to be in high places, or in heavenly places, so the word is; taking heaven, as one says, for the whole expansum, or spreading out of the air, betwixt the earth and the stars, the air being the place from which the devils assault us. Or, the meaning may be, We wrestle about heavenly places or heavenly things; so some of the ancients interpret it. Our enemies strive to prevent our ascent to heaven, to deprive us of heavenly blessings, and to obstruct our communion with heaven. They assault us in the things that belong to our souls, and labour to deface the heavenly image in our hearts; and therefore we have need to be upon our guard against them. We have need of faith in our Christian warfare, because we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, as well as of faith in our Christian work, because we have spiritual strength to fetch in. Thus you see your danger.

2. What our duty is, namely, to take and put on the whole armour of God, and then to stand our ground, and withstand our enemies. 1st. We must withstand, ver. 13. We must not yield to the devil's allurements and assaults, but oppose them. Satan is said to stand up against us, 1 Chr. xxi. 1. If he stand up against us, we must stand up against him; set up, and keep up, an interest in opposition to the devil. Satan is the wicked one, and his kingdom is the kingdom of sin; to stand against Satan is to strive against sin. "That ye may be able to withstand in the evil day," that is, in the time of temptation, or of any sore affliction. 2nd. We must stand our ground. "And having done all, to stand." [The term is military; Gurnall observes, that it implies in it 'firmness, order, and watchfulness.'] We must resolve, by God's grace, not to yield to Satan. Resist him, and he will flee; if we give back, he will get ground. If we distrust either our cause, or our leader, or our armour, we give him advantage. Our present business is to withstand the assaults of the devil, and to stand it out, and then, having done all that is incumbent on the good soldiers of Jesus Christ, our warfare will be accomplished, and we shall be finally victorious. 3rd. We must stand armed; and this is here most enlarged upon. [The figure here used must have been familiar to the apostle and the Christian converts, for the Roman armed soldiers were scattered everywhere through and about the empire.] Here is a Christian in complete armour, and the armour is Divine; "armour of God;" "armour of light," Rom. xiii. 12; "armour of righteousness," 2 Cor. vi. 7. The apostle instances the particulars of this armour, both offensive and defensive. Here is the military girdle or belt, the breastplate, the greaves or soldier's shoes, the shield, the helmet, and the sword. It is observable, among them all there is none for the back; if we turn our back upon the enemy we lie exposed.

First. Truth, or sincerity, is our girdle, ver. 14. [The military girdle, besides being an ornament, was a great strengthener of the loins, and a material covering for the joints of the armour.] It was prophesied of Christ, Isa. xi. 5, tion by entreating them to walk worthy of their calling, and to keep the unity of the Spirit. There was but one body, one Spirit, one Lord, and one God (chap. iv. 1-6). Each, too, had his portion of grace from God (verses 7-10), who had appointed ministering orders in the Church, until all come to the unity of the faith, and grow up and become united with the living Head, even Christ (verses 11-16). Surely, then, they were to walk no longer as darkened, feelingless heathen; they were to put off the old man and put on that "righteousness should be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins." That which Christ was girt with all Christians must be girt with. God desireth truth, that is, sincerity, in the inward parts. This is the strength of our loins, and it girds on all the other pieces of our armour, and therefore is first mentioned. I know no religion without sincerity. Some understand it of the doctrine and the truths of the Gospel; they should cleave to us, as the girdle does to the loins, Jer. xlii. 11. This will restrain from all libertinism and licentiousness, as a girdle restrains and keeps in the body. This is the Christian soldier's belt; ungirt with this he is unblest.

Secondly. Righteousness must be our breastplate. The breastplate secures the vitals, shelters the heart. The righteousness of Christ imputed to us is our breastplate against the arrows of Divine wrath; the righteousness of Christ implanted in us is our breastplate to fortify the heart against the attacks which Satan makes against us. The apostle explains this in 1 The. v. 8. "Putting on the breastplate of faith and love." Faith and love include all Christian graces; for by faith we are united to Christ, and by love to our brethren. These will infer a diligent observance of our duty to God, and a righteous deportment towards men, in all the offices of justice, truth, and charity.

Thirdly. Resolution must be as the greaves to our legs. "And their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace," ver. 15. Shoes, or greaves of brass, or the like, were formerly part of the military armour, 1 Sam. xvii. 6; and the use of them was to defend their feet against the gall-traps and sharp sticks which were wont to be laid privily in the way, to obstruct the marching of the enemy, they who fell upon them being unfit to march. "The preparation of the Gospel of peace" signifies a prepared and resolved frame of heart to adhere to the Gospel and abide by it, which will enable us to walk with a steady pace in the way of religion, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers that may be in it. It is styled "the Gospel of peace," because it brings all sorts of peace, peace with God, with ourselves, and with one another. It may also be meant of that which prepares for the entertainment of the Gospel, and that is repentance. With this our feet must be shod; for by living a life of repentance we are armed against temptations to sin and the designs of our great enemy. Dr. Whitby thinks this may be the sense of the word: that ye may be ready for the combat, be ye shod with the Gospel of peace; that is, endeavour after that peaceable and quiet mind the Gospel calls for. Be not easily provoked, or prone to quarrel; but shew all gentleness and all long-suffering to all men, and this will as certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions as did those shoes of brass the soldiers from those gall-traps, &c.

Fourthly. Faith must be our shield. "Above all," or chiefly, "taking the shield of faith," ver. 16. This is more necessary than any of them. Faith is all in all to us in an hour of temptation. The breastplate secures the vitals, but with the shield we turn every way. This is the victory over the world, even our faith. We are to be fully persuaded of the truth of all God's promises and threatenings, such a faith being of great use against temptations. Consider faith as it is the evidence of things not seen, and the substance of things hoped for, and it will appear to be of admirable use for this purpose. And faith as receiving Christ and the benefits of redemption, so deriving grace from him, is like a shield, a sort of universal defence. Our enemy the devil is here called the wicked one; he is wicked himself, and he endeavours to make us wicked. His temptations are called darts, because of their swift and undiscerned flight, and the deep wounds that they give to the soul; "fiery darts," by way of allusion to the poisonous darts which were wont to inflame the parts which were wounded with them, and therefore were so called, as the serpents with poisonous stings are called fiery serpents. [These darts are said to be quenched; hence the allusion is rather to the fiery darts, which conveyed flaming combustibles, being shot slowly against the enemy, who often received the fire-bearing arrows on their metal-covered shields, or shields of wetted hides, by which means they were easily extinguished, but if not so received they gained strength, and did considerable damage.] Violent temptations, by which the soul is set on fire of hell, are the darts which Satan shoots at us; faith is the shield with which we must quench these fiery darts, wherein we should receive them, and so render them ineffectual, that they may not hit us, or at least they may not hurt us. Observe, Faith acted upon the word of God, and applying that, acted upon the grace of Christ, and improving that, quenches the darts of temptation.

Fifthly. Salvation must be our helmet, ver. 17; that is, hope, which has salvation for its object: so 1 The. v. 8. The helmet secures the head. A good hope of salvation, well founded and well built, will both purify the soul and keep it from being defiled by Satan; and it will comfort the soul, and keep it from being troubled and tormented by Satan. He would tempt us to despair, but good hope keeps us trusting in God, and rejoicing in him.

Sixthly. The word of God is "the sword of the Spirit." The sword is a very necessary and useful part of a soldier's furniture. [The ancient sword was short and two-edged.] The word of God is very necessary and of great use to the Christian, in order to his maintaining, and his succeeding in, the spiritual warfare. It is called "the sword of the Spirit," because it is of the Spirit's inditing, and he renders it efficacious and powerful, and "sharper than a two-edged sword," like Goliath's sword, none like that. With this we assault the assailants. Scripture arguments are the most powerful arguments to repel a temptation with. Christ himself resisted Satan's temptations with, "It is written," Mat. iv. 4. "This being hid in the heart will preserve from sin," Ps. cxix. 11, and will mortify and kill those lusts and corruptions that are latent there.

Seventhly. Prayer must buckle on all the other parts of our Christian armour, ver. 18. We must join prayer with all these graces for our defence against these spiritual enemies, imploring help and assistance of God, as the case requires. And we must pray always; not as though we were to do nothing else but pray, for there are other duties of religion, and of our respective stations in the world, that are to be done in their place and season, but we should keep up constant times of prayer, and be constant to them. We must pray upon all occasions, and as often as our own and others' necessities call us to it. We must always keep up a disposition to prayer, and should intermix ejaculatory prayers with other duties, and with common business. Though set and solemn prayer may sometimes be unreasonable, as when other duties are to be done, yet pious ejaculations can never be so. We must pray "with all prayer and supplication," with all kinds of prayer, public, private, and secret, social and solitary, solemn and sudden; with all the parts of prayer, confession of sin, petition for mercy, and thanksgivings for favours received. We must pray in the spirit, that is, our spirits must be employed in the duty, and we must do it by the grace of God's good Spirit. We must watch thereunto, endeavouring to keep our hearts in a praying frame, and taking all occasions, and improving all opportunities, for the duty; watch to all the motions of our own hearts towards the duty. When God saith, "Seek ye my face," our hearts must comply, Ps. xlvii. 8. This we must do "with all perseverance." We must abide by the duty of prayer whatever change there may be in our outward circumstances, and we must continue in it as long as we live in the world. We must persevere in a particular prayer, not cutting it short, when our hearts are disposed to enlarge, and there is time for it, and our occasions call for it. We must likewise persevere in particular requests, notwithstanding some present discouragement and repulses. And we must pray with supplication, not for ourselves only, but for all saints, for we are members one of another. Observe, None are so much saints, and in so good a condition in this world, but they need our prayers, and they ought to have them. Now from hence the apostle passeth to the conclusion of the epistle.

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel, 20 For which I am an ambassador in bonds; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak. 21 But that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things: 22 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts. 23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. 24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen.

Here, First. He desires their prayers for him, ver. 19. Having mentioned "supplication for all saints," he puts himself into the number. We must pray for all saints, and particularly for God's faithful ministers. Brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may run and be glorified. Observe, What it is he would have them pray for in his behalf. "That utterance may be given unto me;" that I may be enlarged from my present restraints, and so have liberty to propagate the faith of Christ, and that I may have ability to express myself in a suitable and becoming manner. "And that I may open my mouth boldly;" that is, that I may deliver the whole counsel of God without any base fear, shame, or partiality. "To make known the mystery of the Gospel;" some understand it of that part of the Gospel which concerns the calling of the Gentiles, that had hitherto, as a mystery, been concealed; but the whole Gospel was a mystery till made known by Divine revelation, and it is the work of Christ's ministers to publish it. Observe, St. Paul had a great command of language, (they called him Mercurius, because he was "the chief speaker," Acts xiv. 12.) and yet he would have his friends ask of God the gift of utterance for him. He was a man of great courage, and often signalized himself for it, yet he would have them pray that God would give him boldness. He knew as well what to say as any man, yet he desires them to pray for him, that he may "speak as he ought to speak." The argument with which he enforces his request is, that for the sake of the Gospel he was "an ambassador in bonds," ver. 20. He was persecuted and imprisoned for preaching the Gospel, though, notwithstanding, he continued in the embassy committed to him by Christ, and persisted in preaching it. Observe, 1. It is no new thing for Christ's ministers to be in bonds. 2. It is a hard thing for them to speak boldly when that is their case. And, 3. The best and most eminent ministers have need of, and may receive advantage by, the prayers of good Christians, and therefore should earnestly desire them. Having thus desired their prayers, Secondly. He recommends Tychicus unto them, ver. 21, 22. He sent him with this epistle, that he might acquaint them with what other churches were informed of, namely, how he did, and what he did; how he was used by the Romans in his bonds, and how he behaved himself in his present circumstances. It is desirable to good ministers both that their Christian friends should know their state, and likewise to be acquainted with the condition of their friends, for by this means they may the better help each other in their prayers. "And that he might comfort their hearts;" by giving such an account of his sufferings, of the cause of them, and of the temper of his mind, and his behaviour under them, as might prevent their fainting at his tribulations, and even minister matter of joy and thanksgiving unto them. He tells them that Tychicus was "a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord." He was a sincere Christian, and so a brother in Christ; he was a faithful minister in the work of Christ; and he was very dear to St. Paul, which makes his love to these Christian Ephesians the more observable, in that he should now part with so good and dear a friend for their sakes, when his company and conversation must have been peculiarly delightful and serviceable to himself. But the faithful servants of Jesus Christ are wont to prefer a public good to their own private or personal interests.

Thirdly. He concludes with his good wishes and prayers for them, and not for them only, but for all the brethren, ver. 23, 24. His usual benediction was, "Grace and peace;" here it is, "Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith." By peace we are to understand all manner of peace,—peace with God, peace with conscience, peace among themselves; and all outward prosperity is included in the word, as if he had said, I wish the continuance and increase of all happiness to you. "And love with faith." This in part explains what he means in the following verse by grace; not only grace in the fountain, or the love and favour of God, but grace in the streams, that is, the grace of the Spirit flowing from that Divine principle, faith and love including all the rest. And it is the continuance and increase of these that he desires for them, in whom they were already begun. It follows, "From God the Father," &c. All grace and blessings are derived to the saints from God, through the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ our Lord.

The closing benediction is more extensive than the former, for in this he prays for all true believers at Ephesus, and everywhere else. It is the undoubted character of all the saints that they love our Lord Jesus Christ. Our love to Christ is not acceptable unless it be in sincerity; indeed, there is no such thing as love to Christ, whatever men may pretend, where there is not sincerity. The words may be read, Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption; that is, who continue constant in their love to him, so as not to be corrupted out of it by any baits or seductions whatsoever, and whose love to him is uncorrupted by any opposite lust, or the love of any thing displeasing to him. Grace, that is, the favour of God, and all good, spiritual and temporal, that is the product of it, is, and shall be, with all them who thus love our Lord Jesus Christ. And it is, or ought to be, the desire and prayer of every lover of Christ that it may be so with all his fellow Christians. "Amen," so be it.

the new (verses 17—24). This, too, was to be practically evinced in their outward actions—they were to be truthful, gentle, honest, pure, and forgiving; they were to walk in love (chap. iv. 25—v. 2). Fornication, covetousness, and impurity were not even to be named; they were once in heathen darkness, now they are light, and must reprove the deeds of the past (chap. v. 3—14). Thus they were to walk exactly, to be filled with joy, to sing, and to give thanks (verses 15—21). Wives were to be subject to their husbands, husbands to love and cleave to their wives (verses 22—33); children to honour their parents, parents to bring up holly their children (chap. vi. 1—4); servants and masters were to perform to each other their reciprocal duties (verses 5—9). With a noble and vivid exhortation to arm themselves against their spiritual foes with the armour of God (verses 10—20), a brief notice of the coming of Tychicus (verses 21, 22), and a twofold doxology (verses 23, 24), this sublime epistle comes to its close" (Ellicott).

ST. PAUL TO THE PHILIPPIANS,

WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

PHILIPPI was a chief city of the western part of Macedonia, πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, Acts xvi. 12. It took its name from Philip, the famous king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; and was afterwards made a Roman colony, [by which name they called themselves, Acts xvi. 21.] Near this place were the Campi Philippii, remarkable for the famous battles between Julius Cæsar and Pompey the Great, and that between Augustus and Antony on one side and Cæsar and Brutus on the other. But it is most remarkable among Christians for this epistle, which was written when Paul was a prisoner at Rome, A.D. 62, [or 63.] St. Paul seems to have had a very particular kindness for the church at Philippi, which he himself had been instrumental in planting; and though he had the care of all the churches, he had, upon that account, a particular fatherly tender care of this. Those whom God has employed us to do any good to we should look upon ourselves both encouraged and engaged to study to do more good to. He looked upon them as his children, and, having begotten them by the Gospel, he was desirous by the same Gospel to nourish and nurse them up. I. He was called in an extraordinary manner to preach the Gospel at Philippi, Acts xvi. 9, "A vision appeared to Paul in the night: There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia to help us." He saw God going before him, and was encouraged to use all means for carrying on the good work which was begun among them, and building upon the foundation which was laid. II. At Philippi he suffered hard things, [1 Thess. ii. 2.] He was scourged and put into the stocks, Acts xvi. 23, 24. Yet he had not the less kindness for the place for the hard usage he met with there. We must never love our friends the less for the ill-treatment which our enemies give us. III. The beginnings of that church were very small; Lydia was converted there, and the jailer, and a few more; yet that did not discourage him. If good be not done at first, it may be done afterwards; and the "last works may be more abundant." We must not be discouraged by small beginnings. [IV. The Jews at that time, being but few in the place, had no synagogue, but only a proseuche, or oratory, to which they resorted for prayer, chiefly females, where Paul and his companions met them and discoursed with them, when the conversion of Lydia followed. Addresses at a meeting for prayer have frequently been rendered very beneficial. The ejection of the spirit of the Pythoness, or damsel with the gift of divination, led to his imprisonment and scourging. Worldly men's loss of gain by evil practices enrageth them against the Gospel and its abettors, to whom they ascribe it. The damage done by it to the silversmiths' craft at Ephesus set the whole city in an uproar, Acts xix. 27.] V. It seems by many passages in this epistle that this church at Philippi grew a flourishing church, and particularly was very kind to St. Paul. He had reaped of their temporal things, and he made a return in spiritual things. He acknowledges the receipt of a present they had sent him, ch. iv. 18, and that when "no church communicated with him as concerning giving and receiving besides," ver. 15; and he gives them a prophet's, an apostle's, reward in this epistle, which is of more value than "thousands of gold and silver." [VI. It was written, as we have seen, at Rome, while Paul was a prisoner there at his own hired house, Timothy, probably, being his amanuensis, whom he joins with him in his salutation, he having been with him at the formation of their society; and it was sent by Epaphroditus their pastor, on his return, who had cheerfully conveyed their gifts and tokens of regard to Paul at that city, and from whom the apostle learned the tidings of their affairs. VII. It is the only one of Paul's epistles in which there is no reproof or censure, although many warnings of danger, and exhortations to diligence. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." VIII. From his manner of expressing himself it appears that he was in great want of necessities before their contributions arrived; for, not having converted the Romans, he did not consider himself entitled to receive supplies from them, and, being a prisoner, he could not work with his hands as elsewhere, nor would he receive supplies from any church where factions were formed against him. We do not know that he received supplies from any other church than this at Philippi, which was to them a distinguishing honour. The style of this epistle is singularly animated, affectionate, and pleasing.]

A.D. 64.

CHAPTER I.

He begins with the inscription and benediction, ver. 1, 2. He gives thanks for the saints at Philippi, ver. 3-6. His great affection and concern for their spiritual welfare, ver. 7, 8. His prayers for them, ver. 9-11. His care to prevent their offence at his sufferings, ver. 12-20. His readiness to glorify Christ by life or death, ver. 21-26. He concludes with a double exhortation to strictness and constancy, ver. 27-30.

First. The persons writing the epistle, Paul and Timotheus. Though Paul

AUL and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons: 2 Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

We have here the inscription and benediction. Observe, only was Divinely inspired, he joins Timothy with himself, to express his own humility, and put honour upon Timothy. They who are aged, and strong, and eminent, should pay respect to, and support the reputation of, those who are younger, and weaker, and of less note. "The servants of Jesus Christ;" not only in the common relation of his disciples, but in the peculiar work of the ministry, the high office of an apostle and evangelist. Observe, The highest honour of the greatest apostle and most eminent ministers is to be the servants of Jesus Christ; not the masters of the churches, but the servants of Christ.

[Paul makes no mention here of his apostleship, which is the case also in three other of his epistles, for which some assign these reasons: in those to the Thessalonians, which are generally agreed to have been the first written, he omits it, as not having had it then contested by any false apostles, which was the case afterwards; in that to Philemon he omits it, since he wrote to him as a friend to solicit a favour, and will not lessen it by hinting at his spiritual right and authority; in this he had to acknowledge favours, and therefore gratefully receives them as a boon, when he might have claimed them as a due. The omissions of Scripture are not without a use of instruction, 2 Cor. xii. 12, 13; 1 Thess. ii. 6.] Observe,

Secondly. The persons to whom it is directed. 1. To "all the saints in Christ which were at Philippi." He mentions the church before the ministers, because the ministers are for the church, and for their edification and benefit; not the churches for the ministers, and for their dignity, dominion, and wealth. "Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy," 2 Cor. i. 24. They are not only the servants of Christ, but the servants of the church for his sake. "Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake," 2 Cor. iv. 5. Observe, The Christians are here called saints,—set apart for God, or sanctified by his Spirit, either by visible profession or real holiness. And they who are not really saints on earth will Introductory.—No doubts were ever expressed in ancient times as to the genuineness of this epistle, and the doubts of modern writers have been pronounced by competent critics (Alford, Ellicott, Davidson, &c.) scarcely worthy of serious discussion. The date, from internal and external evidence, is fixed by Alford, Ellicott, and others as the spring or summer of A.D. 63. The occasion of the epistle, which was written at Rome, appears to have been a visit of Epaphroditus with supplies for the apostle from the church at Philippi. The contents are therefore naturally less doctrinal than in the case of the Ephesians, Colossians, &c., and consist chiefly of thanks, earnest commendations, kindly warnings, and expressions of consolation and encouragement.

i. 1, 2. Address and greeting. "Saints in Christ Jesus:" only "in him," in union with him, can true saintliness be found. "With the bishops," &c.: "The shepherds naturally follow the sheep" (Ellicott).

never be saints in heaven. Observe, It is directed to all the saints, one as well as another, even the meanest, the poorest, and those of the least gifts. Christ makes no difference, the rich and the poor meet together in him; and the ministers must not make a difference in their care and tenderness upon these accounts. We must not "have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons," Jas. ii. 1. "Saints in Christ Jesus;" saints are accepted only by virtue of their being in Christ Jesus, or as they are Christians. Out of Christ the best saints will appear sinners, and unable to stand before God.

2. It is directed to the ministers, or church officers, "with the bishops and deacons." The bishops, or elders, in the first place, whose office it was to teach and rule; and the deacons, or overseers of the poor, who took care of the outward business of the house of God, the place, the furniture, the maintenance of the ministers, and provision for the poor; these were all the offices which were then known in the church, and which were of Divine appointment. The apostle, in the direction of his epistle to a Christian church, acknowledges but two orders, which he calls bishops and deacons. And whosoever shall consider that the same characters and titles, the same qualifications, the same acts of office, and the same honour and respect, are everywhere ascribed throughout the New Testament to those who are called bishops and presbyters, (as Dr. Hammond and other learned men allow,) will find it difficult to make them a different office, or distinct order of ministry, in the Scripture times.

[The church is mentioned before its officers, because it is first, and they are for it; and though a portion of it they are distinguished from it, as having a distinct rule and office. The reason of their distinct mention here might be, that this church was settled in its fixed officers before any other.]

Thirdly. Here is the apostolical benediction, ver. 2, "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." This is the same, almost word for word, in all the epistles, to teach us that we must not be shy of forms, though we are not to be tied down to them, especially such which are not Scriptural. The only form in the Old Testament is that of a benediction, Num. vi. 23-26. "On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." So in the New Testament, the good which is wished is spiritual good, grace and peace; the free favour and goodwill of God, and all the blessed fruits and effects of it; and that "from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ," jointly from them both, though in a different way. Observe, 1. No peace without grace. Inward peace springs from a sense of Divine favour. 2. No grace and peace, but from God our Father, the fountain and original of all blessings, the "Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift," Jas. i. 17. 3. No grace and peace from God our Father but in and through our Lord Jesus Christ. Christ as Mediator is the channel of conveyance of all spiritual blessings to the church, and directs the disposal of them to all his members.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you, 4 Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy, 5 For your fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now; 6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ:

The apostle proceeds, after the inscription and benediction, to thanksgiving for the saints at Philippi. He tells them,

First. What it was he thanked God for upon their account. Observe here, 1. Paul remembered them. He bore them much in his thoughts; and though they were out of sight, and he was at a distance from them, yet they were not out of his mind. Or, 'Upon every mention of you,'—ἐν παντί καὶ ὑμῶν θυμῷ. As he often thought of them, so he often spoke of them, and delighted to hear them spoken of; the very mention of them was grateful to him. It is a pleasure to hear of the welfare of an absent friend.

2. He remembered them with joy. At Philippi he was evilly entreated; there he was scourged and put into the stocks, and for the present saw little of the fruit of his labour; and yet he remembers Philippi with joy. He looked upon his sufferings for Christ as his credit, his comfort, his crown, and was pleased at every mention of the place where he suffered. So far was he from being ashamed of them, or loath to hear of the scene of his sufferings, that he remembered it with joy.

[Some read it, that he thanked God for their continued remembrance of him, who had put it into their hearts thus to concur with him in the spread of the Gospel, so that his prayers for them were always with a joyful feeling, and were, therefore, prayers of fervency and faith.]

3. He remembered them in prayer; "Always in every prayer of mine for you all," ver. 4. The best remembrance of our friends is to remember them at the throne of grace. Paul was much in prayer for his friends, for all his friends, for these particularly. It should seem, by this manner of expression, that he mentioned at the throne of grace the several churches he was interested in, and concerned for, particularly and by name. He had seasons of prayer for the church at Philippi. God gives us leave to be thus free with him, though, for our comfort, he knows who we mean when we do not name them.

4. He thanked God upon every joyful remembrance of them. Observe, Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer, and whatsoever is the matter of our rejoicing ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. What we have the comfort of God must have the glory of. He thanked God, as well as made requests, with joy. As holy joy is the heart and soul of thankful praise, so thankful praise is the lip and language of holy joy.

5. As in our prayers, so in our thanksgiving, we must eye God as our God; "I thank my God." It encourages us in prayer, and enlarges the heart in praise, to see every mercy coming from the hand of God as our God. "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you." We must thank our God for others' graces, and comforts, and gifts, and usefulness, as we receive the benefits of them, and God receives glory by them.

Secondly. But what is the matter of this thanksgiving?

1. He gives thanks to God for the comfort he had in them; ver. 5, "For your fellowship in the Gospel from the first day until now." Observe, That gospel fellowship is a good fellowship; and the meanest Christians have fellowship in the Gospel with the greatest apostles, for the gospel salvation is a "common salvation," Jude 3, and they "obtain like precious faith with them," 2 Pet. i. 1. They who sincerely receive and embrace the Gospel have fellowship in it "from the very first day." A new-born Christian, if he is true born, is interested in all the promises and privileges of the Gospel from the first day of his becoming such

i. 3. The Epistle to the Galatians is the one sad exception in which the apostle cannot give thanks to God for the spiritual state of his converts. Not "every remembrance," as in the Authorised Version, but "all my remembrance," or "the whole of my remembrance of you" (Ellicott, Alford).

i. 5. Not "in" but "towards," or "with regard to the Gospel." "The fellowship of faith and love which they evinced towards the Gospel, primarily and generally in their concordant action in the fur-

"until now." Observe, that it is a great comfort to ministers when they who begin well hold on and persevere. Some, by their "fellowship in the Gospel," understand their liberality towards the propagating of the Gospel, and translate κοινωνία, not communion, but 'communication.' But comparing it with Paul's thanksgiving on the account of other churches, it rather seems to be taken more generally for the fellowship which they had in faith, and hope, and holy love with all good Christians; a fellowship in gospel promises, ordinances, privileges, and hopes, and this from the first day until now.

[Still it is more agreeable to the context to interpret it of their Christian liberality, as a special grace bestowed upon them, which he again speaks of as having been from the beginning, in ch. iv. 15.]

2. For the confidence he had concerning them; ver. 6. "Being confident of this very thing," &c. Observe, That the confidence of Christians is the great comfort of Christians, and that we may fetch matter of praise from our hopes as well as from our joys; we must give thanks, not only for what we have the present possession and evidence of, but what we have the future prospect of. Paul speaks with much confidence concerning the good estate of others, hoping well concerning them in the judgment of charity, and being confident in the judgment of faith that if they were sincere they would be happy. "That he who hath begun a good work in you will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ." A good work among you; ἐν ὑμῖν, so it may be read. Understand it, in the general, of the planting of the church among them. He who hath planted Christianity in the world will preserve it as long as the world stands. Christ will have a church till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the mystical body completed. The church is "built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." But it is rather to be applied to particular persons, and then it speaks of the certain accomplishment of the work of grace wherever it is begun. Observe here, 1st. The work of grace is a good work, a blessed work, for it makes us good, and is an earnest of good to us. It makes us like God, and fits us for the enjoyment of God. That may well be called a good work which does us the greatest good. 2nd. Wherever this good work is begun, it is of God's beginning; "He hath begun a good work in you." We could not begin it ourselves, for we are by nature dead in trespasses and sins; and what can dead men do towards raising themselves to life? or how can they begin to act till they are enlivened in the same respect in which they are said to be dead? It is God who quickeneth them who are thus dead, Eph. ii. 1; Col. ii. 13. 3rd. The work of grace is but begun in this life, it is not finished here; as long as we are in this imperfect state there is still something more to be done. 4th. If the same God who begins the good work did not undertake the carrying on and finishing it, it would lie for ever unfinished. He must perform it who began it. 5th. We may be confident, or well persuaded, that God not only will not forsake, but that he will finish and crown, the work of his own hands; for "as for God his work is perfect." 6th. The work of grace will never be perfected "till the day of Jesus Christ;" that is, the day of his appearance, when he shall come to judge the world, and finish his mediation; then this work will be complete, and the top-stone will be brought forth with shouting. We have this same expression, ver. 10.

[The grace of Christian love is also "a good work" of the Divine Spirit in any people, and most highly commended elsewhere by our apostle, and the apostle John. This grace shewed itself to be so rooted in the Philippians that Paul was persuaded of its continuance to the day of their death, when the reward would be assigned to them for it, which will be bestowed at the day of final recompence, agreeable to Mat. xxv. 25, &c.]

tion of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace. 8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

The apostle expresses the mighty affection he had for them, and concern for their spiritual welfare; ver. 7, "I have you in my heart." He loved them as his own soul, and they lay near his heart. He thought much of them, and was in care about them. Observe,

First. Why he had them in his heart. "Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the Gospel, you all are partakers of my grace," that is, they had received benefit by him, and by his ministry. They were partakers of that grace of God which, by him and through his hands, was communicated to them. This makes people dear to their ministers, their receiving benefit by their ministry. Or, "You are partakers of my grace," that is, you have joined with me in doing and suffering. They were partakers of his affliction by sympathy and concern, and readiness to assist him. This he calls being partakers of his grace; for they who suffer with the saints are, and shall be, comforted with them; and they shall share in the reward who bear thence of it, secondarily and specially in their contribution and assistance to St. Paul" (Ellicott).

i. 6. "A good work;" their fellowship (see above on verse 5). Not "will perform," but "will perfect." "Shall go forth with it" (Tyn-dal). "The day of Jesus Christ;" the apostle assumes the nearness of the coming of the Lord, but practically the day of Christ comes to each one at his death.

i. 7. "It is meet;" understand "according to the law of love" (Vastheir part of the burthen. He loved them, because they stuck to him in his bonds, and in the "defence and confirmation of the Gospel." They were as ready to appear in their places, and according to their capacity, for the defence of the Gospel, as the apostle was in his, and therefore he had them in his heart. Fellow-sufferers should be dear one to another; they who have ventured and suffered in the same good cause of God and religion should for that reason love one another dearly. Or, "Because you have me at heart," διὰ τὸ ἔχειν με ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν. They distinguished their respect to him by adhering firmly to the doctrine he preached, and readily suffering for it along with him. The truest mark of respect toward our ministers is receiving and abiding by the doctrine they preach.

Secondly, The evidence of it: "It is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart." By this it appeared that he had them in his heart, because he had a good opinion of them, and good hopes concerning them. Observe, It is very proper to think the best of other people, and as well as we can of them,—to suppose as well of them as the matter will admit, in all cases. [But he may mean, that as he thus knew himself to be living in their heart and affections, by their readiness, though of Roman extraction, and citizens of the place, to be known at Rome as taking his part and adventuring themselves with him, while suffering opprobrium and confinement, it was no wonder that his own bosom throbbed with the liveliest sympathy and longing for their welfare.]

Secondly, An appeal to God concerning the truth of this; ver. 8, "For God is my record how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ." Having them in his heart, he longed after them, that is, either he longed to see them, longed to hear from them, or he longed for their spiritual welfare, and their increase and improvement in knowledge and grace. He had joy in them, ver. 4, because of the good he saw and heard of among them, yet still he longed after them to hear of more of it among them; and he longed after them all, not only those among them who were witty and wealthy, but even the meanest and poorest. And he longed greatly after them, or with strong affection, and great goodwill; and this "in the bowels of Jesus Christ," with that tender concern which Christ himself hath, and hath shewn to precious souls. Paul was herein a follower of Christ, and all good ministers should aim to be so. Oh the bowels of compassion which are in Jesus Christ to poor souls! It was in compassion to them he undertook their salvation, and put himself to so vast an expense to compass it. Now, in conformity to the example of Christ, Paul had a compassion for them, and longed after them all "in the bowels of Jesus Christ." Shall not we pity and love those souls whom Christ had such a love and pity for? And for this he appeals to God; "God is my record." It was an inward disposition of mind he expressed towards them, which God only is a witness to the sincerity of, and therefore to him he appeals. Whether you know it or no, or are sensible of it, God who knows the heart knows it.

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment; 10 That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ; 11 Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God.

These verses contain the prayers he put up for them. Paul often lets his friends know what it was he begged of God for them, that they might know what to beg for themselves, and be directed in their own prayers, and that they might be encouraged to hope they should receive from God the quickening, strengthening, establishing, comforting grace, which so powerful an intercessor as Paul has asked of God for them. It is an encouragement to us to know that we are prayed for by our friends, who, we have reason to think, have an interest at the throne of grace. It is intended likewise for their direction in their walk, and that they might labour to answer his prayers for them, for by that it would appear that God had answered them. Paul in praying thus for them expected good concerning them. It is an inducement to us to do our duty, that we may not disappoint the expectations of praying friends and ministers. He prays,

First, That they might be a loving people, and that good affections might abound among them; "That your love might abound yet more and more." He means it of their love both to God and one another, and all men.—Love is the fulfilling both of the law and of the Gospel. Observe, They who abound much in any grace yet have still need to abound more and more, because there is still something wanting in it, and we are imperfect in our best attainments.

Secondly, That they might be a knowing, judicious people; that love might abound in "knowledge, and in all judgment." It is not a blind love will recommend us to God, but a love grounded upon knowledge and judgment. We must love God, because of his infinite excellence and loveliness; and love our brethren, because of what we see of the image of God upon them. Strong passions, without knowledge and a settled judgment, will not make us complete in the will of God, and sometimes do more hurt than good. The Jews had a zeal of God, but not "according to knowledge," and were transported by it to violence and rage, Rom. x. 2; Jas. i. 2.

Thirdly, That they might be a discerning people. This would be the effect of their knowledge and judgment; "That ye may approve the things which are excellent," ver. 10; or, as it is in the margin, "try the things which differ,"—εἰς τὸ δοκιμαῖεν ὑμᾶς τὰ διαφέροντα, that we may approve the things which are excellent upon the trial of them, and discern their difference from other things. Observe, The truths and laws of Christ are excellent things; and it is necessary that we every one approve of them, and esteem them such. We only need to try them to approve of them, and they will easily recommend themselves to any searching and discerning mind.

Fourthly, That they might be an honest, upright-hearted people; "That ye may be sincere." Sincerity is our gospel perfection, that in which we should have our conversation in the world, and which is the glory of all our graces. When the eye is single, when we are inward with God in what we do, are really what we appear to be, and mean honestly, then we are sincere.

Fifthly, That they might be an inoffensive people: That ye may be "without offence until the day of Christ," not apt to take offence, and very careful not to give offence to God or their brethren. To "live in all good conscience before God," Acts xxiii. 1, and to "exercise ourselves to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men," Acts xxiv. 16. And we must continue to the end blameless, that we may be presented so at the day of Christ. He will present the church "without spot or wrinkle," Eph. v. 27, and present believers "faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy," Jude 24.

Hengel). "It is in accordance with the genuine nature of my love to entertain such a confident hope" (Ellicott). See 1 Cor. xiii. 7. "The defence and confirmation;" "His employment in that situation, whether he refers to a public defence (2 Tim. iv. 16) or only to that defence of the Gospel which he was constantly making in private" (Alford). "Partakers of my grace;" "The grace or gift bestowed on St. Paul, and also on the Philippians, was the power of confirming the Gospel by their sufferings" (Conybeare).

Sixthly, That they might be a fruitful, useful people: ver. 11, "Being filled with the fruits of righteousness," &c. From God is our fruit found, and therefore from him it must be asked. The "fruits of righteousness," that is, the evidences and effects of our sanctification, the duties of holiness springing from a renewed heart, the root of the matter in us, being filled with them. Observe, They who do much good should still endeavour to do more. The fruits of righteousness brought forth for the glory of God, and edification of his church, should really fill us, and wholly take us up. Fear not being emptied by bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, for you will be filled with them. These fruits are by Jesus Christ, by his strength and grace, for without him we can do nothing. He is the root of the good olive, from which it derives its fitness. We are "strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. ii. 1, and "strengthened with might by his Spirit," Eph. iii. 16, and they are "unto the glory and praise of God." We must not aim at our own glory in our fruitfulness, but at "the praise and glory of God," that "God may be glorified in all things," 1 Pet. iv. 11, and "whatsoever we do we must do all to the glory of God," 1 Cor. x. 31. It is much for the honour of God when Christians not only are good, but do good, and abound in good works.

[His prayers were directions to them to seek, 1. The increase of the grace of love for which they had been commended. 2. A discerning mind to perceive the superiority of the doctrine he had preached, when compared with the notions of the Judaizing teachers, whom it is most likely he heard were thus tampering with them, so that they might not be "offended" or stumbled in their progress by any of their captious objections,—the word "offence" being capable of a passive as well as active signification, which Beza and other commentators consider to be the case here. And, 3. Renewed acts of kindness and generosity to the advocates of the Gospel; "righteousness" being used in Scripture, perhaps from Deut. xxiv. 13, for beneficence, and so to be here interpreted. Observe, To be filled with the fruits of Christian liberality is the best way of being preserved uprightly and progressively in the Christian course.]

12 But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; 13 So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places; 14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear. 15 Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will: 16 The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds: 17 But the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel. 18 What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. 19 For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, 20 According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death.

We see here the care the apostle takes to prevent their being offended at his sufferings. He was now a prisoner at Rome; this might be a stumblingblock to those who had received the Gospel by his ministry. They might be tempted to think, if this doctrine was indeed of God, God would not suffer one who was so active and instrumental in preaching and propagating it to be thrown by as a despised, broken vessel. They might be shy of owning this doctrine, lest they should be involved in the same trouble themselves. Now, to take off the offence of the cross, he expounds this dark and hard chapter of his sufferings, and makes it very easy, intelligible, and reconcileable to the wisdom and goodness of God, who employed him.

First, He suffered by the sworn enemies of the Gospel, who laid him in prison, and aimed at taking away his life; but they should not be stumbled at this, for good was brought out of it, and it tended to the furtherance of the Gospel; ver. 12 "The things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel." A strange chemistry of Providence this, to extract so great a good out of so great an evil, as the enlargement of the Gospel by the confinement of the apostle; "I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound," 2 Tim. ii. 9. They cannot imprison the word of God; that has its free course, though I am confined. But how was this?

1. It alarmed those who were without; ver. 13, "My bonds in Christ," or for Christ, "are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places." The emperor, the courtiers, the magistrates, are convinced that I do not suffer as an evil-doer, but as an honest man, with a good conscience. They know I suffer for Christ, and not for any wickedness. Observe, 1st, Paul's sufferings made him known at court, where perhaps he would never have otherwise been known, and might lead some of them to inquire after the Gospel for which he suffered, which they might otherwise have never heard of. 2nd, When his bonds were manifest in the palace they were manifest in all other places. "The sentiments of the court have a great influence on the sentiments of the people,"—Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.

2. It emboldened them who were within. As his enemies were startled at them, so his friends were heartened by them; "Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite. The

i. 9. "Your love . . . in knowledge and all judgment;" "All depends on their having that measure of knowledge short of which love will become the sport of every impulse of the heart, and lead to perversities, of which we may easily find examples enough in every age" (Wiesinger). Rheims and Conybeare read "understanding" for "judgment;" Ellicott, "perception."

i. 10. "That ye may approve," &c.: the original will bear two senses, either "that ye may approve of what is excellent," or "that righteous also shall hold on his way, and he who hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger," Job xvii. 8, 9. So it was here, ver. 14, "Many of the brethren in the Lord waxing confident by my bonds." The expectation of trouble for their religion, in general, perhaps disheartened and discouraged them; but when they saw Paul imprisoned for Christ, they were so far from being deterred from preaching Christ, and praising his name, that it made them the more bold; for they could gladly suffer in Paul's company. If they should be hurried from the pulpit to the prison, they could be reconciled to it, because they should be there in such good company. Besides, the comfort which Paul had in his sufferings, his extraordinary consolations received from Christ in a suffering state, greatly encouraged them. They saw that they who served Christ served a good Master, who could both bear them up and bear them out in their sufferings for him: "Waxing confident by my bonds," Περαιθόρας. They were more fully satisfied and persuaded by what they saw. Observe the power of the Divine grace; that which was intended by the enemy to discourage the preachers of the Gospel was overruled for their encouragement. And "are much more bold to speak the word without fear;" they see the worst of it, and therefore are not afraid to venture. Their confidence gave them courage, and their courage preserved them from the power of fear.

Secondly, Paul suffered from false friends as well as from enemies; ver. 15, 16, "Some preach Christ even of envy and strife. The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely." Now this would be a stumblingblock and discouragement to some, that there were those who envied Paul's reputation in the churches, and the interest he had among the Christians, and endeavoured to supplant and undermine him. They were secretly pleased when he was laid up in prison, that they might have the better opportunity to steal away the people's affections; and laid themselves out the more in preaching, that they might gain to themselves the reputation they envied him: "Supposing to add affliction to my bonds." They thought hereby to grieve his spirit, and make him afraid of losing his interest, uneasy under his confinement, and impatient for release. It is sad there should be men who profess the Gospel, especially who preach it, who are governed by such principles as these, who should preach Christ in spite to Paul, and to increase the affliction of his bonds. Let us not think it strange if, in these latter and more degenerate ages of the church, there should be any such. However, there were others who were animated by Paul's suffering to preach Christ the more vigorously: "Some also of goodwill and of love." From sincere affection to the Gospel, that the work might not stand while the workman was laid up. "Knowing that I am set for the defence of the Gospel." They knew that he was appointed to support and propagate the Gospel in the world, against all the violence and opposition of its enemies, and were afraid lest the Gospel should suffer by his confinement. This made them the more bold to preach the word, and supply his lack of service to the church.

[The Gospel which Paul had to defend and maintain was particularly that feature of it which related to the calling of the Gentiles to salvation without their being circumcised, which he calls his Gospel, Rom. xi. 23; and which he defended even against Peter, Gal. ii. 5, 11, 12. It was for this the professed Jewish converts hated him, and became the source of his greatest troubles and sorrows. Note, Some ministers are set to defend one part of the Gospel, as unpalatable truth, in one age, and some another in a future age, and it behoves them, like Paul, to be resolute in it, whatever they suffer.]

It is very affecting to see how easy the apostle was in the midst of all; ver. 18, "Notwithstanding every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached, I therein do rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice." Note, The preaching of Christ is the joy of all who wish well to his kingdom among men. Since it may tend to the good of many, we ought to rejoice in it, though it is done in pretence, and not in reality. It is God's prerogative to judge of the principles men act upon, and is out of our line. Paul was so far from envying those who had liberty to preach the Gospel, while he was under confinement, that he rejoiced in the preaching it, even by those who did it in pretence, and not in truth. How much more then should we rejoice in the preaching of the Gospel by them who do it in truth, yea, though it should be with much weakness, and some mistake! Two things made the apostle rejoice in the preaching the Gospel:

1. Because it tended to the salvation of the souls of men; ver. 19, "I know that this shall turn to my salvation." Observe, God can bring good out of evil; and what doth not turn to the salvation of the ministers may yet by the grace of God be made to turn to the salvation of the people. What reward can they expect who preach Christ out of strife, and envy, and contention, and to add affliction to a faithful minister's bonds,—who preach in pretence, and not in truth? and yet even this may turn to the salvation of others; and Paul's rejoicing in it turned to his salvation too. This is one of the things which accompanies salvation, to be able to rejoice that Christ is preached, though it be to the diminution of us, and our reputation. This noble spirit appeared in John the Baptist at the first public preaching of Christ; "This my joy is fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease," Jno. iii. 29, 30. Let him shine, though I am obscured; and his glory be exalted, though upon my ruins. Others understand this expression of the malice of his enemies being defeated, and contributing towards his deliverance from his confinement; "Through your prayers, and the supply, or the aids and assistance of the Spirit of Christ." Note, Whatsoever turns to our salvation is by the supply, or aids and assistance, of the Spirit of Christ; and prayer is the appointed means of fetching in that supply. The prayers of the people may bring a supply of the Spirit to their ministers, to enable them in suffering, as well as in preaching the Gospel.

[May we not suppose that he rejoiced in the preaching of it chiefly as leading to the conversion of others, God overruling the preaching of his truth concerning Christ, even when taught by corrupt men, to the salvation of their hearers. This is not, indeed, his ordinary, but extraordinary way of working; and though the end that is answered justifies not the motive of the instrument, it may be rejoiced in, while that motive is condemned. The true minister rejoices if good is done, by whomsoever it is done, while he weeps over those who have wrong ends in doing it.]

2. Because it would turn to the glory of Christ, ver. 20; where he takes occasion to mention his own entire devotedness to the service and honour of Christ. "According to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed;" &c. Here observe, 1st. That the great desire of every true Christian is, that Christ may be magnified and glorified; that his name may be great, and his kingdom come. 2nd. That they who truly desire that Christ may be magnified desire that he may be magnified in their body. They present their "bodies a living sacrifice," Rom. xii. 1, and "yield their members as instruments of righteousness unto God," Rom. vi. 13. They are willing to serve his designs, and be instrumental to his glory, with every member of their body, as well as faculty of their soul. 3rd. That it is much for the glory of Christ that we should serve him boldly, and not be ashamed of him; with freedom and liberty of mind, and without discouragement; "That in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness Christ may be magnified." The boldness of Christians is the honour of Christ. 4th. That they who make Christ's glory their desire and design may make it their expectation and hope. If it be truly aimed at it shall certainly be attained. If in sincerity we pray, "Father, glorify thy name," we may be sure of the same answer to that prayer which Christ had:

"I have glorified it, and I will glorify it again," Jno. xii. 28. 5th. They who desire Christ may be magnified in their bodies have a holy indifference "whether it be by life or by death." They refer it to him, which way he will make them serviceable to his glory, whether by their labour or suffering, by their diligence or patience, by their living to his honour in working for him, or dying to his honour in suffering for him.

21 For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.
22 But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose I wot not. 23 For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better: 24 Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. 25 And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; 26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me by my coming to you again.

We have here an account of the life and death of blessed Paul. His life was Christ, and his death was gain. Observe, 1. It is the undoubted character of every good Christian that to him to live is Christ. The glory of Christ ought to be the end of our life, the grace of Christ the principle of our life, and the word of Christ the rule of it. The Christian life is derived from Christ, and directed to him. He is the principle, rule, and end of it. 2. All those to whom to live is Christ, to them to die will be gain. It is great gain, a present gain, everlasting gain. Death is a great loss to a carnal worldly man, for he loses all his comforts and all his hopes; but to a good Christian it is gain, for it is the end of all his weakness and misery, and the perfection of his comforts and accomplishment of his hopes. It delivers him from all the evils of life, and brings him to the possession of the chiefest good. Or, to me "to die is gain," that is, to the Gospel as well as to myself, which will receive farther confirmation by the seal of my blood, as it had before by the labours of my life. So Christ would be "magnified by his death," ver. 20. Some read the whole expression thus, "To me, living and dying, Christ is gain;" that is, I desire no more, neither while I live nor when I die, but to win Christ, and be found in him. It might be thought, if death was gain to him, he would be weary of life, and impatient for death. No, saith he, ver. 22, "If I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour," that is, Christ is. He reckoned his labour well bestowed if he could be instrumental to advance the honour and interest of the kingdom of Christ in the world. It is "the fruit of my labour," Καρπὸς ἐργου,—opera pretium. It is worth while for a good Christian, and a good minister, to live in the world, as long as he can glorify God and do good to his church. "Yet what I shall choose I wot not; for I am in a strait betwixt two." It was a blessed strait which Paul was in, not between two evil things, but between two good things. David was in a strait by three judgments—sword, famine, and pestilence. Paul was in a strait between two blessings, living to Christ, and being with him. Here we have him reasoning with himself upon the matter.

First, His inclination was for death. See the power of faith and of Divine grace. It can reconcile the mind to death, and make us willing to die, though death is the destruction of our present nature, and the greatest natural evil. We have naturally an aversion to death, but he had an inclination to it; ver. 23, "Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ." Observe, 1. It is being with Christ which makes a departure desirable to a good man. It is not simply dying, or putting off the body; it is not of itself, and for its own sake, a desirable thing. But it may be necessarily connected with something else, which may make it truly so. If I cannot be with Christ without departing, I shall reckon it desirable, upon that account, to depart. Observe, 2. As soon as ever the soul departs, it is immediately with Christ: "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise," Lu. xxiii. 43; "Absent from the body, and present with the Lord," 2 Cor. v. 8, without any interval between. "Which is far better," πολλὴ γὰρ μάλλον κρείσσον,—"very much exceeding, or vastly preferable." They who know the value of Christ and heaven will readily acknowledge it far better to be in heaven than to be in this world, to be with Christ than to be with any creature; for in this world we are compassed about with sin, born to trouble, born again to it. But, if we come to be with Christ, farewell sin and temptation, farewell sorrow and death for ever.

Secondly, His judgment was rather to live awhile longer in this world, for the service of the church; ver. 24, "Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you." It is needful for the church to have ministers; and faithful ministers can ill be spared when the "harvest is plenteous, and the labourers few." Observe, That they who have most reason to desire to depart yet should be willing to continue in the world as long as God has any work for them to do. Paul's strait was not between living in this world and living in heaven,—between these two there is no comparison; but his strait was between serving Christ in this world, and enjoying him in another. Still it was Christ his heart was upon, though, to advance the interest of Christ and his church, he chose rather to tarry here, where he met with oppositions and difficulties, and to deny himself for awhile the satisfaction of his reward, "And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide, and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith," ver. 25. Observe here, 1. What a great confidence Paul had in the Divine providence, that it would order all for the best to him. Having this confidence, that it will be needful for you that I shall abide in the flesh, I know that I shall abide. 2. Whatsoever is best for the church we may be sure God will do. If we know what is needful for the building up the body of Christ, we may certainly know what will be; for he will take care of its interests, and do what is best, all things considered, in every condition it is in. 3. What ministers are continued for; "For our furtherance and joy of faith," that is, our farther advancement in holiness and comfort. 4. What promotes our faith and "joy of faith" is very much for our furtherance in the way to heaven. The more faith the more joy, and the more faith and joy the more we are furthered in our Christian course. 5. There is need of a settled ministry, not only for the conviction and conversion of sinners, but for the edification of saints, and their furtherance in spiritual attainments. "That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again," ver. 26. They rejoiced in the hope of seeing him, and enjoying his farther labours among them. Observe, 1st. The continuance of ministers with the church ought to be the rejoicing of all who wish well to the church and to its interests. 2nd. That all our joys should terminate in Christ. Our joy in good ministers should be our ye may discriminate between differing things"—i.e., between right and wrong. Thus Tyndal translates, "that ye might accept things most excellent;" Rheims, "that you may approve the better things;" but Geneva, "that ye may discern things that differ;" Conybeare, "teaching you to distinguish good from evil." The better sense must therefore be gathered from the context, and it certainly seems that the prayer that their love may be according to knowledge—not a mere sentimental love—would be better fulfilled if they approved those things really worthy of love, than if they merely discerned the good from the evil. "Sincere;" better "pure." "Without offence;" i.e., "blameless."

i. 11. "Fruit;" not "fruits," as Authorised Version; so best MSS. "The negative side always implies the positive, a principle which is of great importance for the Christian life. By 'fruit of righteousness,' as in the case of other words similarly connected, such as 'fruit of the Spirit' (Gal. v. 22), 'fruit of the light' (Eph. v. 9), must joy in Christ Jesus for them; for they are but the friends of the bridegroom, and are to be received in his name, and for his sake.

[To die is gain. The gain or advantage the apostle here speaks of seems not to apply to himself, in the first instance, as our translation would appear to imply, but only secondarily; it was honour brought to Christ which will be done by his martyred body, no less than by his devoted life. It is as if he had said, 'For Christ, or the serving and honouring of Christ, is the great gain or advantage I propose to myself in living or dying.' His embarrassment arose from the desirableness which he perceived of the lengthening of his life, for the strengthening of the Philippians and others in the faith; and his inward or miraculous assurance that this would be the case determined what would otherwise have been an insuperable difficulty, which of two things to prefer, a speedy death or prolonged existence on earth. Observe, It is well when the governing end of existence, the bringing of glory to Christ, is that which determines our preference for life or death.]

The life I live "in the flesh," is a phrase which denotes an idea of the contemptibleness of this life, in itself; and in the apostle's case a life only of "labour," which he was accustomed to, and even led to prefer to its cessation on account of the "fruit" that it might bear, namely, glory to Christ.]

27 Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel; 28 And in nothing terrified by your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God. 29 For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake; 30 Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

The apostle concludes the chapter with two exhortations.

First. He exhorts them to strictness of conversation; ver. 27, "Only let your conversation be as becometh the Gospel of Christ." Observe, They who profess the Gospel of Christ should have their conversation as becomes the Gospel, or in a suitableness and agreeableness to it. Let it be as becomes those who believe gospel truths, submit to gospel laws, and depend upon gospel promises; and with an answerable faith, holiness, and comfort. Let it be in all respects as those who belong to the kingdom of God among men, and are members and subjects of it. It is an ornament to our profession when our conversation is of a piece with it. "That whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs." He had spoken, in ver. 26, of his coming to them again, and had spoken it with some assurance, though he was now a prisoner; but he would not have them build upon that. Our religion must not be bound up in the hands of our ministers. Whether I come or no, let me hear well of you, and do you "stand fast." Whether ministers come or no, Christ is always at hand. He is nigh to us, never far from us, and hastens his second coming; the "coming of the Lord draws nigh," Jas. v. 8. Let me hear of you, "That you stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel." Three things he desired to hear of them, and they are all such as become the Gospel.

1. It becomes those who profess the Gospel to strive for it, to use a holy violence in taking the kingdom of heaven. The faith of the Gospel is the doctrine of faith, or the religion of the Gospel. There is that in the faith of the Gospel which is worth striving for. If religion is worth anything, it is worth every thing. There is much opposition, and there is need of striving. A man may sleep and go to hell; but he who will go to heaven must look about him and be diligent.

2. The unity and unanimity of Christians become the Gospel. Strive together, not strive one with another. All of you must strive against the common adversary. One spirit and one mind becomes the Gospel, for there is one Lord, one faith, one baptism. There may be a oneness of heart and affection among Christians, where there is diversity of judgment and apprehensions about many things.

3. Steadfastness becomes the Gospel; "Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind." Be steadfast and immovable by any opposition. It is a shame to religion when the professors of it are off and on, unfixed in their minds, and unstable as water; for they will never excel. They who would strive for the faith of the Gospel must stand firm to it.

Secondly. He exhorts them to courage and constancy in suffering; ver. 28, "And in nothing terrified by your adversaries." The professors of the Gospel have all along met with adversaries, especially at the first planting of Christianity. Our great care must be to keep close to our profession, and be constant to it. Whatsoever oppositions we meet with, we must not be frightened at them, considering the condition of the persecuted is much better and more desirable than the condition of the persecutors; for persecuting is an evident token of perdition. They who oppose the Gospel of Christ, and injure the professors of it, are marked out for ruin. But being persecuted is a token of salvation. Not that it is a certain mark,—many hypocrites have suffered for their religion; but it is a good sign that we are in good earnest in religion, and designed for salvation, when we are enabled in a right manner to suffer for the cause of Christ. "For to you it is given, on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe, but also to suffer for his name," ver. 29. Here are two precious gifts given, and both on the behalf of Christ. 1st. To believe in him. Faith is God's gift on the behalf of Christ, who purchased for us, not only the blessedness which is the object of faith, but the grace of faith itself; the ability and disposition to believe is from God. 2nd. To suffer for the sake of Christ is a valuable gift too. It is a great honour, and a great advantage; for we may be very serviceable to the glory of God, which is the end of our creation, and encourage and confirm the faith of others. And there is a great reward attending it too. "Blessed are you when men shall persecute you, for great is your reward in heaven," Mat. v. 11. 12. And if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him," 2 Tim. ii. 12. If we suffer reproach and loss for Christ, we are to reckon it a great gift, and prize it accordingly, always provided we carry it under our sufferings with the genuine temper of the martyrs and confessors; ver. 30, "Having the same conflict which you saw in me, and now hear to be in me;" that is, you suffering in the same manner as you saw, and now hear of me that

I suffer. It is not simply the suffering, but the cause; and not only the cause, but the spirit, which makes the martyr. A man may suffer in an ill cause, and then he suffers justly; or in a good cause, but with a wrong mind, and then his sufferings lose their value.

[Their "adversaries," spoken of here, are the Judaizers, who opposed their faith in that feature of the Gospel which received men to salvation without circumcision, the great bone of contention at that period in most places, and in this place particularly. They were not to be "frightened" by their opposition, so as to be turned out of the way of contending for their essential prerogative of the gospel scheme. To the opposers of it, their inflexible adherence to it might seem an evident token of their being abandoned of God; but to themselves it was an evidence of greater honour designed by God for them, in thus having all suffering for a vilified truth, on which he had set his seal in their experience; and in evidencing which they might be animated by the recollection of what they saw him so cheerfully endure on the same account, and learnt that he was still, in the same spirit, enduring. Observe, We may well exhort others to the same faith, when we find it, and make it manifest, to be comforting to our own hearts.]

CHAPTER II.

The apostle proceeds to farther exhortations to several duties: to be like-minded and lowly-minded, which he presses from the example of Christ, ver. 1—11; and to diligence and seriousness in the Christian course, ver. 12, 13; and to adorn their Christian profession by several suitable graces, ver. 14—18; and concludes with particular notice and commendation of two good ministers, Timothy and Epaphroditus, whom he designed to send to them, ver. 19—30.

For there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, 2 Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. 3 Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves. 4 Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. 5 Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: 6 Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: 7 But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: 8 And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. 9 Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: 10 That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; 11 And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

The apostle proceeds in this chapter, where he left off in the last, with farther exhortations to Christian duties. He presses them largely to like-mindedness and lowly-mindedness, in conformity to the example of the Lord Jesus, the great pattern of humility and love. Where we may observe,

First. The great gospel precept pressed upon us; that is, to love one another. This is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school, the livery of his family. This he represents, ver. 2, by being "likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind." We are of a like mind when we have the same love. Christians should be one in affection, whether they can be one in apprehension or no. This is always in their power, and always their duty, and is the likeliest way to bring them nearer in judgment. "Having the same love." Observe, That the same love we are required to express to others, others are obliged to express to us. Christian love ought to be mutual love; love, and you shall be loved. "Being of one accord and of one mind." Not crossing and thwarting, or driving on separate interests; but unanimously agreeing in the great things of God, and keeping the unity of the Spirit in other differences. Here observe,

1. The pathetic pressing of the duty. He is very importunate with them, knowing what an evidence it is of our sincerity, and what a means of the preservation and edification of the body of Christ. The inducements to brotherly love are these, 1st. If there is any consolation in Christ. Have you experienced consolation in Christ? Evidence that experience by loving one another. The sweetness we have found in the doctrine of Christ should sweeten our spirits. Do we expect consolation in Christ? If we have not consolation in Christ, where else can we expect it? They who have an interest in Christ have consolation in him, strong and everlasting consolation, (Heb. vi. 18; 2 Thes. ii. 16.) and therefore ought to love one another. 2nd. Comfort of love. If there be understood fruit of righteousness in the sense of product thereof; and 'righteousness' does not express so much the justification as the new moral condition of the man, which is given along with it, and in which he 'bears fruit unto God in newness of the spirit.' The apostle adds 'which are by Jesus Christ,' since this fruit, along with the ground from which it springs, is a communication of the life of Christ to his own (John xv. 5; Gal. ii. 20.)

i. 13. "The palace:" the Greek word may be so translated; but as there is no proof that it was ever used to denote the emperor's residence at Rome, it more probably means here the camp of the Praetorians. "And in all other places:" rather, "to all the rest." "The matter of fact interpretation would be that the soldiers, and those who visited him, carried the fame of his being bound for Christ over all Rome" (Alford).

i. 14. Best MSS. read "to speak the word of God without fear."

i. 16, 17. These verses are transposed in the Authorised Version any comfort in Christian love, in God's love to us, in our love to God, or in our brethren's love to us; in consideration of all this, let us be like-minded. If you have ever found that comfort, if you would find it, if you indeed believe that the grace of love is a comfortable grace, abound in it. 3rd. "Fellowship of the Spirit." If there is such a thing as communion with God and Christ by the Spirit, such a thing as the communion of saints, by virtue of their being animated and acted by one and the same Spirit, be ye like-minded; for Christian love and like-mindedness will preserve to us our communion with God and with one another. 4th. "Any bowels and mercies," that is, in God and Christ, toward you. If you expect the benefit of God's compassions to yourselves, be ye compassionate one to another. If there is such a thing as mercy to be found among the followers of Christ, if all who are sanctified have a disposition to holy pity, make it appear this way. How cogent are these arguments! One would think them enough to tame the most fierce, and mollify the hardest heart. Another argument he insinuates, the comfort it would be to him; "Fulfil ye my joy." It is the joy of ministers to see people like-minded, and living in love. He had been instrumental in bringing them to the grace of Christ, and love of God. Now, saith he, if ye have found any benefit by your participation of the Gospel of Christ, if ye have any comfort in it, or advantage by it, fulfil the joy of your poor minister who preached the Gospel to you.

2. He proposes some means to promote it. 1st. Doing nothing "through strife and vainglory," ver. 3. There is no greater enemy to Christian love than pride and passion. If we do things in contradiction to our brethren, that is doing them through strife; if we do them through ostentation of ourselves, that is doing them through vainglory; both are destructive of Christian love, and kindle unchristian heats. Christ came to slay all enmities; therefore let there not be among Christians a spirit of opposition. Christ came to humble us; and therefore let there not be among us a spirit of pride. 2nd. We must esteem others in lowliness of mind better than ourselves; be severe upon our own faults, and charitable in our judgment to others; be quick in observing our own defects and infirmities, but ready to overlook, and make favourable allowances for, the defects of others. We must esteem the good which is in others above that which is in ourselves; for we best know our own unworthiness and imperfections. 3rd. We must interest ourselves in the concerns of others, not in a way of curiosity and censoriousness, or as "busybodies in other men's matters," but in Christian love and sympathy; ver. 4. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." A selfish spirit is destructive of Christian love. We must be concerned not only for our own credit, and ease, and safety, but for those of others also; and rejoice in others' prosperity as truly as in our own. We must "love our neighbour as ourselves," and make his case our own.

Secondly. Here is a gospel pattern proposed to our imitation, and that is the example of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus," ver. 5. Observe, That Christians must be of Christ's mind. We must bear a resemblance to his life if we would have the benefit of his death. "If we have not the Spirit of Christ, we are none of his," Rom. viii. 9. Now what was the mind of Christ? Why, he was eminently humble, and this is what we are peculiarly to learn of him; "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart," Mat. xi. 29. If we were lowly-minded, we should be like-minded; and if we were like to Christ we should be lowly-minded. We must walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps, with the Lord Jesus, who humbled himself to sufferings and death for us; not only to satisfy God's justice, and pay the price of our redemption, but to set us an example, and that we might follow his steps. Now here we have the two natures, and the two states, of our Lord Jesus. It is observable, that the apostle having occasion to mention the Lord Jesus, and the mind which was in him, takes the hint to enlarge upon his person, and to give a particular description of him. It is a pleasing subject, and a gospel minister need not think himself out of the way when he is upon it; any fit occasion should be readily taken.

1. Here are the two natures of Christ: his Divine nature and human nature. 1st. Here is his Divine nature. "Who, being in the form of God," ver. 6. Partaking of the Divine nature, as the eternal and only begotten Son of God. This agrees with Jno. i. 1, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God;" and is of the same import with being the "image of the invisible God," Col. i. 15, and the "brightness of his glory, and express image of his person," Heb. i. 3. "He thought it no robbery to be equal with God," did not think himself guilty of any invasion of what did not belong to him, or assuming another's right. He said, "I and my Father are one," Jno. x. 30. It is the highest degree of robbery for any mere man to pretend to be equal with God, or profess himself "one with the Father." This is for a "man to rob God," not in tithes and offerings, but of the rights of his godhead, Mal. iii. 8. Some understand "being in the form of God," ἐν μορφῇ Θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, of his appearance in a Divine majestic glory to the patriarchs, and the Jews under the Old Testament, which was often called the glory, and the Shechinah; and the word is used in such a sense by the Septuagint, and in the New Testament; Mar. xvi. 12. He "appeared to the two disciples," ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ "in another form;" Mat. xvii. 2, μετεμορφώθη, he "was transfigured before them." And, he "thought it no robbery to be equal with God;" that is, he did not greedily catch at, or covet and affect, to appear in that glory; he laid aside the majesty of his former appearance while he was here on earth, which is supposed the sense of the peculiar expression, οὐκ ὀνταυμέν ἡγήσατο; see Bishop Bull's Def. cap. ii., sec. 4, et alibi, and Whitby in loc.

2nd. His human nature. He was "made in the likeness of men," and "found in fashion as a man." He was really and truly man, took part of our flesh and blood, appeared in the nature and habit of man. And he voluntarily assumed human nature; it was his own act, and by his own consent. We cannot say that our participation of the human nature is so. And herein he emptied himself; divested himself of the honours and glories of the upper world, and of his former appearance, to clothe himself with the rags of human nature. He was in all things like to us, Heb. ii. 17.

2. Here are his two estates of humiliation and exaltation.

1st. His estate of humiliation. He not only took upon him the likeness and fashion of a man, but "the form of a servant," that is, a mean man. He was not only "God's servant whom he hath chosen;" but he came to minister to men, and was among them as "one who serveth," in a mean and servile state. One would think that the Lord Jesus, if he would be a man, should have been a prince, and appeared in splendour. But, quite the contrary, he took upon him "the form of a servant." He was brought up meanly, probably working with his supposed father at his trade. His whole life was a life of humiliation, of meanness, of poverty and disgrace; he had not where to lay his head; lived upon alms, was "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief;" did not appear with external pomp, or any marks of distinction from other men. This was the humiliation of his life; but the lowest step of his humiliation was his dying the death of the cross; "He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross." He not only suffered, but was actually and voluntarily obedient; he obeyed the law which he brought himself under as Mediator, and by which he was obliged to die. "I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again; this commandment have I received of my Father," Jno. x. 18. And he was "made under the law," Gal. iv. 4. There is an emphasis laid upon the manner of his dying, which had in it all the circumstances possible which are humiliating, "even the death of the cross," a cursed, painful, and shameful death; a death accursed by the law: "Cursed is he that hangeth on a tree;" full of pain, the body nailed through the nervous parts,—the hands and feet,—and hanging with all its weight upon the cross; and the death of a malefactor and a slave, not of a free man, exposed as a public spectacle. Such was the condescension of the blessed Jesus.

[The form of God and the form of a servant are put in opposition. Christ was not only a servant, Lu. ii. 27, ministering unto others, Mat. xx. 26—28, and, though a Son, learning obedience by the things that he suffered, Heb. v. 8; but also in the appearance and condition of one. In like manner he was not only God with the Father, but shared equally with him in the manifested splendour and appearance of Deity, receiving equal homage and worship, both before the creation of this world and upon it afterward, in his appearances to the patriarchs, Jno. xvii. 5; Heb. i. 3. So far, however, from eagerly retaining this equality, he parted with it for our sakes, and emptied himself of it, by becoming a man of mean and suffering condition. And should not we, who are to copy him in self-denial, so look upon what would be advantageous to others as to be ready to give up some advantages of our own for their sakes? Observe, Then do we admire when we imitate.]

2nd. His exaltation. "Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him." His exaltation was the reward of his humiliation: because he humbled himself, God exalted him; and he "highly exalted him," ὑπερύψωκε, raised him to an exceeding height. And he exalted his whole person, the human nature as well as the Divine; for he is spoken of as being in the form of God as well as in the fashion of a man. As it respects the Divine nature, it could only be a recognizing his rights, or the display and appearance of the "glory he had with the Father before the world was," Jno. xvii. 5; not any new acquisition of glory; and so the Father himself is said to be exalted. But the proper exaltation was of his human nature, which only seems to be capable of it, though in conjunction with the Divine. His exaltation here is made to consist in honour and power. In honour; so "He had a name above every name;" a title of dignity above all the creatures, men or angels. And in power; "Every knee must bow to him;" that is, the whole creation must be in subjection to him; "Things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth," the inhabitants of heaven and earth, the living and the dead. "At the name of Jesus," not at the sound of the word, but the authority of Jesus, all should pay a solemn homage. [Or, rather, 'in' the name of Jesus, as it is in the Greek; namely, as the glorified Mediator.] And that "every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord;" every nation and language should publicly own the universal empire of the exalted Redeemer; and that "all power in heaven and earth is given to him," Mat. xxviii. 18. Observe the vast extent of the kingdom of Christ: it reaches to heaven and earth, and to all the creatures in each; to angels as well as men, and to the dead as well as the living. "To the glory of God the Father." Observe, It is the glory of God the Father to confess that Jesus Christ is Lord; for it is his will that "all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father," Jno. v. 23. It redounds to the honour of the Father, whatsoever respect is paid to Christ. "He who receiveth me, receiveth him who sent me," Mat. x. 40.

12 Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. 13 For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

First. He exhorts them to diligence and seriousness in the Christian course. "Work out your own salvation." It is the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. i. 9, and our eternal salvation, Heb. v. 9, and contains deliverance from all the evils sin had brought upon us, and exposed us to, and the possession of all good, and whatsoever is necessary to our complete and final happiness. Observe, It concerns us above all things to secure the welfare of our souls. Whatever becomes of other things, let us take care of our best interests; and it is our own salvation, the salvation of our own souls. It is not for us to judge other people, we have enough to do to look to ourselves; and though we must promote the common salvation, Jude 3, as much as we can, yet we must upon no account neglect our own. We are required to work out our salvation, κατεργάζεσθε; the word signifies working thoroughly at a thing, and taking true pains. Observe, we must be diligent in the use of all the means which conduce to our salvation. We must not only work at our salvation, by doing something now and then about it; but we must work out our salvation by doing all which is to be done, and persevering therein to the end. Salvation is the great thing we should mind, and set our hearts upon; and we cannot attain salvation without the utmost care and diligence. He adds, "With fear and trembling;" that is, with great care and circumspection,—tremble for fear lest you miscarry and come short. Be careful to do every thing in religion in the best manner; and fear lest under all your advantages you should so much as "seem to come short," Heb. iv. 1. Fear is a great guard and preservative from evil.

Secondly. He urges this from the consideration of their readiness always to obey the Gospel. "As ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence," ver. 12. You have been always willing to comply with every discovery of the will of God, and that in my absence as well as presence. You make it appear that regard to Christ, and care of your souls, sway more with you than any other respect whatsoever. They were not merely awed by the apostle's presence, but did it even much more in his absence. And because "it is God who worketh in you," do you work out your salvation, for it is God who worketh in you: work, for he worketh. It should encourage us to do our utmost, because our "labour shall not be in vain." God is ready to concur with his grace, and assist our faithful endeavours. Observe, Though we must use our utmost endeavours in working out our salvation, yet still we must go forth and go on in a dependence upon the grace of God. His grace worketh in us in a way suitable to our natures, and in concurrence with our endeavours; and the operations of God's grace are so far from excusing, that they are intended to quicken and engage our endeavours. And work out your salvation "with fear and trembling," for "he worketh in you." All our working depends upon his working in us. Do not trifle with God by neglects and delays, lest you provoke him to withdraw his help, and all your endeavours prove in vain. Work with fear, for he works of his good pleasure. "To will and to do" he gives the whole ability. It is the grace of God which inclines the will to that which is good, and then enables us to perform it, and to act according to our principles. "Thou hast wrought all our works in us," Isa. xvi. 12. "Of his good pleasure." As there is no strength in us, so there is no merit in us. As we cannot act without from their original order. "To raise up tribulation (for me) in my bonds—i.e., endeavouring to take opportunity, by my being laid aside, to depreciate me and my preaching, and so to cause me trouble of spirit" (Alford). It seems that those to whom the apostle refers preached the truth, and that to the salvation of others, else why should he rejoice (verse 18)? but their motive was rather their own honour than the extension of Christ's kingdom.

i. 19, 20. St. Paul appears to be looking forward to the day when salvation will be complete, and since this preaching of Christ, whether in love or pretence, has its origin in his labours, he looks to obtain through it a higher degree of blessing in the kingdom of the saved (Alford, Brown, &c.); and the means by which this happy result would be secured was the prayer of the Philippians and consequent outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

i. 21. "In my view and definition of the term, life is but another name for Christ" (Fleile).

God's grace, so we cannot claim it, or pretend to deserve it. God's goodwill to us is the cause of his good work in us; and he is under no engagements to his creatures but those of his gracious promise.

14 Do all things without murmurings and disputings: 15 That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world; 16 Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain. 17 Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all. 18 For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

ROMAN PHAROS, OR LIGHT TOWER.—VER. 15.

The apostle exhorts them in these verses to adorn their Christian profession by a suitable temper and behaviour, in several instances.

First, By a cheerful obedience to the commands of God; ver. 14, "Do all things," that is, do your duty in every branch of it, "without murmurings." Do it, and do not find fault with it. Mind your work, and do not quarrel with it. God's commands were given to be obeyed, not to be disputed. This greatly adorns our profession, and shews we serve a good Master, whose service is freedom, and whose work is its own reward.

Secondly, By peaceableness, and love one to another. Do all things "without disputings," wrangling and debating one with another; because the light of truth, and the life of religion, are often lost in the heats and mists of disputation.

Thirdly, By a blameless conversation towards all men; ver. 15, "That ye may be blameless and harmless; the sons of God without rebuke." That ye may be injurious to any in word or deed, and give no just occasion of offence. We should endeavour not only to be harmless, but to be blameless; not only not to do hurt, but not to come under the just suspicion of it. "Blameless and sincere," so some read it; blameless before men, sincere towards God. "The sons of God;" it becomes them to be blameless and harmless who stand in such a relation, and are favoured with such a privilege. The children of God should differ from the sons of men. "Without rebuke," ἀνεπίμνητος. Momus was a carping deity among the Greeks, mentioned by Hesiod and Lucian, who did nothing himself, and found fault with every body and every thing; from him all carpers at other men, and rigid censurers of their works, were called Momi. The sense of the expression is, Walk so circumspectly that Momus himself may have no occasion to cavil at you, that the severest censurer may find no fault with you. We should aim at it, and endeavour it, not only to get to heaven, but to get thither without a blot; and, like Demetrius, to "have a good report of all men, and of the truth," 3 Jno. 12. "In the midst of a crooked and perverse generation;" that is, among the heathens, and those who are without. Observe, Where there is no true religion, little is to be expected but crookedness and perverseness; and the more crooked and perverse others are among whom we live, and the more apt to cavil, the more careful we should be to keep ourselves blameless and harmless. Abraham and Lot must not strive, "because the Canaanite and Perizzite dwelt in the land," Gen. xiii. 7. "Among whom ye shine as lights in the world." Christ is the Light of the world, and good Christians are lights in the world. When God raises up a good man in any place, he sets up a light in that place. Or, it may be read imperatively, "Among whom shine ye as lights;" compare Mat. v. 16, "Let your light so shine before men." Christians should not only endeavour to approve themselves to God, but to recommend themselves to others that they also may glorify God. They must shine as well as be sincere. [It is the property of light to receive no contamination from the filthiest objects while it irradiates them. Excellent pattern for Christians.] "Holding forth the word of life," ver. 16. The Gospel is called the word of life, because it reveals and proposes to us eternal life through Jesus Christ. "Life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10. It is our duty not only to hold fast, but to hold forth, the word of life; not only to hold it fast for our own benefit, but to hold it forth for the benefit of others; to hold it forth, as the candlestick holds forth the candle, which makes it appear to advantage all around; or, as the luminaries of the heavens, which shed their influence far and wide; [or, as those buildings which we call lighthouses, the most illustrious of which was raised in the island of Pharos, where Ptolemy Philadelphus built that celebrated tower, (B.C. 283), on which a bright flame was always kept burning in the night, that mariners might see their way, and avoid the rocks which they were to pass in their entrance to the haven at Alexandria, upon which they would otherwise have been in the greatest danger of suffering shipwreck. Christians encourage their ministers when they let the light of the Gospel shine forth on all around them, not only by their holy living, but also by their evangelical teaching.] This Paul tells them would be his joy; "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ." Not only rejoice in your steadfastness, but in your usefulness. He would have them think his pains well bestowed, and that he had "not run in vain, neither laboured in vain." Observe

1. The work of the ministry requires the putting forth of the whole man; all that is within us is little enough to be employed in it, as in running and labouring. Running denotes vehemence, and vigour, and continual pressing forward; labouring, constancy and close application.

2. It is a great joy to ministers when they perceive that they have not "run in vain, neither laboured in vain;" and it will be their rejoicing in the day of Christ, when their converts will be their crown. "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? for ye are our glory and joy," 1 The. ii. 19, 20. The apostle not only ran and laboured for them with satisfaction, but shews that he was ready to suffer for their good; ver. 17; "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all." He could reckon himself happy if he could promote the honour of Christ, the edification of the church, and the welfare of the souls of men; though it were not only by hazarding, but by laying down his life. He could willingly be a sacrifice at their altars to serve the faith of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all." He could shed his blood for the service of the church, and shall we think much to take a little pains? Is not that worth our labour which he thought worth his life? "If I be offered," or poured out as the wine of the drink offerings, συνδομαι, 2 Tim. iv. 6, "I am now ready to be offered." He could rejoice to seal his doctrine with his blood; ver. 18. "For the same cause also do ye joy and rejoice with me." It is the will of God that good Christians should be much in rejoicing; and they who are happy in good ministers have a great deal of reason to joy and rejoice with them. If the minister loves the people, and is willing to spend and be spent for their welfare, the people have reason to love the minister, and to joy and rejoice with him.

19 But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. 20 For I have no man likeminded, who will naturally care for your state. 21 For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's. 22 But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel. 23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me. 24 But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly. 25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother and companion in labour, and fellowsoldier, but your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants. 26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick. 27 For indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. 28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful. 29 Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness; and hold such in reputation: 30 Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service toward me.

St. Paul takes particular notice of two good ministers; for though he was himself a great apostle, and laboured more abundantly than they all, yet he took all occasions to speak with respect of those who were far his inferiors.

First, He speaks of Timothy, whom he intended to send to the Philippians, that he might have an account of their state. See Paul's care of the churches, and the comfort he had in their well doing. He was in pain when he had not heard of them a good while, and therefore would send Timothy to inquire, and bring him an account; "For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state." Timothy was a nonsuch. There were, no doubt, many good ministers, who were in care for the souls of those for whom they preached; but none

i. 22—26. "But if my living in the flesh, if this is to me the (medium of) fruit from my labour, then," &c. The apostle personally desired to die, that he might be with Christ; but if he could not thus labour for Christ, he was content to remain on earth, or at least not to seek his own perfect happiness at the expense of his fellow-believers' furtherance in the faith.

i. 23. Compare 2 Thess. i. 5—7.

i. 29. "The grace given to you is such that you are thereby enabled not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for him; the double favour you have received affords the surer proof of the essentially divine nature of the token" (Elliecott).

i. 30. "Saw in me:" see Acts xvi. 16, &c.

ii. 1. "If then you can be entreated in Christ, if you can be persuaded by love, if you have any fellowship in the Spirit, if you have any tenderness or compassion, I pray you make my joy full," &c. (Conybeare).

comparable to Timothy, a man of an excellent spirit and tender heart. "Who will naturally care for your state." Observe, it is best with us when our duty becomes in a manner natural to us. Timothy was a genuine son of blessed Paul, and walked in the same spirit and the same steps; naturally, that is, sincerely, and not in pretence only; with a willing heart and upright view, so agreeably to the make of his mind. Note, 1. It is the duty of ministers to care for the state of their people, and be concerned for their welfare; "I seek not yours but you," 2 Cor. xii. 14. 2. It is a rare thing to find one who doth it naturally. Such a one is remarkable and distinguished among his brethren. "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's," ver. 21. What, did Paul say this in haste, as David said, "All men are liars?" Ps. cxvi. 11. Was there so general a corruption among ministers, so early, that there was not one among them who cared for the state of their people? We must not understand it so; he means the generality; all, that is, either the most or all in comparison of Timothy. Note, Seeking our own interest to the neglect of Jesus Christ is a very great sin, and very common among Christians and ministers. We are apt to prefer our own credit, ease, and safety, before truth, holiness and duty; the things of our own pleasure and reputation before the things of Christ's kingdom, and his honour and interest in the world; but Timothy was none of those. "Ye know the proof of him," ver. 22. Timothy was a man who had been tried, and had made "full proof of his ministry," 2 Tim. iv. 5; and was faithful in all which befel him. All the churches with whom he had acquaintance knew the proof of him; he was a man as good as he seemed to be, and "served Christ so as to be acceptable to God," and "approved of men," Rom. xiv. 18: as if he had said, You do not only know the name of him, and the face of him, but the proof of him, and have experienced his affection and fidelity in your service, "that as a son with a father he hath served with me in the Gospel." He was Paul's assistant in many places where he preached, and served with him in the Gospel, with all the dutiful respect which a child pays to a father, and with all the love and cheerfulness with which a child is servicable to his father. Their ministrations together were with great respect on the one side, and great tenderness and kindness on the other; an admirable example to elder and younger ministers, joined together in the same service. Paul designed to send him shortly; "Him therefore I hope to send presently, as soon as I shall see how it will go with me," ver. 23. He was now a prisoner, and did not know what would be the issue; but according as it turned he would dispose of Timothy. Nay, he hoped to come himself; ver. 24, "But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly." He hoped he should soon be set at liberty, and be able to give them a visit. Paul desired his liberty, not that he might take his pleasure, but that he might do good; "I trust in the Lord." He expresses his hope and confidence of seeing them with an humble dependence and submission to the Divine will; 1 Cor. iv. 19, "But I will come to you shortly if the Lord will;" Jas. iv. 15, "For that you ought to say, if the Lord will we shall live, or do this and that;" so Acts xviii. 21, and Heb. vi. 3.

Secondly. Concerning Epaphroditus, whom he calls his "brother and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier," that is, his Christian brother, to whom he bore a tender affection; and his companion in the work and sufferings of the Gospel, who submitted to the same labours and hardships with himself; and "their messenger," that is, one who was sent by them to him, probably to consult him about some affairs relating to their church, or to bring a present from them for his relief, for he adds, And "he who ministered to my wants;" he seems to be the same who is elsewhere called Epaphras, Col. iv. 12. He had an earnest desire to come to them, and Paul was willing he should. It seems,

1. Epaphroditus had been sick. "They had heard that he had been sick," ver. 26; and, "indeed he was sick nigh unto death," ver. 27. Sickness is a calamity common to men, to good men and ministers. But why did not the apostle heal him, who was endued with a power of curing diseases as well as raising the dead? Acts xx. 10. Probably because that was intended as a sign to others, and to confirm the truth of the Gospel, and therefore need not be exercised one towards another; "These signs shall follow them who believe; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover," Mar. xvi. 17, 18; and perhaps they had not that power at all times, and at their own discretion, but only when some great end was to be served by it, and when God saw fit. It was proper to Christ, who had the Spirit above measure.

2. The Philippians were exceeding sorry to hear of his sickness. They were full of heaviness as well as he upon the tidings of it; for he was one, it seems, they had a particular respect and affection for, and thought fit to choose out to send to the apostle.

3. It pleased God to recover and spare him; "But God had mercy on him," ver. 27. The apostle owns it as a great mercy to himself as well as to Epaphroditus and others. Though the church was blessed at that time with extraordinary gifts, they could even then ill spare a good minister. He was sensibly touched with the thoughts of so great a loss; "Lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow," that is, besides the sorrow of my own imprisonment, I should have the sorrow of his death. Or perhaps some other good ministers had died lately, which had been a great affliction to him; and if this had died now it would have been a fresh grief to him, and "sorrow added to sorrow."

4. Epaphroditus was willing to make a visit to the Philippians, that he might be comforted with those who had sorrowed for him when he was sick; "That when ye see him again ye may rejoice," ver. 28. That you may yourselves see how well he is recovered, and what reason you have of thankfulness and joy upon his account. He gave himself the pleasure of comforting them by the sight of so dear a friend.

5. Paul recommends him to their esteem and affection; "Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness, and hold such in reputation." Account such men valuable who are zealous and faithful, and let them be highly loved and regarded. Shew your joy and respect by all the expressions of hearty affection and good opinion. It seems he had caught his illness in the work of God. It was for "the work of Christ" that he was nigh to death, and to supply their lack of service to him. The apostle does not blame him for his indiscretion in hazarding his life, but reckons they ought to love him the more upon that account. Observe, 1st. They who truly love Christ, and are hearty in the interests of his kingdom, will think it very well worth their while to hazard their health and life to do him service, and promote the edification of his church. Observe, 2nd. They were to receive him with joy as newly recovered from sickness. It is an endearing consideration to have our mercies restored to us after danger of removal, and should make them the more valued and improved. What is given us in answer to prayer should be received with great thankfulness and joy.

CHAPTER III.

He cautions them against Judaizing seducers, ver. 1-3; proposes his own example, and here he enumerates the privileges of his Jewish state which he rejected, ver. 4-6; and describes the matter of his own choice, ver. 9-16; and closes with an exhortation to beware of wicked men, and to follow his example, ver. 17-21.

ii. 2. "Of one accord, of one mind;" rather, "with accordant souls, minding the one thing" (Ellicott); "with union of soul, unanimous" (Alford).

ii. 6. This verse refers plainly to Christ in his pre-incarnate state; in verse 7 the pre-incarnate passes into the incarnate; and in verses 8-12 the reference is to the incarnate Christ. "In the form:" see Heb. i. 3. "Thought it not robbery," &c.: rather, "He did not deem the being on an equality with God a thing to be seized

FINALLY, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous but for you it is safe. 2 Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision. 3 For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.

WATCH DOG.—VER. 2.

It seems the church of the Philippians, though a faithful and flourishing church, was disturbed by the Judaizing teachers, who endeavoured to keep up the law of Moses, and mix the observances of it with the doctrine of Christ and his institutions. He begins the chapter with warnings against these seducers.

First. He exhorts them to "rejoice in the Lord," ver. 1, to rest satisfied in the interest they had in him, and the benefit they hoped for by him. It is the character and temper of sincere Christians to rejoice in Christ Jesus. The more we take of the comfort of our religion, the more closely we shall cleave to it; the more we rejoice in Christ, the more willing we shall be to do and suffer for him, and the less danger we shall be in of being drawn away from him. "The joy of the Lord is our strength," Neh. viii. 10.

Secondly. He cautions them to take heed of those false teachers. "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe," that is, the same things which I have already preached to you; as if he had said, What has been presented to your ears shall be presented to your eyes. What I have spoken formerly shall now be written, to shew that I am still of the same mind, [or the same things that Epaphroditus has to discourse of to you by my authority.] "To me indeed is not grievous." Observe, 1. Ministers must not think any thing grievous to themselves which they have reason to believe is safe and edifying to the people. Observe, 2. It is good for us often to hear the same truths, to revive the remembrance, and strengthen the impression of things of importance. It is a wanton curiosity to desire always to hear some new thing. It is a needful caution he here gives, "Beware of dogs," ver. 2. The prophet calls the false prophets dumb dogs, Isa. lvi. 10, to which the apostle here seems to refer. Dogs, for their malice against the faithful professors of the Gospel of Christ, barking at them, and biting them. They cried up good works in opposition to the faith of Christ; but Paul calls them "evil workers." They boasted themselves to be of the circumcision; but he calls them "the concision." They rent and tore the church of Christ, and cut it to pieces; or contended for an abolished rite, a mere insignificant cutting the flesh.

[The Jewish deceivers were cruel, fierce, and mischievous, as appears by what the same apostle says of them in Tit. i. 10, &c. And that might be the reason why they are here called "dogs," as it is why the crucifiers of Christ are so termed in Ps. xxii. 16, "Dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked inclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet." Compare also the passage in Isaiah referred to above, (Isa. lvi. 10), which it is by no means improbable the apostle had in his eye when he wrote these words, and ver. 19 of this chapter. Farther, it is not unlikely that, as the Jews trusted the Gentiles, and used to speak of them as dogs, Paul might here intend to turn upon themselves that name of reproach, for which he had good reason from their conduct and behaviour.]

Thirdly. He describes true Christians, who are indeed the circumcision, the spiritual circumcision, that is, the peculiar people of God who are in covenant with him, as the Old Testament Israelites were; "We are the circumcision, who worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." Here are three characters: 1. They "worshipped in the Spirit," in opposition to the carnal ordinances of the Old Testament, which consisted in meats and drinks, and divers washings, &c. Christianity takes us off from these things, and teaches us to be inward with God in all the duties of religious worship; we must worship God in spirit, Jao. iv. 24. The work of religion is to no purpose any farther than the heart is employed in it; "Whatsoever we do, we must do it heartily as unto the Lord;" and we must worship God in the strength and grace of the Divine Spirit, which is so peculiar to the gospel state, which is "the ministration of the Spirit," 2 Cor. iii. 8. 2. They "rejoice in Christ Jesus," and not in the peculiar privileges of the Jewish church, or what answers to them in the Christian church, mere outward enjoyments and performances. They rejoice in their relation to Christ, and interest in him: God made it the duty of the Israelites to rejoice before him in the courts of his house; but, now the substance is come, the shadows are done away, and we are on (a state to be exclusively clutched at and retained as a prize), 'but emptied himself;' or, in other words, he did not insist on his own eternal prerogatives, but, on the contrary, humbled himself to the condition and sufferings of mortal man" (Ellicott).

ii. 9-11. "A name which is above every name:" "The very name which he bore in his humiliation, but which now is the highest and most glorious of all names, the name Jesus" (Alford). "A name with which now every highest attribute—grace, power, dominion—is to rejoice in Christ Jesus only. 3. They have "no confidence in the flesh," that is, those carnal ordinances and outward performances. We must be taken off from trusting in our own bottom, that we may build only on Jesus Christ the everlasting foundation. Our confidence as well as our joy is proper to him.

4 Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more: 5 Circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee; 6 Concerning zeal, persecuting the church; touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless. 7 But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. 8 Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ,

The apostle here proposeth himself for an example of trusting in Christ only, and not in his privileges as an Israelite.

First. He shews what he had to boast of as a Jew and a Pharisee. Let none think that the apostle despised these things, as men commonly do, because he had them not himself to glory in. No, if he would have gloried and trusted in the flesh, he had as much cause to do so as any man. "If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof to trust in the flesh, I more," ver. 4. He had as much to boast of as any Jew of them all. 1. His birthright privileges. He was not a proselyte, but a native Israelite, of the stock of Israel; and he was of the tribe of Benjamin, in which tribe the temple stood, and which adhered to Judaea when all the other tribes revolted. Benjamin was the father's darling, and this was a favoured tribe. A Hebrew of the Hebrews, that is, an Israelite on both sides, by father and mother, and from one generation to another; none of his ancestors had matched with Gentiles. 2. He could boast of his relation to the church and the covenant, for he was circumcised the eighth day. He had the token of God's covenant in his flesh, and was circumcised the very day which God had appointed. 3. For learning. He was a Pharisee, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, an eminent doctor of the law; and was a scholar learned in all the learning of the Jews, taught according to the perfect manner of the laws of the fathers, Acts xiii. 3; he was "a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee," Acts xxiii. 6; and "after the most strict sect of his religion, lived a Pharisee," Acts xxvi. 5. 4. He had a blameless conversation: "Touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless." As far as the Pharisees' exposition of the law went, and as to the mere letter of the law and outward observance of it, he could acquit himself from the breach of it, and could not be accused by any. 5. He had been an active man for his religion. As he made a strict profession of it under the title and character of a Pharisee, so he persecuted those whom he looked upon as enemies to it. "Concerning zeal, persecuting the church." 6. He shewed that he was in good earnest, though he had a zeal without knowledge to direct and govern the exercise of it. "I was zealous towards God, as ye all are this day, and I persecuted this way unto the death," Acts xxii. 3, 4. All this was enough to have made a proud Jew confident, and was stock sufficient to set up with for his justification. But,

Secondly. The apostle tells us here how little account he made of these in comparison of his interest in Christ, and his expectations from him; "But what things were gain to me, those have I counted loss for Christ," ver. 7; that is, those things which he had counted gain while he was a Pharisee, and which he had before reckoned up, "those I counted loss for Christ." I should have reckoned myself an unspeakable loser, if to adhere to them I had lost my interest in Jesus Christ. He counted them loss; not only insufficient to enrich him, but what would certainly impoverish and ruin him, if he trusted to them in opposition to Christ. Observe. The apostle did not persuade them to do any thing but what he himself did,—to quit any thing but what he had quitted himself, or venture on any other bottom but what he himself had ventured his immortal soul upon.

["Those I counted loss for Christ." The word ζημία signifies loss incurred in trade, and more especially that loss which is sustained at sea in a storm, when goods are thrown overboard for the sake of saving the passengers and the ship. The term, thus understood, gives a beautiful sense to the passage: saith the apostle, In making the voyage of life for the purpose of gaining salvation, I proposed to purchase it with my circumcision, and my care in observing the ritual precepts of the law, and I put a great value upon those things on account of the gain or advantage I was to make of them. But when I became a Christian I willingly threw them all overboard, as of no value in obtaining salvation; and this I did for the sake of gaining salvation through faith in Christ, my only Saviour.]

"Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ my Lord," &c., ver. 8. Here the apostle explains himself:—

1st. He tells us what it was he was ambitious of, and reached after. It was "the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord;" a believing, experimental acquaintance with Christ as Lord, not a mere notional and speculative, but a practical and efficacious, knowledge of him. So knowledge is sometimes put for faith. By his knowledge, or the knowledge of him, "shall my righteous servant justify many," Isa. liii. 11; and it is the excellency of knowledge. There is an abundant and transcendent excellence in the doctrine of Christ, or the Christian religion above all the knowledge of nature, and improvements of human wisdom; for it is suited to the case of fallen sinners, and furnishes them with all they need, and all they can desire and hope for, with all saving wisdom and saving grace.

2nd. He shews how he had quitted his privileges as a Jew and a Pharisee. "Yea doubtless;" his expression rises with a holy triumph and elevation, ἀλλὰ μὲν οὖν νῦν καὶ. There are five particles in the original; "But indeed even also do I count all things but loss." He had spoken before of those things, his Jewish privileges; here he speaks of all things, all worldly enjoyments, and mere outward privileges whatsoever, things of a like kind, or any other kind which could stand in competition with Christ for the throne in his heart, or pretend to merit and desert. There he had said he did count them but loss, but it might be asked, Did he continue still in the same mind? did he not repent his renouncing them? No; now he speaks in the present tense, "Yea doubtless, and I do count them but loss." But it may be said, It is easy to say so; but what would he do when he came to the trial? Why, he tells us that he had himself practised according to this estimate of the case; "For whom I have suffered the loss of all things." He had quitted all his honours and advantages as a Jew and a Pharisee, and submitted to all the disgrace and suffering which attended the profession and preaching of the Gospel. When he embarked in the bottom of the Christian religion he ventured all in it, and suffered the loss of all, for the privileges of a Christian. Nay, he not only counted them loss, but dung, σκαβάλα, offals thrown to dogs; they are not only less valuable than Christ, but in the highest degree contemptible when they come in competition with him. Note, The New Testament never speaks of saving grace in any terms of diminution, but on the contrary represents it as the fruits of the Divine Spirit, and the image of God in the soul of man, as a Divine nature, and the seed of God; and faith is called precious faith, and meekness is in the "sight of God of great price," 1 Pet. iii. 4; 2 Pet. i. 1, &c.

9 And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: 10 That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; 11 If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. 12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. 13 Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, 14 I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

We have heard what the apostle renounced; let us now see what he laid hold on, and resolved to cleave to, and that was, 1. Christ; and, 2. Heaven. He had his heart on these two great peculiarities of the Christian religion.

First. The apostle had his heart upon Christ as his righteousness. This is illustrated in several instances.

1. He desired to win Christ; and an unspeakable gainer he would reckon himself if he had but an interest in Christ and his righteousness, and he became his Lord and his Saviour. That I may win him, as the runner wins the prize, as the sailor makes the port he is bound for. The expression intimates that we have need to strive for him, and reach after him; and that all is little enough to win him.

2. That he might "be found in him," ver. 9; as the manslayer was found in the city of refuge, where he was safe from the avenger of blood, Num. xxxv. 25. Or it alludes to a judicial appearance; So we are to be "found of our judge in peace," 2 Pet. iii. 14. We are undone without a righteousness wherein to appear before God, for we are guilty. There is a righteousness provided for us in Jesus Christ, and it is a complete and perfect righteousness; none can have interest or benefit by it but those who come off from confidence in themselves, and are brought heartily to believe in him. "Not having my own righteousness which is of the law;" that is, not thinking that my outward observances and good deeds are able to atone for my bad ones, or that by setting the one over against the other I can come to balance accounts with God. No, the righteousness which I depend upon is that "which is through the faith of Christ;" not a legal, but evangelical righteousness; "The righteousness which is of God by faith;" that is, ordained and appointed of God. The Lord Jesus Christ is "the Lord our righteousness," Isa. xlv. 24. Had he not been God he could not have been our righteousness; the transcendent excellence of the Divine nature put such a value upon, and such a virtue into, his sufferings, that they became sufficient to satisfy for the sins of the world, and to bring in a righteousness which will be effectual to all who believe. And faith is the ordained means of actual interest and saving benefit in all the purchase of his blood. It is "by faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 25. ["And be found in him." Christians by being baptized into Christ have "put on" Christ, Gal. iii. 27; so that to God, now looking at them, there appears nothing but Christ. They are as it were covered all over with him, as a man is with the clothes he has put on.]

3. That he might know Christ; ver. 10, "That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings." Faith is called knowledge, Isa. liii. 11. Knowing him here is believing in him; it is an experimental knowledge of "the power of his resurrection, and fellowship of his suffering," or feeling the transforming efficacy and virtue of them. Observe. The apostle was as ambitious of being sanctified as he was of being justified. He was as desirous to know the power of Christ's death and resurrection killing sin in him, and raising him up to newness of life, as he was to receive the benefit of Christ's death and resurrection in his justification.

4. That he might be conformable unto him, and that also is meant of his sanctification. We are then made conformable to his death when we die to sin, as Christ died for sin; when we are crucified with Christ, the flesh and affections of it mortified, and the world is crucified to us, and we to the world, by the virtue of the cross of Christ, this is our conformity to his death.

[Many understand the apostle to mean, by a "fellowship in Christ's sufferings," his willingness to undergo his portion of suffering for Christ's sake, as a member of his mystical body, (see Col. i. 24;) and a "being made conformable to his death," an experiencing of a similar violent and bloody death, if called to it. The expressions thus appear very consistent with the rest of the allegory, and represent his readiness to submit to any difficulties that might eternally conjoined" (Ellicott). See Acts ix. 5. "That in the name of Jesus"—not "at," as in the Authorised Version—"every knee should bow:" that is, worship; we ask of God in the name or for the sake of Jesus. "To the glory of God the Father:" the confession of the lordship of Jesus redounds to the honour of his Father; "their honour is inseparable and their glory one" (Waterland).

ii. 12, 13. "Now much more," &c.: "In the absence of the apostle, the care of their salvation would rest with themselves alone"

(Wiesinger). "With fear," &c.: with distrust of their own powers (Eph. v. 6). "Your own salvation;" each one his individual salvation. "Work out:" better "carry out" or "complete" (Eph. vi. 13). "For it is God," &c.: "We acknowledge that by nature we have a will, but since by the corruption of sin it is an evil will, it begins to be good when it is reformed by God" (Calvin). See Ezek. xi. 19, 20.

ii. 14. "Without murmurings," &c.: Alford, Conybeare, and attend him in his voyage, in order to gain the desired haven, Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.

Secondly, The apostle had his heart upon heaven as his happiness; "If by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead," ver. 11. The happiness of heaven is here called "the resurrection of the dead," because though the souls of the faithful when they depart are immediately with Christ, yet their happiness will not be complete till the general resurrection of the dead at the last day, when soul and body shall be glorified together. Ανάστασις sometimes signifies the future state. This the apostle had his eye upon, this he would attain. There will be a resurrection of the unjust, who shall arise to shame and everlasting contempt, and our care must be to escape that; but the joyful and glorious resurrection of saints is called "the resurrection," καὶ ἡ ζωὴ, because it is in virtue of Christ's resurrection, as their head and first fruits; whereas the wicked shall rise only by the power of Christ, as their judge. To the saints it will be indeed a resurrection; that is, a return to bliss, and life, and glory; but the resurrection of the wicked is a rising from the grave, but a return to a second death. It is called "the resurrection of the just," and "the resurrection of life," 1 Jno. v. 29; and they are "counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead," Lu. xx. 35. This joyful resurrection the apostle pressed towards. He was willing to do any thing, suffer any thing, that he might attain that resurrection. The hope and prospect of it carried him with so much courage and constancy through all the difficulties he met with in his work. Observe, 1. He speaks as if they were in danger of missing it, and coming short of it. A holy fear of coming short is an excellent means of perseverance. 2. His care to be found in Christ was in order to his attaining the resurrection of the dead. Paul himself did not hope to attain it through his own merit and righteousness, but through the merit and righteousness of Jesus Christ. Let me be found in Christ, that I may attain the resurrection of the dead; that is, found a believer in him, and interested in him by faith. He looks upon himself to be in a state of imperfection and trial. "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect," ver. 12.

[The apostle now passes from one metaphor to another, as is usual in the most correct writers; namely, from that of a voyager to that of a racer. The former had concluded with his arriving in any way at the resurrection, namely, "of the just," Lu. xx. 35, as a desired haven, which the resurrection of the unjust will not be. Here he speaks of himself as an athletic in the Grecian exercises, who was yet in the conflict, not having gained the victory, and "obtained" the prize which was the reward of it, but pressing on in the prescribed course, 2 Tim. ii. 5, with all his powers on the full stretch, neglecting things behind, as men do which they have passed, and looking only to examples before them to quicken their speed, and especially to the glittering prize on the distant goal. Thus the heathen poet, "When they drive their chariots in a race, the rider of the chariot presseth to overtake those horses that are before him, but continues, and never looks after him that is behind, and outrun by him," Hor. lib. i. Sat. 1.]

Observe, The best men in the world will readily own their imperfection in the present state. We have not yet attained, are not already perfect; there is still much wanting in all our duties, and graces, and comforts. If Paul had not attained to perfection, who had reached to so high a pitch of holiness, much less have we. Again, "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended," ver. 13. Οὐ λογιζομαι, I make this judgment of the case; I thus reason with myself. Observe, They who think they have grace enough, it is a sign they have little enough, and that they have none at all; because wherever there is true grace there is a desire of more grace, and a pressing towards the perfection of grace. Observe here,

1. What the apostle's actions were under this conviction. Considering that he had not already attained, and had not apprehended, he pressed forward; "I follow after," ver. 12; διώκω, I pursue with vigour, as one following after the game; I endeavour to get more grace, and do more good, and never think I have done enough; "If that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." Observe, 1st. From whence our grace comes. From our being apprehended of Christ Jesus. It is not our laying hold of Christ first, but his laying hold of us, which is our happiness and salvation; "We love him, because he first loved us," 1 Jno. iv. 19. Nor our keeping hold of Christ, but his keeping hold of us, which is our safety. We are "kept by his mighty power through faith unto salvation," 1 Pet. i. 5. Observe, 2nd. What the happiness of heaven is; it is "to apprehend that for which we are apprehended of Christ." When Christ laid hold of us it was to bring us to heaven; and to apprehend that for which he apprehended us is to attain the perfection of our bliss. He adds farther, ver. 13, "This one thing I do," this was his great care and concern, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before." There is a sinful forgetting of past sins and past mercies, which ought to be remembered for the exercise of constant repentance and thankfulness to God. But he forgot the things which are behind, so as not to be content with present measures of grace. He was still for having more and more; so he reached forth, ἐπεκτεινόμενος,—"stretched" himself forwards, bearing towards his point,—expressions of a vehement concern.

2. The apostle's aim in these actions; "I press towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," ver. 14. He pressed towards the mark. As he who runs a race never takes up short of the end, but is still making forward as fast as he can, so they who have heaven in their eye must still be pressing forward to it in holy desires and hopes, and constant endeavours and preparations. The fitter we grow for heaven the faster we must press towards it. Heaven is called here the mark, because it is that which the mark he designs to hit. "For the prize of the high calling." Observe, That a Christian's calling is a high calling; it is from heaven as its original, and it is to heaven in its tendency. Heaven is "the prize of the high calling," τὸ βραβεῖον, the prize we fight for, and run for, and wrestle for; what we aim at in all we do, and will reward all our pains. It is of great use in the Christian course to keep our eye upon heaven. This is proper to give us measures in all our service, and to quicken us every step we take; and it is of God,—from him we are to expect it, "Eternal life is the gift of God," Rom. vi. 23; but it is in Christ Jesus, through his hand it must come to us, as it is procured for us by him. There is no getting to heaven as our home but by Christ as our way.

15 Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you. 16 Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing.

Wiesinger refer this injunction to their behaviour to one another—murmurings arising from selfishness and pride; Ellicott refers it to murmurings and doubtings respecting God; Scott refers "murmurings" to conduct towards God, "disputings" to conduct towards men.

ii. 17. The apostle regards the pouring out of his blood as probable, and as the completion of the sacrifice of the Gentiles as an offering to God (Rom. xv. 16).

The apostle having proposed himself as an example, he urges the Philippians to follow it. Let the same mind be in us which was in blessed Paul. We see here how he was minded; let us be like-minded, and set our hearts upon Christ and heaven, as he did.

First, He shews that this was the thing wherein all good Christians were agreed, to make Christ all in all, and set their hearts upon another world. This is that "whereto we have already attained." However good Christians may differ in their sentiments about other things, this is what they are agreed in, that Christ is a Christian's all—that to win Christ, and to be found in him, is our happiness both here and hereafter; and therefore, "let us walk by the same rule," and "mind the same thing." Having made Christ our all to us, to us to live must be Christ. Let us agree to press towards the mark, and make heaven our end.

Secondly, That this is a good reason why Christians who differ in lesser matters should yet bear with one another, because they are agreed in the main matter. "If in any thing you be otherwise minded." If you differ from one another, and are not of the same judgments as to meats, and days, and other matters of the Jewish law, yet you must not judge one another, while you all meet now in Christ as your centre, and hope to meet shortly in heaven as your home. As for other matters of difference lay no great stress upon them, "God shall reveal even this unto you." Whatever it is wherein you differ you must wait till God give you a better understanding, which he will do in his due time. In the mean time, as far as we have attained, we must go together in the ways of God, join together in all the great things in which we are agreed, and wait for farther light in the lesser things wherein we differ.

[Thirdly, That those who were "perfect," or proficient in Christian knowledge and experience, should pursue the same course with himself, assuring them that while so engaged, namely, intent on making farther progress in the Divine life, according to gospel rules and precepts, clearer light would come to them on other and doubtful matters. Note, Obedience is the best path to knowledge; "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God:" see Mat. xxv. 22, 23.]

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an example. 18 (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: 19 Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.) 20 For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: 21 Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

He closes the chapter with warnings and exhortations.

First, He warns them against following the examples of seducers and evil teachers; ver. 18, 19, "Many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ." Observe, There are many called by Christ's name who yet are enemies to Christ's cross, and the design and intention of it. Their walk is a surer evidence what they are than their profession; "By their fruits you shall know them," Mat. vii. 20. The apostle warns people against such, 1st. Very frequently; "I have told you often." We so little heed the warnings given us that we have need to have them repeated; "To write the same things is safe," ver. 1. 2nd. Feelingly and affectionately; "I now tell you weeping." Paul was upon proper occasions a weeping preacher, as Jeremiah was a weeping prophet. Observe, That an old sermon may be preached with new affections; what we say often we may say again, if we say it affectionately, and are ourselves under the power of it. He gives us the characters of those who were the enemies of the cross of Christ.

[By "enemies to the cross of Christ" he means particularly to the doctrine of the cross, or of salvation by a simple and entire dependence on his vicarious sufferings and merits, which they sought to subvert and render useless by directing the attention of believers to the ceremonial law of Moses, and so weakening and dividing their trust in Christ as to render it nugatory, Gal. ii. 16–21.]

1. Whose God is their belly; "that is, they mind nothing but their sensual appetites. A wretched idol it is, and a scandal for any, but especially for Christians, to sacrifice the favour of God, the peace of their conscience, and their eternal happiness to it. Gluttons and drunkards make a god of their belly, and all their care is to please it, and make provision for it. The same observance which good people give to God epicures give to their appetites. Of such he says, "They serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies," Rom. xvi. 18.

2. They "glory in their shame." They not only sin but brag of it, and glory in that which they ought to be ashamed of. Sin is the sinner's shame, especially when it is gloried in. They value themselves for what is their blemish and reproach.

3. They "mind earthly things." Christ came by his cross "to crucify the world to us and us to the world;" and they who mind earthly things act directly contrary to the cross of Christ, and this great design of it. They relish earthly things, and have no relish of the things which are spiritual and heavenly; they set their hearts and affections on earthly things; they love them, and even dote upon them, and have a confidence and complacency in them. He gives them this character to shew how absurd it would be for Christians to follow the example of such, or be led away by them. And to deter us all from it he reads their doom.

[These "earthly things" include the ceremonies and observances of the Jewish law, about which they were so much concerned, and in which they gloried; but which were in truth their shame, as it shewed them to be in reality ignorant of, and inattentive to, those spiritual and heavenly things which the Gospel of Christ brought before them, and which as far exceeded the former, that were but an administration of them, as the soul the body, or the substance

ii. 21. "All seek their own;" all those then with the apostle; who these were cannot be ascertained, but Wiesinger, by comparison of various passages and dates, proves that none of those mentioned in Col. iv. or Philemon were likely to be included in the censure.

ii. 30. No blame is intended to the Philippians, but rather the apostle commends Epaphroditus to their love. "That which you would have done if you could, he did for you; therefore receive him with all joy" (Alford).

its shadow. Farther, this glorying was their shame, as it took them off from the true ground of dependence for salvation with God, and the glorious future inheritance of the saints, namely, the sacrifice of Christ, to remain resting for their dignity and happiness on what, in comparison of those, "were weak and beggarly elements" Gal. vi. 14, 15.

4. "Whose end is destruction." Their way seems pleasant, but death and hell are at the end of it. "What fruit had you then in those things whereof you are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death," Rom. vi. 21. It is dangerous following them, though it is going down the stream; for if we choose their way we have reason to fear their end. Perhaps he alludes to the total destruction of the Jewish nation.

[Has he not here an eye to what he had said before of these men, ch. i. 29? They accounted Christians, for forsaking these ceremonies, and resting solely in Christ, to be in danger of destruction; but for endeavouring to wear them off from this, and neglecting it themselves, they would meet with that very destruction to which they doomed the sincere Philippians. It is a dreadful thing to oppose directly or indirectly the doctrine of salvation by Christ alone.]

Secondly He proposeth himself and his brethren for an example, in opposition to these evil examples. "Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them who walk, as you have us for an example," ver. 17. Mark them out for your pattern. He explains himself, ver. 20, by their regard to Christ and heaven; "For our conversation is in heaven." Observe, Good Christians, even while they are here on earth, have their conversation in heaven. Their citizenship is there, πολιτεία; as if he had said, We stand related to that world, and are citizens of the New Jerusalem. This world is not our home, but that is. There our greatest privileges and concerns lie. And because our citizenship is there, our conversation is there; being related to that world we keep up a correspondence with it. The life of a Christian is in heaven, where his Head is, and his home is, and where he hopes to be shortly. He "sets his affections upon things above;" and where his heart is there will his conversation be.

[Thus Augustine views the saints as the civitas Dei, which "in terris peregrina, in caelo fundata est." Such also is the view which one of the early fathers takes, in the following beautiful description,— "Christians are not separated from others by country, by language, or by customs. They are confined to no particular cities, use no particularities of speech, adopt no singularity of life. Dwelling in their cities, as every man's lot is cast, following the customs of each country in dress, and diet, and manner of life, they yet display the wonderful nature of their peculiar polity. They dwell in their own country but as sojourners; they abide on earth, but they are citizens of heaven. In a word, they are in the world what the soul is in the body. The soul is diffused through all the members of the body, and Christians through the cities of the earth. But the soul, though dwelling in the body, is not of the body; and Christians dwelling in the world are not of the world." The epistle which contains the Acts of Polycarp's Martyrdom is addressed from "the church of God which sojourns at Smyrna, to that which sojourns at Philippi, and in all places whither the holy catholic church sojourns throughout the world."]

The apostle had pressed them to follow him and other ministers of Christ. Why, might they say, you are a company of poor, despised, persecuted people, who make no figure, and pretend to no advantages in the world; who will follow you? Nay, saith he, but our conversation is in heaven. We have a near relation and a great pretension to the other world; and are not so mean and despicable as we are represented. It is good having fellowship with those who have fellowship with Christ, and conversation with those whose conversation is in heaven.

1. Because we look for the Saviour from thence; ver. 20. "From whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ." He is not here, he is ascended, he is "entered within the veil" for us; and we expect his second coming from thence to gather in all the citizens of that New Jerusalem to himself.

2. Because at the second coming of Christ we expect to be happy and glorified there. There is good reason to have our conversation in heaven, not only because Christ is now there, but because we hope to be there shortly. "Who shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body," ver. 21. There is a glory reserved for the bodies of the saints, which they will be instated in at the resurrection. The body is now at the best a vile body, τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινότητος ἡμῶν, "the body of our humiliation;" it hath its rise and original from the earth, it is supported out of the earth, and is subject to many diseases, and to death at last. Besides, it is often the occasion and instrument of much sin, which is called "the body of this death," Rom. vii. 24. Or, it may be understood of its vileness when it lies in the grave. At the resurrection it will be found a vile body, resolved to rottenness and dust, "the dust will return to the earth as it was," Ecc. xii. 7; but it will be made a glorious body, and not only raised again to life, but raised to great advantage. Observe, 1st. The sample of this change, and that is the glorious body of Christ, who, when he was transfigured upon the mount, "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light," Mat. xvii. 2. He went to heaven clothed with a body, that he might take possession of the inheritance of our nature, and be not only the "firstborn from the dead," but the "firstborn of the children of the resurrection." We shall be "conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren," Rom. viii. 29. Observe, 2nd. The power by which this change will be wrought. "According to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." There is an efficacy of power, an exceeding greatness of power, and the "working of mighty power," Eph. i. 19. It is matter of comfort to us that he can "subdue all things to himself," and sooner or later will bring over all into his interest. And the resurrection will be wrought by this power: "I will raise him up at the last day," Jno. vi. 44. Let this confirm our faith of the resurrection, that we not only have the Scriptures, which assure us it shall be, but we know the power of God, which can effect it, Mat. xxii. 29. As Christ's resurrection was a glorious instance of the Divine power, and therefore "he is declared to be Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead," Rom. i. 4, so will our resurrection be; and his resurrection is a standing evidence as well as pattern of ours. And then all the enemies of the Redeemer's kingdom will be completely conquered; not only "he who had the power of death," that is, the devil, Heb. ii. 14, but the "last enemy shall be destroyed," that is, death, 1 Cor. xv. 26. "Death will be swallowed up in victory," ver. 24.

CHAPTER IV.

Exhortations to several Christian duties, as steadfastness, unanimity, joy, &c., ver. 1—9. The apostle's grateful acknowledgments of the Philippians' kindness to him, with expressions of his own content, and desire of their good, ver. 10—19. He concludes the epistle with praise, salutations, and blessing, ver. 20—23.

iii. 2. "Dogs:" the impure (Rev. xii. 15). "Concision:" the apostle will not say "circumcision," as this, though now done away in Christ, had still some spiritual teaching; but uses a term of reproach—mere cutting, useless mutilation, on which the "evil workers" insisted as necessary to salvation.

iii. 7. "Gain to me:" these were gains to him as a Jew, giving him influence.

iii. 8. "Win Christ:" not the favour of Christ, as Grotius, but HEREFORE, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved. 2 I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord. 3 And I intreat thee also, true yokefellow, help those women which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellowlabourers, whose names are in the book of life. 4 Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice. 5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand. 6 Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. 7 And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. 8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. 9 Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you.

The apostle begins the chapter with exhortations to divers Christian duties:

First. To steadfastness in our Christian profession, ver. 1. It is inferred from the close of the foregoing chapter, "Therefore stand fast," &c. Seeing our conversation is in heaven, and we look for the Saviour to come from thence, and fetch us thither, therefore let us stand fast. Note, The believing hope and prospect of eternal life should engage us to be steady, and even, and constant in our Christian course. Observe here.

1st. The compellations are very endearing. "My brethren dearly beloved, and longed for, my joy and crown;" and again, "My dearly beloved." Thus he expresses the pleasure he took in them, the kindness he had for them, to convey his exhortations to them with so much the greater advantage. He looked upon them as his brethren, though he was a great apostle; "All we are brethren." There is difference of gifts, graces, and attainments, yet being renewed by the same spirit, after the same image, we are brethren; as the children of the same parents, though of different ages, statures, and complexions. Being brethren, First. He loved them, and loved them dearly. "Dearly beloved," and again, "My dearly beloved." Warm affections become ministers and Christians towards one another. Brotherly love must always go along with the brotherly relation. Secondly. He loved them, and longed for them; longed to see them, and hear from them; longed for their welfare, and was earnestly desirous of it. "I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ," ch. i. 8. Thirdly. He loved them, and rejoiced in them. They were his joy; he had no greater joy than to hear of their spiritual health and prosperity. "I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in the truth," 2 Jno. 4; 3 Jno. 4. Fourthly. He loved them, and gloried in them. They were his crown as well as his joy. Never was proud ambitious man more pleased with the ensigns of honour than Paul was with the evidences of the sincerity of their faith and obedience. All this is to prepare his way to greater regard.

2nd. The exhortation itself. "So stand fast in the Lord." Being in Christ, they must stand fast in him, that is, even and steady in their walk with him, and close and constant unto the end. Or, to "stand fast in the Lord" is to stand fast in his strength, and by his grace; not trusting in ourselves, and disclaiming any sufficiency of our own. We must be "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," Eph. vi. 10. So stand fast, so as you have done hitherto; stand fast unto the end, so as you are my beloved, and my joy, and crown; so stand fast, as those in whose welfare and perseverance I am so nearly interested and concerned.

Secondly. He exhorts them to unanimity and mutual assistance; ver. 2, 3. "I beseech Euodias and Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord." This is directed to some particular persons. Sometimes there is need of applying the general precepts of the Gospel to particular persons and cases. Euodias and Syntyche it seems were at variance, either one with the other or with the church; either upon a civil account,—it may be they were engaged in a lawsuit,—or upon a religious account, it may be they were of different opinions and sentiments. Pray, saith he, desire them from me to be of "the same mind in the Lord;" that is, that they will keep the peace, and live in love; be of the same mind one with another, not thwarting and contradicting; and that they be of the same mind with the rest of the church, not acting in opposition to them. Then he exhorts to mutual assistance, ver. 3, and that he directs to particular persons. "I intreat thee also, true yoke-fellow." Who this person was he calls "true yoke-fellow" is uncertain. Some think Epaphroditus, who is supposed to be one of the pastors of the church of the Philippians. Others think it was some eminent good woman, perhaps Paul's wife, because he exhorts as Bishop Hall, "to lay fast hold of him, to receive him into our bosoms, and so to make him ours and ourselves his, that we may be joined to him as our head."

iii. 10. "Know him:" see 2 Pet. i. 8. "Power of his resurrection:" "As securing our final justification, our triumph over death, and participation in his glory" (Ellicott). See Col. iii. 1—4. "Conformable:" "Sharing the likeness of his death" (Conybeare). See Gal. ii. 20. "There should be no greater comfort to Christian persons than to be his yoke-fellow to help the women which laboured with him. Whoever was the yoke-fellow with the apostle, must be a yoke-fellow too with his friends. It seems there were women who laboured with Paul in the Gospel; not in the public ministry, for the apostle expressly forbids that, 1 Tim. ii. 12, "I suffer not a woman to teach;" but by entertaining the ministers, visiting the sick, instructing the ignorant, convincing the erroneous. Thus women may be helpful to ministers in the work of the Gospel. Now, says the apostle, do thou help them. They who help others should be helped themselves when there is occasion. Help them, that is, join with them, strengthen their hands, encourage them in their difficulties.

[This "true yoke-fellow" is generally supposed to have been the husband of one of these women, the word being in the masculine, and probably an officer in the church. He was to help them to come to an agreement, (who so fit to advise and counsel for that purpose), either in co-operating with the church in the same work of Christian zeal as heretofore, or of opposition to Judaizing teachers. Observe, Men of standing in the church must interfere to prevent differences from impeding Christian affection and co-operation, as the strong ought to help the weak, that they may be kept from falling, and made to "stand fast in the Lord."]

"With Clement also, and other my fellow-labourers." Paul had a kindness for all his fellow-labourers; and as he had found the benefit of their assistance, he concluded how comfortable it would be to them to have the assistance of others. Of his fellow-labourers he saith, "Whose names are in the book of life;" that is, either they were chosen of God from all eternity, or registered and enrolled in the corporation and society to which the privilege of eternal life belongs, alluding to the custom among the Jews and Gentiles of registering the inhabitants or the freemen of a city. So we read of their "names being written in heaven," Lu. x. 20; and "not blotting his name out of the book of life," Rev. iii. 5; and of "them who are written in the Lamb's book of life," Rev. xxi. 27. Observe, There is a book of life; there are names in that book, and not characters and conditions only. We cannot search into that book, or know whose names are written there, but we may in a judgment of charity conclude, that they who labour in the Gospel, and are faithful to the interest of Christ and souls, have their names in the book of life.

[Does not the "book of life" refer here to the custom of enrolling the names of citizens who have conducted themselves well, with some mark of distinction and emphasis affixed to their names, as having to receive particular commendation and honour in the future assembling of them for the purpose of reviewing their conduct? All Christians have their names "written in heaven," but none with more distinct recognition than those that have been eminently pious and useful. Note, Co-operators with zealous and useful ministers will share in their recompense.]

Secondly, He exhorts to holy joy and delight in God. "Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say rejoice," ver. 4. All our joy must terminate in God, and our thoughts of God must be delightful thoughts. "Delight thyself in the Lord," Ps. xxxvii. 4, and "in the multitude of our thoughts within us" (grievous and afflicting thoughts), "his comforts delight our souls," Ps. xciv. 19, and our "meditation of him is sweet," Ps. civ. 34. Observe, It is our duty and privilege to rejoice in God, and to rejoice in him always, at all times, in all conditions, even when we suffer for him, or are afflicted by him. We must not think the worse of him or of his ways for the hardships we meet with in his service. There is enough in God to furnish us with matter of joy in the worst circumstance on earth. He had said it before, ch. iii. 1, "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord." Here he saith it again, "Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say rejoice." Joy in God is a duty of great consequence in the Christian life; and Christians need to be again and again called to it. If good men have not a continual feast, it is their own fault.

[Joy is a duty at all times, to be moderated in a degree by circumstances that may shade it, when sorrow is allowable, ("If needs be ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations," but not to be wholly superseded. As the Christian's cause for "joy in the Lord" is greater at all times than ever it can be for sorrow, such a preponderance of sorrow as excludes joy is a sin. Note, The sun of spiritual joy must not cease to give its light when covered with the darkest cloud, and to make it pierce through it.)]

Fourthly, We are here exhorted to candour, and gentleness, and good temper towards our brethren. "Let your moderation be known to all men," ver. 5, that is, in things indifferent do not run into extremes; avoid bigotry and animosity, judge charitably concerning one another. The word moderation signifies "a good disposition towards other men;" and this moderation is explained, Rom. xiv. Some understand it of patient bearing afflictions, or sober enjoyment of worldly good; and so it well agrees with the following verse. The reason is, "the Lord is at hand." The consideration of our Master's approach, and our final account, should keep us from smiting our fellow-servants, support us under present sufferings, and moderate our affections to outward good. He will take vengeance on your enemies, and reward your patience.

[Both the parts of this verse shew that he considers them as in a state of persecution; "moderation" (meekness or gentleness, as the word properly imports,) being peculiarly suited to that state, and the "Lord's being at hand" a cogent motive to excite them to it. And as the adversaries against whom he particularly encourages them were the Jews or Judaizing teachers, the Lord's being at hand may well enough be interpreted of the overthrow which the Lord would soon bring upon the Jews, and which by the destruction of the temple, and the abolition of the greatest part of the Jewish service, would in a manner put an end to their contest, as well as be an instance of vengeance on the virulent enemies of the Christian cause.]

Fifthly, Here is a caution against disquieting, perplexing care; ver. 16, "Be careful for nothing;" μὴδὲν μεριμνᾶτε, the same expression with that, Mat. vi. 25, "Take no thought for your life;" that is, anxious care and distracting thought in the wants and difficulties of life. Observe, That it is the duty and interest of Christians to live without care. There is a care of diligence, which is our duty, and consists in a wise forecast and due concern; but there is a care of diffidence and distrust, which is our sin and folly, and which only perplexes and distracts the mind. "Be careful for nothing," so as by your care to distrust God, and unfit yourselves for his service.

Sixthly, As a sovereign antidote against perplexing care, he recommends to us constant prayer. "In every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God." Observe, 1. We must not only keep up stated times for prayer, but we must pray upon every particular emergency. "In every thing by prayer." When any thing burthens our spirits, we must ease our minds by prayer; when our affairs are perplexed or distressed, we must seek direction and support. 2. We must join thanksgiving with our prayers and supplications. We must not only seek supplies of good, but own receipts of mercy. Grateful acknowledgments of what we have argue a right disposition of mind, and are prevailing motives for farther blessings. 3. Prayer is offering up our desires to God, or making them known to him. "Let your requests be made known to God." Not that God needs to be told either our wants or desires, for he knows them better than we can tell him; but he will know them from us, and have us shew our regards and concern, express our value of the mercy, and sense of our dependence on him. 4. The effect of this will be "the peace of God keeping our hearts," ver. 7. "The peace of God," that is, the comfortable sense of our reconciliation to God, and interest in his favour, and the hope of the heavenly blessedness and enjoyment of God hereafter, "which passeth all understanding," is a greater good than can be sufficiently valued or duly expressed; "It hath not entered into the heart of man," 1 Cor. ii. 9. This peace will "keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus," that is, keep us from sinning under our troubles, and from sinking under them; keep us calm and sedate, without discomposure of passion, and with inward satisfaction. "Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee," Isa. xvi. 3.

Seventhly, We are exhorted to get and keep a good name; a name for good things with God and good men. "Whatsoever things are true and honest," ver. 8. A regard to truth in our words and engagements, and to decency and becomingness in our behaviour, suitable to our circumstances and condition of life. "Whatsoever things are just and pure," agreeable to the rules of justice and righteousness in all our dealings with men, and without the impurity or mixture of sin. "Whatsoever things are lovely and of good report," that is, amiable, and will render us beloved, and will make us well spoken of, as well as well thought of, by others. "If there is any virtue, if there is any praise," any thing really virtuous in any kind and worthy of commendation. Observe, 1. The apostle would have the Christians learn any thing which was good of their heathen neighbours. "If there be any virtue, think of these things;" imitate them in what is truly excellent among them, and let them not outdo you in any instance of goodness. We should not be ashamed to learn any good thing of bad men, or those who have not our advantages. 2. Virtue hath its praise, and will have. We should walk in all the ways of virtue, and abide therein; and then, whether our praise be of men or no, it will be of God, Rom. ii. 29.

In these things he proposeth himself to them for an example; ver. 9, "Those things which you have learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do." Observe, Paul's doctrine and life were of a piece. What they saw in him was the same thing with what they heard from him. He could propose himself as well as his doctrine to their imitation. It gives a great force to what we say to others when we can appeal to what they have seen in us. And this is the way to have the God of peace with us, to keep close to our duty to him. "The Lord is with us while we are with him."

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity. 11 Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. 12 I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. 13 I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me. 14 Notwithstanding ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction. 15 Now ye Philippians know also, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. 16 For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity. 17 Not because I desire a gift: but I desire fruit that may abound to your account. 18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of made like unto Christ, by suffering patiently adversities, troubles, and sicknesses. . . . Our way to eternal joy is to suffer here with Christ, and our door to enter into eternal life is gladly to die with Christ" ("Visitation of the Sick").

iii. 11. "If by," &c.: not an expression of doubt, but of humility. "The resurrection:" the first resurrection (1 Thess. iv. 16; Rev. xx. 6).

iii. 12. The word rendered by "attain" in verses 11 and 12 in the Authorised Version is not the same word in the Greek. "Already won," "already acquired" or "received," would in this verse be better." From verses 8—11 "it might almost seem as if he represented the whole work done, the victory already gained, the goal actually reached. It might have been said, 'This man exhibits himself to us as a specimen and model of absolute perfection.' . . . To disclaim such an assumption, to state explicitly what he is not, as well as what he is; to show what a Christian may say of himself, and Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, wellpleasing to God. 19 But my God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

In these verses we have the thankful grateful acknowledgment which the apostle makes of the kindness of the Philippians in sending him a present for his support, now he was a prisoner at Rome. And here,

First. He takes occasion from hence to acknowledge their former kindness to him, and to make mention of them, ver. 15, 16. Paul had a grateful spirit; for though what his friends did for him was nothing in comparison of what he deserved from them, and the obligations he had laid upon them, yet he speaks of their kindness as if it had been a piece of generous charity, when it was really far short of a just debt. If they had each of them contributed half their estates to him they had not given him too much, since they owed to him even their own souls; and yet, when they sent a small present to him, how kindly doth he take it, how thankfully doth he mention it, even in this epistle which was to be left upon record, and read in the churches through all ages! so that, wherever this epistle shall be read, there shall this which they did to Paul be told for a memorial of them. Surely never was present so well repaid. He minds them that "in the beginning of the Gospel no church communicated with him as to giving and receiving, but they only," ver. 15. They not only maintained him comfortably while he was with them, but when he departed from Macedonia they sent tokens of their kindness after him, and this when no other church did so besides. None but they sent after him their carnal things, in consideration of what they had reaped of his spiritual things. In works of charity we are ready to ask what other people do, but the church of the Philippians never considered that. It redounded so much the more to their honour that they were the only church who were thus just and generous. "Even in Thessalonica" (when he was departing from Macedonia) "you sent once and again to my necessity," ver. 15. Observe, 1. It was but little which they sent. They sent only to his necessity, just such things as he had need of; perhaps it was according to their ability; and he did not desire superfluities or dainties. 2. It is an excellent thing to see those to whom God has abounded in the gifts of his grace abounding in grateful returns to his people and ministers, according to their own ability and their necessity. "Ye sent once and again." Many people make it an excuse for their charity, that they have given once; why should the charge come upon them again? But the Philippians "sent once and again;" they oftentimes relieved and refreshed him in his necessities. He makes this mention of their former kindness, not only in his own gratitude, but for their encouragement.

[As what he says here is a tacit reflection on the Thessalonians, so it heightens his commendation of the Philippians. It is therefore a precious reflection which Chrysostom makes upon this place, when he says, this is a great commendation of the Philippians, that when he resided in the metropolis (Thessalonica) he should be supported by a little city (Philippi). That St. Paul was maintained at Thessalonica by his own labour, and not by their contributions, appears from 1 Thes. ii. 5, 6-9; 2 Thes. iii. 7, 8, 9.]

Secondly. He excuses their neglect of late. It seems for some time they had not sent to inquire after him, or sent him any present; but now at the last their care of him flourished again, ver. 10, like a tree in the spring which seemed all the winter to be quite dead. Now in conformity to the example of his great Master, instead of upbraiding them for their neglect, he makes an excuse for them: "Wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity." How could they lack opportunity, if they had been resolved upon it? they might have sent a messenger on purpose; but the apostle is willing to suppose, in favour of them, that they would have done it, if a fair opportunity had offered. How contrary is this to the carriage of many to their friends, by whom neglects which really are excusable are resented very heinously; when Paul excused that which he had reason enough to resent?

Thirdly. He commends their present liberality. "Notwithstanding ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction," ver. 14. It is a good work to succour and help a good minister in trouble. Here see what is the nature of true Christian sympathy; not only to be concerned for our friends in their troubles, but to do what we can to help them. They communicated with his affliction, in relieving him under it. He who saith, "Be ye warmed, be ye filled, and giveth not those things they have need of, what doth it profit," Jam. ii. 16. He rejoiced greatly in it, ver. 10; because it was an evidence of their affection to him, and the success of his ministry among them. When the fruit of their charity abounded towards the apostle, it appeared the fruit of his ministry abounded among them.

["I rejoiced in the Lord greatly." He uses a very skilful way here of commending the generosity of his benefactors, wherein he signifies, not only that they had done their duty, but that the Lord had favoured him by stirring them up to it, and that they had given him much occasion of thankfulness to the Lord; which shews his pious disposition, who in such things took special notice of the Lord's hand and kindness to him.]

Fourthly. He takes care to obviate the ill use some might make of his taking so much notice of what was sent him. It did not proceed either from discontent and distrust, ver. 11; or from covetousness and love of the world, ver. 12.

1. It did not come from discontent or distrust of Providence. "Not that I speak in respect of want," ver. 11; not in respect of any want he felt, or of any want he feared: as to the former he was content with the little he had, and that satisfied him; as to the latter he depended upon the providence of God to provide for him from day to day, and that satisfied him; so that he did not speak in respect of want any way. "For I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." We have here an account of Paul's learning, not that which he got at the foot of Gamaliel, but that which he got at the feet of Christ. He had learned to be content; and that was a lesson he had as much need to learn as most men, considering the hardships and sufferings with which he was exercised. He was in bonds and imprisonments and necessities often; but in all he had learned to be content, that is, to bring his mind to his condition, and make the best of it. "I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound," ver. 12. This is a special act of grace, to accommodate ourselves to every condition of life, and carry an equal temper of mind through all the varieties of our state. 1st. To accommodate ourselves to an afflicted condition; to know how to be abased, how to be hungry, how to suffer want, so as not to be overcome by the temptations of it, either to lose our comfort in God, or distrust his providence, or to take any indirect course for our own supply. 2nd. To a prosperous condition; to know how to abound, how to be full, so as not to be proud, or secure, or luxurious. And this is as hard a lesson as the other; for the temptations of fullness and prosperity are not less than those of affliction and want. But how must we learn it? "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me," ver. 13. We have need of strength from Christ to enable us to perform not only those duties which are purely Christian, but even those which are the fruit of moral virtue. We need his strength to teach us to be content in every condition. The apostle had seemed to boast of himself and of his own strength, "I know how to be abased," ver. 12; but here he transfers all the praise to Christ. What, do I talk of knowing how to be abased, and how to abound? it is only "through Christ who strengtheneth me," that I can do it, not in my own strength. [Hence the fathers observe three things. 1. That the art of contentment requires much learning, exercise, and meditation. 2. That it is as difficult to learn how to be full as to be hungry; abundance having destroyed more than penury, and exposed them to more pernicious lusts. 3. That our proficiency in this, or any other virtue, is to be ascribed, not to ourselves, but to the Divine assistance.] So we are required to be "strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," Eph. vi. 10, and to be "strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. ii. 1; and we are "strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man," Eph. iii. 16. The word in the original is a participle of the present tense, ἐν τῷ ἰδυναιμένῳ με Χριστῷ, and denotes a present and continued act, as if he had said, Through Christ who is strengthening me, and does continually strengthen me; it is by his constant and renewed strength I am enabled to act in every thing; I wholly depend upon him for all my spiritual power.

2. It did not come from covetousness, or an affection to worldly wealth. "Not because I desire a gift," ver. 17; that is, I welcome your kindness, not because it adds to my enjoyments, but because it adds to your account. He desired it not so much for his own sake, but theirs. "I desire fruit that may abound to your account;" that is, that you may be enabled to make such a good use of your worldly possessions that you may give an account of them with joy. It is not with any design to draw more from you, but to encourage you to such an exercise of beneficence as will meet with a glorious reward hereafter. For my part, saith he, "I have all, and abound," ver. 18. What can a man desire more than enough? I do not desire a gift for the gift's sake, for, "I have all, and abound." They sent him a small token, and he desired no more; he was not solicitous for a present superfluity, or a future supply: "I am full, having received from Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you." Note, A good man will soon have enough of this world; not only of living in it, but of receiving from it. A covetous worldling, if he has never so much, would still have more; but a heavenly Christian, though he hath little, hath enough.

Fifthly. The apostle assures them that God did accept, and would recompense, their kindness to him.

1. He did accept it: "It is an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God." Not a sacrifice of atonement, for none makes atonement for sin but Christ; but a sacrifice of acknowledgment, and well-pleasing to God. It was more acceptable to God as it was the fruit of their grace, than it was to Paul as it was the supply of his want. "With such sacrifice God is well pleased," Heb. xiii. 16.

2. He would recompense it; "But my God shall supply all your wants according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus," ver. 19. He doth as it were draw a bill upon the exchequer in heaven, and leaves it to God to make them amends for the kindness they had shewed him. He shall do it not only as your God, but as my God, who takes what is done to me as done to himself. You supplied my needs, according to your poverty; and he shall supply yours, according to his riches. But still it is by Christ Jesus; through him we have grace to do that which is good, and through him we must expect the reward of it; not of debt, but of grace; for the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him, because we receive the more from him.

20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen. 21 Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you. 22 All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar's household. 23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

The apostle concludes the epistle in these verses.

First. With praises to God; "Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever, Amen," ver. 20. Observe, 1. That God is to be considered by us as our Father; "Now unto God and our Father." It is a great condescension and favour in God to own the relation of Father to sinners, and allow us to say to him, "Our Father," and it is a title peculiar to the gospel dispensation; and it is a great privilege and encouragement to us to consider him as our Father, as one so nearly related, and who bears so tender an affection towards us. We should look upon God, under all our weakness and fears, not as a tyrant or an enemy, but as a Father, who is disposed to pity us, and help us. 2. We must ascribe glory to God as a Father; the glory of his own excellence, and of all his mercy unto us. We must thankfully own the receipt of all from him, and give the praise of all to him. And our praise must be constant and perpetual; it must be "Glory for ever and ever."

Secondly. With salutations to his friends at Philippi. "Salute every saint in Christ Jesus," ver. 21; that is, give my hearty love to all the Christians in your parts. He desires remembrances not only to the bishops and deacons, and the church in general, but to every particular saint. Paul had a kind affection to all good Christians.

Thirdly. He sends salutations from those who were at Rome. "The brethren who are with me salute you," that is, the ministers and all the saints here send their affectionate remembrances to you. "Chiefly they who are of Cæsar's household," the Christian converts who belong to the emperor's court. Observe, 1. There were saints in Cæsar's household. Though Paul was imprisoned at Rome for preaching the Gospel, by the emperor's command, yet there were some Christians in his own family. The Gospel early obtained among some of the rich and great. Perhaps the apostle fared the better, and received some favour by the means of his friends at court. 2. "Chiefly they, &c." Observe, That they being bred at court were more complaisant than the rest. See what an ornament to religion sanctified civility is.

Fourthly. The apostolical benediction as usual. "The grace of our Lord Jesus be with you all, Amen;" that is, the free favour and goodwill of Christ be your portion and happiness.

what he cannot say consistently with true humility, is the object of the paragraph before us. "Do not suppose me to mean that, when I became a Christian, I at once received, or that I have even now received, the whole thing aimed at and proposed to me" (Vaughan, "Lectures on Philippians").

iii. 20. "Conversation;" better translated by "country" or "state;" heaven is the country to which, as Christians, we belong; the spiritual constitution which we acknowledge (Gal. iv. 26; Eph. ii. 19).

iii. 21. Not "our vile body," but "the body of our humiliation" (Wickliffe, Rheims, Alford Ellicott, Wiesinger, &c.). "Christ once had such a humiliation, and has passed through it to his glory, and he shall change us so as to be like him" (Alford).

iv. 1. See 1 Thess. ii. 19.

iv. 3. Not "those women," &c., as Authorised Version, but "them"—i.e., Euodias and Syntyche. "Help them (to be reconciled), for they strove earnestly in the work of the glad tidings with me" (Conybeare).

iv. 5. "Moderation:" "The soul of law, the life of justice, and the spirit of right" (Daniel, quoted by Trench).

iv. 8. "Whatever virtue there is, whatever praise." "Praise, the companion of virtue" (Erasmus).

ST. PAUL TO THE COLOSSIANS,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

COLOSSE was a considerable city of Phrygia, and probably not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis; we find these three mentioned together, ch. iv. 13. It is now buried in ruins, and the memory of it chiefly preserved in this epistle. The design of the epistle is to warn them of the danger of the Jewish zealots, who pressed the necessity of observing the ceremonial law, and to fortify them against the mixture of the Gentile philosophy with their Christian principles. He professes a great satisfaction in their steadfastness and constancy, and encourages them to perseverance. It was written about the same time with the epistles to the Ephesians and Philippians, A.D. 62, and in the same place, while he was now prisoner at Rome. He was not idle in his confinement, and the word of God was not bound. This epistle, like that to the Romans, was written to those whom he had never seen, nor had any personal acquaintance with. The church planted at Colosse was not by Paul's ministry, but by the ministry of Epaphras, or Epaphroditus, an evangelist, one whom he delegated to preach the Gospel among the Gentiles; and yet, I. There was a flourishing church at Colosse, and one which was eminent and famous among the churches. One would have thought none should have come to be flourishing churches but they which Paul himself had planted; but here was a flourishing church planted by Epaphras. God is sometimes pleased to make use of the ministry of those who are of less note, and lower gifts, for the doing great service to his church. God uses what hands he pleases, and is not tied to those of note, that the excellence of the power may appear to be of God, and not of men, 2 Cor. iv. 7. II. Though Paul had not the planting of this church, yet he did not therefore neglect it; nor, in writing his epistles, does he make any difference between that and other churches. The Colossians, who were converted by the ministry of Epaphras, were as dear to him, and he as much concerned for their welfare, as the Philippians, or any others who were converted by his ministry. Thus he put an honour upon an inferior minister, and teaches us not to be selfish, nor think all that honour lost which goes beside ourselves. We see, in his example, not to think it a disparagement to us to water what others have planted, or build upon the foundation which others have laid: as he himself, as a wise master-builder, laid the foundation, and another builded thereon, 1 Cor. iii. 10.

[III. The epistle was directed against the tenets and practices of certain false teachers among them. Who these were is a point not satisfactorily determined. It is most probable that they were partly superstitious Judaizing teachers, who diligently inculcated not only the Mosaic laws, but also the absurd notions of the Rabbins; and partly converts from Gentilism, who blended Platonic notions with the doctrines of the Gospel. It is well known that the Platonists entertained singular ideas concerning demons, whom they represented as carrying men's prayers to God, and bringing back the blessings supplicated; and the doctrine of the Jews concerning angels was nearly the same. It appears from the epistle itself that these false teachers inculcated the worship of angels, together with abstinence from animal food, observance of Jewish festivals, mortification of the body by long fasting, and other superstitious rites of the same nature. The apostle waters with this epistle the plants of heavenly faith and love in the Colossians, to preserve them from being weakened and injured by these tares which the enemy had sown amongst them. Paul's prison was a common receptacle out of which have issued those living springs which water and refresh the city of God, and will furnish it to the end of the world with the streams it needs for its irrigation.—L.]

A.D. 64.

CHAPTER I.

The inscription as usual, ver. 1, 2. His thanksgiving to God for what he had heard concerning them—their faith, love, and hope, ver. 3—8. He prays for their knowledge, fruitfulness, and strength, ver. 9—11; gives them an admirable summary of the Christian doctrine concerning the operation of the Spirit, the person of the Redeemer, the work of redemption, and the preaching of it in the Gospel, ver. 12—29.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother, 2 To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

The inscription of this epistle is much the same with the rest, only it is observable, An apostle is a prime minister in the kingdom of Christ, immediately called by Christ, and extraordinarily qualified. Their work was peculiarly to plant the Christian church, and confirm the Christian doctrine. He attributes this not to his own merit, strength, or sufficiency, but to the free grace and goodwill of God. He thought himself engaged to do his utmost as an apostle, because he was made so by the will of God.

Secondly. He joins Timothy in commission with himself, which is another instance of his humility; and, though he elsewhere calls him his son, 2 Tim. ii. 1, yet he here calls him his brother, which is an example to the elder and more eminent ministers to look upon the younger and more obscure as their brethren, and to treat them accordingly with kindness and respect.

Thirdly. He calls the Christians at Colosse "saints and faithful brethren in Christ." As all good ministers, so all good Christians are brethren one to another, who stand in a near relation, and owe a mutual love. And towards God they must be saints, consecrated to his honour, and sanctified by his grace, bearing his image, and aiming at his glory. And in both these, as saints to God, and as brethren to one another, they must be faithful. Faithfulness runs through every character and relation of the Christian life, and is the crown and glory of them all.

"Brethren in Christ." Observe the superiority of this Christian brotherhood to natural consanguinity. This arises from a relation in common to one human parent, producing a family likeness and agreement, and a reciprocal affection and attachment; but that from a relation in common to one more than human,—Divine as well as human,—producing a Divine resemblance and agreement, and an affection, therefore, as superior to the other as the Spirit to the flesh, and the Divine to the human. When the true spirit of Christianity revives in the church, it will be seen in nothing more than in the union of sects in love. The difference between Christian and no Christian will be the great line of distinction and separation; that between Christian and Christian will, by the comparison, be lost sight of and vanish into insignificance. Happy the period when all Christians shall love one another as brethren in Christ!—L.]

Fourthly. The apostolical benediction is the same as usual. "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." He wishes them grace and peace, the free favour of God, and all the blessed fruits of it; all kinds of spiritual blessings, and that "from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ;" jointly from both, and distinctly from each, as in the former epistle.

3 We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you, 4 Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints, 5 For the hope

* By the Rev. W. Harris. Additional Notes from Ferguson's Commentary; and by Rev. Dr. Leifchild, London, marked L.

Introductory.—Of the genuineness of this epistle there were no doubts in ancient times, and, according to Alford and Ellicott, those urged in modern times are not such as to deserve serious consideration. Such as they are they have been completely answered by Davidson, De Wette, and others. For time and place of writing see Introduction to Ephesians.

i. 2. "Grace" in general signifies 'favour,' 'mercy,' 'bounty'; in particular it signifies a gift, more especially a 'spiritual gift,' and in a yet more limited sense the gift of sanctification, or of such spiritual aids as may enable a man to will and do what God has commanded" (Waterland, &c.).

i. 4. "Faith in Christ Jesus:" Christ-centred faith.

i. 5. "Laid up," &c.: this phrase marks its security and futurity. "The word of truth, of the Gospel:" the word of truth, that is, of the Gospel, "in which nothing is contained except truth; in which He who is the truth itself speaks" (Zauchius).

which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel; 6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth: 7 As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellowservant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ; 8 Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

Here he proceeds to the body of the epistle, and begins.

First. With thanksgiving to God for what he had heard concerning them. Though he had no personal acquaintance with them, and knew their state and character only by the reports of others, he gave thanks to God for them that they had embraced the Gospel of Christ, and given proofs of their fidelity to him. Observe, in his prayers for them he gave thanks for them. Thanksgiving ought to be a part of every prayer; and whatever is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. Observe,

1. Whom he gives thanks to. "To God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." In our thanksgiving we must have an eye to God as God. He is the object of thanksgiving as well as prayer, and as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," in and through whom all good comes to us. He is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as well as our Father; and it is matter of encouragement in all our addresses to God that we can look to him as "Christ's Father and our Father, as his God and our God," Jno. xx. 17.

2. What he gives thanks to God for. For the graces of God in them, which were evidences of the grace of God towards them. "Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love, you have to all the saints, for the hope which is laid up for you in heaven," ver. 4, 5. Faith, hope, and love are the three principal graces in the Christian life, and proper matter of our prayer and thanksgiving. 1st. He gives thanks for their "faith in Christ Jesus." That they were brought to believe in him, and take upon them the profession of his religion, and venture their souls upon his undertaking. 2nd. For their love. Besides the general love which is due to all men, there is a particular love owing to the saints, or those who are of the Christian brotherhood, 1 Pet. ii. 17. We must love all the saints, bear an extensive kindness and goodwill to good men, notwithstanding lesser points of difference, and many real weaknesses. Some understand it of their charity to the saints in necessity, which is one branch and evidence of Christian love. 3rd. For their hope. "The hope which is laid up for you in heaven," ver. 5. The happiness of heaven is called their hope, because it is "the thing hoped for; looking for the blessed hope," Tit. ii. 13. What is laid out upon believers in this world is much, but what is laid up for them in heaven is much more. And we have reason to give thanks to God for the hope of heaven which good Christians have, or their well-grounded expectation of the future glory. Their faith in Christ, and love to the saints, had an eye to the hope laid up for them in heaven. The more we fix our hopes on the recompence of reward in the other world, the more free and liberal shall we be of our earthly treasure upon all occasions of good doing.

Secondly. Having blessed God for these graces, he blesses God for the means of grace which they enjoyed. "Whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the Gospel." They had heard in the word of the truth of the Gospel concerning this hope laid up for them in heaven. Observe,

1. That the Gospel is the word of truth, and what we may safely venture our immortal souls upon. It proceeds from the God of truth, and the Spirit of truth, and is a faithful saying. He calls it "the grace of God in truth," ver. 6.

2. It is a great mercy to hear this word of truth, for the great thing we learn from it is the happiness of heaven. "Eternal life is brought to light by the Gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10. They heard of the hope laid up in heaven in the word of the truth of the Gospel, which is come unto you, as it is in all the world, and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you," ver. 6. This Gospel is preached, and bringeth forth fruit in other nations: It has come to you, "as it is in all the world" according to the commission, "Go preach the Gospel in all the nations," and "to every creature." Observe, 1st. That all who hear the word of the Gospel ought to bring forth the fruit of the Gospel, that is, be obedient to it, and have their principles and lives formed according to it. This was the doctrine first preached, "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance," Mat. iii. 8; and our Lord says, "If you know these things, happy are ye if you do them," Jno. xiii. 17. 2nd. That wherever the Gospel comes it will bring forth fruit to the honour and glory of God. "It bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you." We mistake if we think to monopolize the comforts and benefits of the Gospel to ourselves. Doth the Gospel bring forth fruit in us? so it doth in others.

["In all the world." The apostle seems here to have an eye chiefly to God's sending the Gospel to the Gentiles generally, without confining it to the Jews. This was much to his purpose, as it led the Colossians to observe that God had now put an end to the covenant of peculiarity formerly made with the Jews, and by sending his Gospel to the Gentiles, far and near, testified he did not expect they should submit to the Jewish law in order to their being accepted as his people; and by this he likewise magnified the gospel covenant, and the grace of it above the law, which reached to but a small canton of the world.—L.]

Thirdly. He takes this occasion to mention the minister by whom they believed; ver. 7. "As ye also learned of Epaphras, our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ." He mentions him with great respect, to engage their love to him.

1. He calls him his fellow-servant, to signify not only that they served the same Master, but that they were engaged in the same work. They were fellow-labourers in the work of the Lord, though one was an apostle and the other an ordinary minister.

2. He calls him his dear fellow-servant. All the servants of Christ ought to love one another; and it is an endearing consideration that they are engaged in the same service.

3. He represents him as one who was a faithful minister of Christ to them who discharged his trust and fulfilled his ministry among them. Observe, Christ is our proper Master, and we are his ministers. He does not say, Who is your minister, but, Who is the "minister of Christ for you." It is by his authority and appointment, though for the people's service.

4. He represents him as one who gave them a good word: "Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit," ver. 8. He recommends him to their affection from the good report he made of their sincere love to Christ and all his members, which was wrought in them by the Spirit, and is agreeable to the spirit of the Gospel. Faithful ministers are glad to be able to speak well of their people.

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; 10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; 11 Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness;

The apostle proceeds in these verses to pray for them. He heard they were good, and he prayed that they might be better. He was constant in this prayer; "We do not cease to pray for you." It may be he could hear of them but seldom, but he constantly prayed for them. And "desire that you might be filled with the knowledge," &c. Observe, What it is that he begs of God for them.

First. That they might be knowing, intelligent Christians; "Filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding." Observe, 1. The knowledge of our duty is the best knowledge. Mere empty notion of the greatest truths is insignificant. Our knowledge of the will of God must be always practical; we must know it in order to do it. 2. Our knowledge is then a blessing indeed when it is wisdom; that is, when we know how to apply our general knowledge to our particular occasions, and to suit it to all emergencies. 3. Christians should endeavour to be filled with knowledge; not only to know the will of God, but to know more of it, and to "increase in the knowledge of God," as it is ver. 11, and to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour," 2 Pet. iii. 18.

Secondly. That their conversation might be good. Good knowledge without a good life will not profit. Our understanding is then a spiritual understanding when we exemplify it in our way of living. "That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing," ver. 10; that is, as becomes the relation we stand in to him, and the profession we make of him. The agreeableness of our conversation to our religion is pleasing to God, as well as to good men. We walk unto all well-pleasing when we walk in all things according to the will of God. "Being fruitful in every good work." This is what we should aim at. Good words will not do without good works. We must abound in good works, and in every good work; not in some only which are more easy, and suitable, and safe, but in all and every instance of them. There must be a regular, uniform regard to all the will of God. And the more faithful we are in good works, the more we shall increase in the knowledge of God. "He who doth his will shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God," Jno. vii. 17.

Thirdly. That they might be strengthened, "strengthened with all might according to his glorious power," ver. 11; that is, fortified against the temptations of Satan, and furnished for all their duty. It is a great comfort to us that he who undertakes to give strength to his people is a God of power, and of glorious power. Where there is spiritual life, there is still need of spiritual strength, strength for all the actions of the spiritual life. To be strengthened is to be furnished by the grace of God for every good work, and fortified by that grace against every evil one. It is to be enabled to do our duty, and still to hold fast our integrity. The blessed Spirit is the author of this strength; for we are "strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inward man," Eph. iii. 16. The word of God is the means of it, by which he conveys it, and it must be fetched in by prayer. It was in answer to earnest prayer the apostle obtained sufficient grace. In praying for spiritual strength we are not straitened in the promises, and therefore should not be straitened in our own hopes and desires. Observe,

1. He prays that they might be strengthened "with might." This seems a tautology; but he means, that they might be mightily strengthened, or strengthened with might derived from another.

2. It is "with all might." It seems unreasonable that a creature should be strengthened with all might, for that is to make him almighty; but he means, with all that might which we have occasion for to enable us to discharge our duty, or preserve our innocence; that grace which is sufficient for us in all the trials of life, and able to "help us in time of need."

3. It is "according to his glorious power." He means, according to the grace of God; but the grace of God in the hearts of believers is the power of God; and there is a glory in this power; it is an excellent and sufficient power. And the communications of strength are not according to our weakness to whom the strength is communicated, but according to his power from whom it is received. When God gives, he gives like himself; and when he strengthens, he strengthens like himself.

4. The special use of this strength was for suffering work; "That you may be strengthened unto all patience and longsuffering with joyfulness." He prays not only that they might be supported under their troubles, but strengthened for them; the reason is, there is work to be done even when we are suffering. And they who are strengthened "according to his glorious power," are strengthened, 1st. To all patience. When patience hath its perfect work, Jas. i. 4, then we are strengthened to all patience; when we not only bear our troubles patiently, but receive them as gifts from God, and are thankful for them. To you it is given to suffer, Phil. i. 29; when we bear our troubles well, though ever so many, and the circumstances of them ever so aggravating, then we bear them with all patience. And the same reason for bearing one trouble will hold for our bearing another, if it be a good reason. And all patience includes all the kinds of it; not only bearing patience, but waiting patience. 2nd. This patience is even unto longsuffering; that is, patience drawn out to a great length; not only to bear trouble for awhile, but to bear it as long as God pleases to continue it. 3rd. It is with joyfulness. To rejoice in tribulation; to take joyfully the spoiling of our goods, and rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer for his name; to have joy as well as patience in the troubles of life. This we could never do by any strength of our own, but as we are strengthened by the grace of God.

knowledge of God is the means by which the believer increases in holiness of living.

i. 11. Not "glorious power," but "power of his glory." "The power which is the attribute of his glory indicates the measure and degree in which the Colossians will be strengthened" (Ellicott).

i. 12. "The inheritance of the saints in light;" the saints enter on the full enjoyment of their inheritance only in heaven, though it may be in part enjoyed here also (1 John i. 5-7).

the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: 14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: 15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature: 16 For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: 17 And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. 18 And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence. 19 For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; 20 And, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven. 21 And you, that were sometime alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled 22 In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unproveable in his sight: 23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister; 24 Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church: 25 Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; 26 Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints: 27 To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you, the hope of glory: 28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus: 29 Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

[The "us" and "we" in the 12th and 13th verse plainly signify the Gentile converts. These verses, therefore, may be considered as partly occasioned by what he had just said, of their bearing their sufferings with joyfulness, for they remind the Colossians of the reason they had for this, and put them in the way of doing it; namely, the great kindness of God towards them, in calling them out of their former heathenish state of ignorance and darkness, when they were the subjects of the devil's kingdom, to belong to the kingdom of God's dear Son, wherein they were no longer under the power of darkness, but the recipients and possessors of a glorious light.—L.]

Here is a summary of the doctrine of the Gospel concerning the great work of our redemption by Christ. It comes in here not as the matter of a sermon, but as the matter of a thanksgiving; for our salvation by Christ furnishes us with abundant matter of thanksgiving in every view of it. "Giving thanks unto the Father," ver. 12. He does not discourse of the work of redemption in the natural order of it; for then he should speak of the purchase of it first, and then of the application of it. But here he inverts the order, because, in our sense and feeling of it, the application goes before the purchase. We first find the benefits of redemption in our own hearts, and then are led by those streams to the original and fountain head. The order and connexion of the apostle's discourse may be considered in the following manner.

First. He speaks concerning the operations of the Spirit of grace upon us. And we must give thanks for them, because by these we are qualified for an interest in the mediation of the Son. "Giving thanks to the Father," &c., ver. 12, 13. It is spoken of as the work of the Father, because the Spirit of grace is the Spirit of the Father, and the Father works in us by his Spirit. They in whom the work of grace is wrought must give thanks unto the Father.

i. 13. "Darkness," as contrasted with "light" above. The Lord of Light is the ruler of the saints, the Prince of Darkness is the ruler of the ungodly. "His dear Son;" literally, "the Son of his love."

i. 15—17. The Redeemer in his pre-incarnate state, in relation to God and his creation. "In Christ appeared most perfectly how wise, powerful, and good God was." "The first-born of" (i.e., before) every creature. "The visible things in heaven are the sun, moon

If we have the comfort of it, he must have the glory of it. Now, what is it which is wrought for us in the application of redemption?

1. He hath "delivered us from the power of darkness," ver. 13. He has rescued us from the state of heathenish darkness and wickedness; that is, he has saved us from the dominion of sin, which is darkness, 1 Jno. i. 6, and from the dominion of Satan, who is the "prince of darkness," Eph. vi. 12, and from the damnation of hell, which is "outer darkness," Mat. xxv. 30. They are "called out of darkness," 1 Pet. ii. 9.

2. He hath "translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son;" that is, brought us into the gospel state, and made us members of the church of Christ, which is a state of light and purity; "Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord," Eph. v. 8; "Who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9. They were made willing subjects of Christ who were the slaves of Satan. The conversion of a sinner is the translation of a soul into the kingdom of Christ out of the kingdom of the devil. The power of sin is shaken off, and the power of Christ submitted to. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes them free from the law of sin and death. And it is the kingdom of "his dear Son," or the Son of his peculiar love, his "beloved Son," Mat. iii. 17, and eminently "the beloved," Eph. i. 6.

3. He hath not only done this, but hath "made us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light," ver. 12; that is, he hath prepared us for the eternal happiness of heaven, as the Israelites divided the promised land by lot; and given us the earnest and assurance of it. This he mentions first, because it is the first indication of the future blessedness, that by the grace of God we find ourselves in some measure prepared for it. God gives grace and glory, and we are here told what they both are. 1st. What that glory is. It is "the inheritance of the saints in light." It is an inheritance, and belongs to them as children, which is the best security, and the sweetest tenure; "If children, then heirs," Rom. viii. 17. And it is an inheritance of the saints, proper to sanctified souls. They who are not saints on earth will never be saints in heaven. And it is an inheritance in light; the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and joy, by communion with God, who is light, and the Father of lights, Jas. i. 17; Jno. i. 6. 2nd. What is this grace. It is a meetness for the inheritance; "He hath made us meet to be partakers;" that is, suited and fitted us for the heavenly state by a proper temper and habit of soul; and he makes us meet by the powerful influence of his Spirit. It is the effect of the Divine power to change the heart, and make it heavenly. Observe, That all who are designed for heaven hereafter are prepared for heaven now. As they who live and die unsanctified go out of the world with their hell about them, so they who are sanctified and renewed go out of the world with their heaven about them. They who have the inheritance of sons have the education of sons and the disposition of sons. They "have the Spirit of adoption, whereby they cry, Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15; "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father," Gal. iv. 6. This meetness for heaven is the earnest of the Spirit in our heart, which is part of payment, and assures the full payment. They who are sanctified shall be glorified, Rom. viii. 30, and will be for ever indebted to the grace of God which hath sanctified them.

Secondly. Concerning the person of the Redeemer. And glorious things are here said of him; for blessed Paul was full of Christ, and took all occasions to speak honourably of him. He speaks of him distinctly as God and as Mediator.

1. As God he speaks of him, ver. 15—17.

1st. He is "the image of the invisible God." Not as man was made in the image of God, Gen. i. 27, in his natural faculties and dominion over the creatures. No, he is "the express image of his person," Heb. i. 3. He is so the image of God as the son is the image of his father, who has a natural likeness to him; and as he who hath seen him hath seen the Father; and his "glory was the glory of the only begotten of the Father," Jno. i. 14; xiv. 9.

2d. "The image of the invisible God." The representation of those perfections and attributes of the Divine essence, which are inapprehensive to all created beings, except through such an image or counterpart. This phrase destroys the two great heresies that have raged in the church; one, which confounds the persons of the Godhead, saying that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are but different names or manifestations of one and the same persons of the Deity. But though we can speak of one person being the image of another, it will be absurd to speak of him as the image of himself. The other heresy respects the nature of the Godhead. Christ is said, by such, to be the highest of all created beings, but not really God. How, then, could he be the express or perfect image of the invisible Deity, of his eternity, immensity, immutability, omniscience, and omnipresence? And here too we see the condemnation of the worship of images. What image can we have of the invisible Deity but that of Christ? Having this living, intelligent, Divine image of him, shall we add to it, or substitute for it, a dead, senseless, corruptible thing? What a corruption of Christianity is the papistical bowing to images. How can it be cleared from the idolatry so pointedly forbidden, and so fearfully threatened, in the second and third of the ten commandments? The Godhead, in the persons of the Trinity, is, according to the Scripture, the only proper object, in the whole universe, of devout reverence and worship, 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6. "Thou shalt have no other gods but me."—L.]

2nd. He is the "firstborn of every creature." Not that he is himself a creature; for it is πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, born or begotten before "all the creation," or any creature was made; which is the Scripture way of representing eternity, and by which the eternity of God is represented to us. "I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was; when there was no depth—before the mountains were settled—while as yet he had not made the earth," Pr. viii. 23—26. And it signifies his dominion over all things; as the firstborn in a family is heir and lord of all, so he is the heir of all things, Heb. i. 2. The word, with only the change of the accent, πρωτότοκος, signifies actively, "the first begetter or producer of all things," and so it well agrees with the following clause.—Vid. Isidor. Peleustotum, Epist. 30, lib. 3.

3d. "Firstborn" does evidently not mean here primogeniture. The apostle's aim is to exalt Christ above all creatures; but how would this be done by saying he was the first of them? Priority is not necessarily superiority. Many things are first in order of time or being that are not so in excellence. The body of man was first made, and afterwards his intelligent, immortal spirit. But as the firstborn of the Jews was head and lord of the family, the phrase came at length to be used to signify only headship and government, irrespective of primogeniture, or even of being of the same race or kindred. God covenanted with David to make him "his firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth;" see Ps. lxxxix. 17. Certainly many of them were born before him, and of a different extraction from him; but he was far above them all in receiving his office immediately from God, and being designed in it a type of Christ, endowed with prophetic gifts, and indulged with Divine inspirations. So Christ above all creatures, and, therefore, as it follows, the head of them all; not from being before them merely, but from being of a transcendently higher nature, and, indeed, their Creator and Preserver. Note the absurd conclusions into which men will often run to avoid the clear and unambiguous sense of the Scriptures, as explained by itself.—L.]

stars; the invisible, the angels; the visible things on earth are plants, elements; animals: the invisible are human souls" (Davenport). "For him: — the end, destination of the world, here referred to the Son, is in Rom. xi. 36 referred to the Father. If the Son had not been God, such an interchange of important relations would never have seemed possible" (Ellicott). "By (rather 'in') him all things consist:" "This declaration," says Waterland, "is equivalent to Acts xvii. 28."

the Divine nature dwell in him, and because of all he has done for the Church. "By him (the Redeemer) to reconcile all things unto himself (God):" Ellicott warns against speculating too much on the reconciliation of the finite and infinite. "Things in heaven:" "How the reconciliation of Christ affects the spiritual world we know not and dare not speculate; this, however, we may fearlessly assert, that the efficacy of the sacrifice of the eternal Son is infinite and limitless, that it is the blessed medium by which, between God and

Old Testament? the answer is to be found in the construction the Jews, even the pious amongst them, put upon that conversion. It was the universal supposition that it would be through the door of circumcision, and the extension therefore of the Jewish religion and Jewish dominion throughout the world. From this fond conceit the apostles themselves were with difficulty, and but gradually, weaned. But Paul from the first understood the admission of Gentiles to the equal privileges and blessings of the Gospel by faith in Christ, without subjugation to the Mosaic yoke; and insisted upon it, till the breaking down of the whole Levitical system, by the destruction of Jerusalem, settled the controversy, and put an end to the dispute.—L.

4. The duty of those who are interested in this redemption. "If ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel which ye have heard," ver. 23. We must continue in the faith grounded and settled, and not be moved away from the hope of the Gospel, that is, so well fixed in our minds as not to be moved from it by any temptations. We must be steadfast and unmoveable, 1 Cor. xv. 58, and "hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering," Heb. x. 23. Observe, Then only can we expect the happy end of our faith when we continue in the faith, and are so far grounded and settled in it as not to be moved from it. We must not "draw back unto perdition, but believe unto the saving of the soul," Heb. x. 39. We must be "faithful to the death," through all trials, that we may receive "the crown of life, and receive the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls," 1 Pet. i. 9.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle's concern for the Colossians, ver. 1—4; repeated again, ver. 5. He cautions them against false teachers among the Jews, ver. 6—8; and against the Gentile philosophy, ver. 9—13; represents the privilege of Christians, ver. 14—16; and concludes with a caution against the Judaizing teachers, and those who would introduce the worship of angels, ver. 17—22.

DOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh; 2 That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgement of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ; 3 In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. 4 And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words. 5 For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ.

We may observe here the great concern which Paul had for these Colossians, and the other churches, which he had not any personal knowledge of. The apostle had never been at Colosse, and the church planted there was not of his planting, and yet he had as tender a care of it as if it had been the only people of his charge; ver. 1, "For I would that you knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea; and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh." Observe, 1. Paul's care of the church was such as amounted to a conflict; he was in a sort of agony, and had a constant fear concerning them what would become of them. Herein he was a follower of his Master, who was in an agony for us, and was heard in that he feared. 2. We may keep up a communion by faith, hope, and holy love, even with those churches and fellow Christians of whom we have no personal knowledge, or any conversation with. We can think and pray, and be concerned for one another, at the greatest distance; and those we never saw in the flesh we may hope to meet in heaven.

First. But what was it the apostle desired for them? ver. 2, "That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love." [He thought that the hearty love which Christians bore to one another, whereby they were joined together in a concern for their mutual welfare, would be a good means to fortify them against any ill impressions from seducers; compare Eph. iv. 14—16. And by this he thought their comfort could be best secured, and they be able more easily to edify in Christian knowledge.—L.] It was their spiritual welfare he was solicitous about. He doth not say that they may be healthy and merry, and rich, and great, and prosperous, but that their hearts may be comforted. Note, The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity, and what we should be most solicitous about, for ourselves and others. We have here a description of soul prosperity:—

1. When our knowledge grows to an "understanding of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ," then the soul prospers, when we come to have a more clear, distinct, methodical knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. To understand the mystery; that is, either what was before concealed, but is now made known, concerning the Father and Christ, or the mystery before mentioned, of calling the Gentiles into the Christian church, as the Father and Christ have revealed it in the Gospel; and not barely to speak of it by rote, or as we have been taught it by our catechisms, but to be led into it, and enter into the meaning and design of it. This is what we should labour after, and then the soul prospers.

2. When our faith grows to a full assurance and bold acknowledgment of this mystery. 1st. To a full assurance, or a well-settled judgment, upon their proper evidence, of the great truths of the Gospel, without doubting or calling them in question, but embracing them with the highest satisfaction, as "faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptance." 2nd. When it comes to a free acknowledgment, and we not only believe with the heart, but are ready, when called to it, to make confession with our mouth, and are not ashamed of our Master, and our holy religion, under the frowns and violence of their enemies. This is called the "riches of the full assurance of understanding." Great knowledge and strong faith make a soul rich. This is being rich toward God and rich in faith, and the true riches, Lu. xii. 21; Jas. ii. 5.

3. It consists in the abundance of comfort in our souls; "That their hearts might be comforted." The soul then prospers when it is filled with joy and peace, Rom. xv. 13, and has a satisfaction within which all the troubles without cannot disturb, and is able to joy in the Lord when all other comforts fail, Hab. iii. 17, 18.

4. The more intimate communion we have with our fellow Christians the more the soul prospers; "Being knit together in love." Holy love knits the hearts of Christians one to another, and faith and love both contribute to our comfort. The stronger our faith is, and the warmer our love, the more will our comfort be.

Having occasion to mention Christ, ver. 2, according to his usual way, he makes this remark to his honour; ver. 3, "In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." He had said, ch. i. 19, "that all fulness dwells in him." Here he instances particularly "the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," there is a fulness of wisdom in him, as he has perfectly revealed the will of God to mankind. Observe, The treasures of wisdom are hid, not from us, but for us in Christ. They who would be wise and knowing must apply themselves to Christ. We must spend upon the stock which is laid up for us in him, and draw from the treasures which are hid in him. He is the "wisdom of God," and is "of God made unto us wisdom," &c., 1 Cor. i. 24, 30.

Secondly. His concern for them is repeated; ver. 5, "Though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the Spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ." Observe, 1. That we may be present in spirit with those churches and Christians from whom we are absent in body; for the communion of saints is a spiritual thing. Paul had heard concerning the Colossians, that they were orderly and regular; and though he had never seen them, nor was present with them, he tells them he could easily think himself among them, and look with pleasure upon their good behaviour. 2. The order and steadfastness of Christians is matter of joy to ministers; they joy when they behold their order, that is, their regular behaviour, and steadfast adherence to the Christian doctrine. 3. The more steadfast our faith in Christ is, the better order there will be in our whole conversation; for we live and walk by faith, 2 Cor. v. 7; Heb. x. 38.

6 As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him: 7 Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving. 8 Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. 9 For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. 10 And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power: 11 In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ: 12 Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead.

The apostle had cautioned the Colossians against deceivers; ver. 4, "And this I say, lest any man beguile you with enticing words;" and ver. 8, "Lest any man spoil you." He insists so much upon the perfection of Christ and the gospel revelation, to preserve them from the ensnaring insinuations of those who would corrupt their principles. Note, 1. The way in which Satan spoils souls is by beguiling them. He deceives them, and by it slays them. He is the old serpent who beguiled Eve through his subtlety, 2 Cor. xi. 3. He could not ruin us if he did not cheat us; and he could not cheat us but by our own fault and folly. 2. Satan's agents, who aim to spoil them, beguile them with enticing words. See the danger of enticing words; how many are ruined by the flattery of those who lie in wait to deceive, and by the false disguises and fair appearances of evil principles and wicked practices. By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple, Rom. xvi. 18. 'You ought to stand upon your guard against enticing words, and be aware and afraid of those who would entice you to any evil; for that which they aim at is to spoil you.' "If sinners entice thee consent thou not," Pr. i. 10. Observe,

First. A sovereign antidote against seducers; ver. 6, 7, "As you have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him, rooted and built up," &c. Here note, 1. All Christians have, in profession at least, received Christ Jesus the Lord, received him as Christ, the great Prophet of the church, anointed by God to reveal his will; as Jesus, the great High Priest and Saviour from sin and wrath, by the expiatory sacrifice of himself; and as Lord, or Sovereign and King, whom we are to obey and be subject to. "Received him," consented to him, taken him for ours in every relation and capacity, and for all the purposes and uses of them.

[Here note that Jesus Christ is the sum and substance of all saving doctrine, 1 Cor. ii. 2, the marrow of all the promises, 2 Cor. i. 20; the fountain, furniture, and main scope of a holy life, Eph. iv. 21, 22; so that the receiving of him is the thing most to be aimed at in all the ordinances, as that which maketh our knowledge complete, our faith saving, our obedience acceptable.]

2. The great concern of those who have received Christ is "to walk in him," to make their practices conformable to their principles, and their conversation agreeable to their engagements. As we have received Christ, or consented to be his, so we must walk with him in our daily course, and keep up our communion with him. 3. The more closely we walk with Christ the more we are "rooted and established in the faith." A good conversation is the best establishment of a good faith. If we walk in him we shall be rooted in him; and the more firmly we are rooted in him, the more closely we shall walk in him; his creatures, whether angelical, human, animate or inanimate, peace is wrought" (Ellicott). See Rom. viii. 19, &c.

i. 21, 22. "Hath he (God) reconciled, in the body of his (Christ's) flesh:" Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, &c., agree that this expression must have its ground in the necessity St. Paul found of enforcing the sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice for reconciliation and redemption, as opposed to a false spiritualism then existent, which ascribed reconciling mediatorship with God partly to angelic beings.

i. 24. "Now with the chain round my wrist" (Eadie). This passage apparently must be understood as follows: The sufferings of Christians are spoken of as the sufferings of Christ. Whatever his body, the Church, has to suffer, she suffers in order to her perfecting; and thus the measure of the sufferings of Christ will not be filled up until the end of time. Each saint in his time and position is therefore, like St. Paul, filling up the "afflictions of Christ" in his flesh, and for "his body's sake."

*Rooted and built up. Observe, We cannot be built up in Christ unless we be first rooted in him. We must be united to him by a lively faith, and heartily consent to his covenant, and then we shall grow up in him in all things.

[Here note that, 1. The hold which faith doth take of Christ is like unto that which the tree hath in the ground, and so is most sure; for though the top of the tree doth shake, yet the root remaineth firm, and its firmness is from the solidity of the ground through which the roots are spread; its fruitfulness also is by virtue of sap conveyed from the ground by the roots; so the stability of believers floweth from Christ, Jno. x. 28, 29, and sap and influence is conveyed from him by faith, for making them fruitful, Jno. xv. 5. Thus the firmness of their faith is set forth by a metaphor, taken from trees deeply rooted, "rooted in him." 2. That the bond of faith, whereby believers are knit to Christ, is like that whereby the edifice is fastened to the foundation; the foundation upholdeth the house, so doth Christ the believer, Mat. xvi. 18. The rest of the building is made to conform to the foundation; so the copy of a believer's life is taken from Christ, Mat. xi. 29. The stones of the building, by taking band with the foundation, are fastened one to another; so faith taketh band upon Christ, and in him with others who are Christ's, 1 Jno. i. 7; for faith is set forth with relation to Christ, by a second metaphor, taken from edifices strongly founded; "Built up in him."]

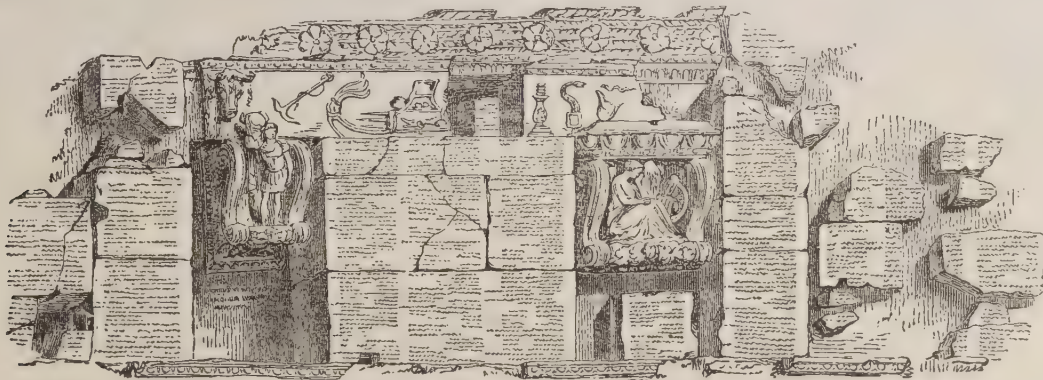

"As you have been taught;" according to the rule of the Christian doctrine, in which you have been instructed. Observe, A good education has a good influence upon our establishment. We must be "established in the faith, as we have been taught, abounding therein." Observe, Being established in the faith, we must abound therein, and improve in it more and more, and this with thanksgiving. The way to have the benefit and comfort of God's grace is to be much in giving thanks for it. We must join thanksgiving to all our improvements, and be sensible of the mercy of all our privileges and attainments. Observe,

Secondly. The fair warning given us of our danger; "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ" ver. 8. There is a philosophy which is a noble exercise of our reasonable faculties, and highly serviceable to religion, such a study of the works of God as leads us to the knowledge of God and confirms our faith in him. But there is a philosophy which is vain and deceitful, which is prejudicial to religion, and sets up the wisdom of man in competition with the wisdom of God, and while it pleases men's fancies ruins their faith; as nice and curious speculations about things above us, or of no use and concern to us; or a care of words and terms of art, which have only an empty, and often a cheating, appearance of knowledge. "After the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world." This plainly reflects upon the Jewish pedagogy or economy, as well as the pagan learning. The Jews governed themselves by the traditions of their elders, and the rudiments or elements of the world, the rites and observances which were only preparatory and introductory to the gospel state; the Gentiles mixed their maxims of philosophy with their Christian principles; and both alienated their minds from Christ. Those who pin their faith on other men's sleeves, and walk in the way of the world, have turned away from following after Christ. The deceivers were especially the Jewish teachers, who endeavoured to keep up the law of Moses in conjunction with the Gospel of Christ, but really in competition with it and contradiction to it. Now here the apostle shews,

1. That we have in Christ the substance of all the shadows of the ceremonial law; for example,

1st. Had they then the Shechinah, or special presence of God, called the glory, from the visible token of it? So have we now in Jesus Christ; ver. 9. "For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Under the law the presence of God dwelt between the cherubim, in a cloud which covered the mercy-seat; but now it dwells in the person of our Redeemer, who partakes of our nature, and is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, and has more clearly declared the Father to us. It dwells in him bodily; not as the body is opposed to the spirit, but as the body is opposed to the shadow. The fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ really, and not figuratively, for he is both God and man.

2nd. Had they circumcision, which was the seal of the covenant? In Christ we are "circumcised with the circumcision made without hands," ver. 11, by the work of regeneration in us, which is the spiritual or Christian circumcision.

LAPIDES CAPITOLINI.

The apostle here represents the privileges we Christians have above the Jews, which are very great.

First. Christ's death is our life; "And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him," ver. 13. A state of sin is a state of spiritual death. Those who are in sin are dead in sin. As the death of the body consists in its separation from the soul, so the death of the soul consists in its separation from God and the Divine favour. As the death of the body is the corruption and putrefaction of it, so sin is the corruption or depravation of the soul. As a man who is dead is unable to help himself by any power of his own, so an habitual sinner is morally impotent; though he has a natural power, or the power of a reasonable creature, he has not a spiritual power till he has the Divine life, or a renewed nature. It is principally to be understood of the Gentile world, who lay in wickedness. They were "dead in the uncircumcision of their flesh," being "aliens to the covenant of promise, and without God in the world," Eph. ii. 11, 12. By reason of their uncircumcision they were dead in their sins. It may be understood of the spiritual uncircumcision or corruption of nature; and so it shews that we

"He is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart," Rom. ii. 29. This is owing to Christ, and belongs to the Christian dispensation; it is "made without hands," not by the power of any creature, but by the power of the blessed Spirit of God. We are "born of the Spirit," Jno. iii. 5; and it is "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Spirit," Tit. iii. 5. It consists in "putting off the body of the sins of the flesh," in renouncing sin and reforming our lives, not in mere external rites. It is not the "putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God," 1 Pet. iii. 21. And it is not enough to put away some one particular sin, but we must put off the whole body of sin; "The old man must be crucified, and the body of sin destroyed," Rom. vi. 6. Christ was circumcised, and by virtue of our union to him, we partake of that effectual grace which puts off "the body of the sins of the flesh." Again, The Jews thought themselves complete in the ceremonial law; but we are "complete in Christ," ver. 10. That was imperfect and defective; "If the first covenant had been faultless, there would no place have been sought for the second," Heb. vii. 7; and "the law was but a shadow of good things, and could never, by those sacrifices, make the comers thereunto perfect," Heb. x. 1. But all the defects of it are made up in the Gospel of Christ, by the complete sacrifice for sin, and revelation of the will of God. "Which is the head of all principality and power." As the Old Testament priesthood had its perfection in Christ, so likewise had the kingdom of David, which was the eminent principality and power under the Old Testament, and which the Jews valued themselves so much upon. And he is the Lord and Head of all the powers in heaven and earth, of angels and men. "Angels, and authorities, and powers, are subject to him," 1 Pet. iii. 22.

[Observe, 1. There is a fulness in Christ to be communicated unto all who, being sensible of their own emptiness, do by faith lay hold upon him, "In whom we are complete," which completeness consisteth in the enjoyment of sufficiency of means for salvation prescribed by him, Heb. iii. 2; and in the imputation of his most perfect righteousness, and in the begun renovation of our nature by the Spirit of Christ, 1 Cor. i. 30; which shall be still upon the growing hand till grace be crowned with glory, Eph. v. 27. 2. Though there be a complete fulness in Christ the Mediator, from whence we may supply our emptiness, yet we cannot partake of that fulness except we first be "in him," and by faith be united to him; so "in him we are complete."]

2. We have communion with Christ in his whole undertaking; ver. 12, "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also you have risen with him." We are both buried and rise with him, and both are signified by our baptism; not that there is anything in the sign or ceremony of baptism which represents this burying and rising, any more than the crucifixion of Christ is represented by any visible resemblance in the Lord's supper; and he is speaking of the "circumcision made without hands," and says it is "through the faith of the operation of God." But the thing signified by our baptism is that we are buried with Christ, as baptism is the seal of the covenant and an obligation to our dying to sin; and that we are raised with Christ, as it is a seal and obligation to our living to righteousness, or newness of life. God in baptism engages to be to us a God, and we become engaged to be his people, and by his grace to die to sin and to live to righteousness, or put off the old man and put on the new.

13 And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses; 14 Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; 15 And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

are dead in law and dead in state: dead in law, as a condemned malefactor is called a dead man, because he is under a sentence of death; so sinners, by the guilt of sin, are under the sentence of the law, and "condemned already," Jno. iii. 18; and dead in state, by reason of "the uncircumcision of our flesh." An unsanctified heart is called an "uncircumcised heart;" this is our state. Now through Christ we, who were dead in sins, are quickened; that is, effectual provision is made for taking away the guilt of sin, and breaking the power and dominion of it. "Quickened together with him," by virtue of our union to him, and in conformity to him. Christ's death was the death of our sins; Christ's resurrection is the quickening of our souls.

[Whenever a man believeth in Christ, he is in the same moment of time united to Christ, and so that all which he did or suffered, as sustaining our person, or which he procured for our behoof, as being our head, whether in his death, burial, or resurrection, is imputed to us by God, and a right unto them derived to us, as if we had been personally present with him all those times, and given our consent to his doing of all those things in our name, and for our behalf. Hence is it that he is said to have "quickened those Colossians

ii. 1, 2. "Conflict;" "Intense and painful anxiety" (Eadie). "Laodicea," about eighteen miles west of Colossæ, was probably subject to similar evil influences of false teaching. "Full assurance," &c.: the completeness of the persuasion the apostle desires for his readers seems to indicate that he wished their assurance to be not only intellectual but also heartfelt. "And of the Father" is probably an interpolation, the sentence thus becoming "the mystery of God, even Christ" (Ellicott).

ii. 4. "Enticing;" see chap. i. 21, 22.
ii. 7. "Rooted and being built up;" not as Authorised Version. They had already been rooted, and were being built up; the process was daily proceeding.

ii. 8. "Lest there shall be any one that maketh you his prey;" so literally. "Rudiments;" see Gal. iv. 3.

ii. 9. see chap. i. 19.

ii. 10—12. "The Colossians seem to have been exposed to the together with him," though Christ had risen from the dead some years before their conversion.

Secondly. Through him we have the remission of sins; "Having forgiven you all trespasses." This is our quickening. The pardon of the crime is the life of the criminal; and this is owing to the resurrection of Christ, as well as his death; for, as he "died for our sins," so he "rose again for our justification," Rom. iv. 25.

Thirdly. Whatever was in force against us is taken out of the way. He has obtained for us a legal discharge from "the handwriting of ordinances which was against us," ver. 14, which may be understood,

1. Of that obligation to punishment in which consists the guilt of sin. The curse of the law is the handwriting against us, like the handwriting on Balaazar's wall; "Cursed is every one who continues not in every thing." This was a handwriting which was "against us, and contrary to us;" for it threatened our eternal ruin. This was removed when he "redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us," Gal. iii. 13. He cancelled the obligation for all who repent and believe; "Upon me be the curse, my Father." He vacated and disannulled the judgment which was against us. When he was nailed to the cross, the curse was as it were nailed to the cross; and our indwelling corruption is crucified with Christ, and by virtue of his cross. When we remember the dying of the Lord Jesus, and see him nailed to the cross, we should see the handwriting against us taken out of the way. Or rather,

2. It must be understood of the ceremonial law, "the handwriting of ordinances," the ceremonial institutions or "the law of commandments contained in ordinances," Eph. ii. 15, which was a yoke to the Jews and a partition-wall to the Gentiles. The Lord Jesus "took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross;" that is, disannulled the obligation of it, that all might see and be satisfied that it was no more binding. When the substance came, the shadows fled away. It is abolished, 2 Cor. iii. 13; and "that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away," Heb. viii. 13. The expressions are in allusion to the ancient methods of cancelling a bond, either by crossing the writing or striking it through with a nail.

Fourthly. He has obtained a glorious victory for us over the powers of darkness; "And, having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it," ver. 15. As the curse of the law was against us, so the power of Satan was against us. He treated with God as the Judge, and redeemed us out of the hands of his justice by a price; but out of the hands of Satan the executioner he redeemed us by power and with a high hand. He "led them captive." The devil and all the powers of hell were conquered and disarmed by the dying Redeemer. The first promise pointed at this; the bruising of the heel of Christ in his sufferings was the breaking of the serpent's head, Gen. iii. 15. The expressions are lofty and magnificent; let us turn aside and see this great sight. The Redeemer conquered by dying. See his crown of thorns turned into a crown of laurels. He spoiled them, broke the devil's power, and conquered and disabled him, and "made a show of them openly,"—exposed them to public shame, and made a show of them to angels and men. Never had the devil's kingdom such a mortal blow given to it as was given by the Lord Jesus. He tied them to his chariot wheels, and rode forth conquering and to conquer—alluding to the custom of a general's triumph, who returned victorious. "Triumphing over them in it;" that is, either in his cross and by his death; or, as some read it, in himself, by his own power; for he "trode the winepress alone, and of the people there was none with him."

16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: 17 Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ. 18 Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, 19 And not holding the Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. 20 Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances, 21 (Touch not; taste not; handle not; 22 Which all are to perish with the using;) after the commandments and doctrines of men? 23 Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in will worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh.

The apostle concludes the chapter with exhortations to proper duty, which he infers from the foregoing discourse.

First. Here is a caution to take heed of Judaizing teachers, or those who would impose upon Christians the yoke of the ceremonial law; "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, &c., ver. 16. Much of the ceremonies of the law of Moses consisted in the distinction of meats and days. It appears by Rom. xiv. that there were those who were for keeping up those distinctions; but here the apostle shews that since Christ has come, and has cancelled the ceremonial law, we ought not to keep it up. Let no man impose those things upon you, for God has not imposed them; if God has made you free, be not you again "entangled in that yoke of bondage." And this the rather because these things were shadows of things to come, ver. 17, intimating that they had no intrinsic worth in them, and that they are now done away. "But the body is of Christ." The body, of which they were shadows, has come; and to continue the ceremonial observances, which were only types and shadows of Christ and the Gospel, carries an intimation that Christ has not yet come, and the gospel state has not yet commenced. Observe the advantages we have under the Gospel, above what they had under the law: they had the shadows, we have the substance.

Secondly. He cautions them to take heed of those who would introduce the worship of angels as mediators between God and them, as the Gentile philosophers did; "Let no man beguile you of your reward, in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels," ver. 18. It looked like a piece of modesty to make use of the mediation of angels, as conscious to ourselves of our unworthiness to speak immediately to God; but, though it has a show of humility, it is a voluntary not a commanded humility, and therefore it is not acceptable; yea, it is not warrantable; it is taking that honour which is due to Christ only and giving it to a creature. Besides, the notions upon which this practice was grounded were merely the inventions of men and not by Divine revelation,—the proud conceits of human reason, which make a man presume to dive into things, and determine them, without sufficient knowledge and warrant. "Intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind;" pretending to describe the order of angels, and their respective ministries, which God has hidden from us; and therefore, though there was a show of humility in the practice, there was a real pride in the principle. They advanced those notions to gratify their own carnal fancy, and were fond of being thought wiser than other people. Pride is at the bottom of a great many errors and corruptions, and even of many evil practices, which have a great show and appearance of humility. Those who do so do "not hold the head," ver. 19. They do in effect disclaim Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man. It is the highest disparagement to Christ, who is the head of the church, for any of the members of it to make use of any intercessors with God but him. When men let go their hold of Christ, they catch at that which is next them and will stand them in no stead. "From which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God." Observe, 1. Jesus Christ is not only a head of government over the church, but a head of vital influence to it. They are knit to him by joints and bands, as the several members of the body are united to the head, and receive life and nourishment from him. 2. The body of Christ is a growing body; "it increaseth with the increase of God." The new man is increasing, and the nature of grace is to grow, where there is not an accidental hindrance. "With the increase of God;" with an increase of grace which is from God as its author; or, in a usual Hebraism, with a large and abundant increase; "That you may be filled with all the fulness of God," Eph. iii. 19: see a parallel expression, "Which is the head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together, maketh increase of the body," Eph. iv. 15, 16.

[Observe, This Christian increase and Divine growth is attained unto by keeping strict union with Christ, and communion with his members; for their increasing with the increase of God supposeth "nourishment ministered from the head," and themselves "knit together with joints and bands."

Thirdly. He takes occasion hence to warn them again; "Wherefore, if you be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are you subject to ordinances?" ver. 20. If as Christians you are dead to the observances of the ceremonial law, why are you subject to them? Such observances as, "Touch not, taste not, handle not," ver. 21, 22.

[The authors of superstition are very diligent to have their superstitious fooleries punctually practised, and their commands for that end exactly obeyed. Thus he brings in the masters of superstition delivering their injunctions, as it were to every man in particular: "Touch not," in the singular number.]

Under the law there was a ceremonial pollution contracted by touching a dead body, or any thing offered to an idol; or by tasting any forbidden meats, &c., "which are all to perish with the using," having no intrinsic worth in themselves to support them, and those who used them saw them perishing and passing away; or, which tend to corrupt the Christian faith, having no other authority than the traditions and injunctions of men. [See additional notes on Rom. vi., vii., for true import of the expression "If ye be dead with Christ."] "Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility." They thought themselves wiser than their neighbours, in observing the law of Moses together with the Gospel of Christ, that they might be sure in the one, at least, to be in the right; but, alas! it was but a show of wisdom, a mere invention and pretence. So they seem to neglect the body, by abstaining from such and such meats, and mortifying their bodily pleasures and appetites; but there is nothing of true devotion in these things, for the Gospel teaches us to worship God in spirit and truth, and not by ritual observances, and through the mediation of Christ alone, and not of any angels. Observe, 1. Christians are freed by Christ from the ritual observances of Moses's law, and delivered from that yoke of bondage which God himself had laid upon them. 2. Subjection to ordinances, or human appointments in the worship of God, is highly blameable, and contrary to the freedom and liberty of the Gospel. The apostle requires Christians "to stand fast in the liberty with which Christ hath made them free, and not to be entangled again with the yoke of bondage," Gal. v. 1. And the imposition of them is invading the authority of Christ, the head of the church, and "introducing another law of commandments contained in ordinances," when Christ has abolished the old one, Eph. ii. 15. 3. Such things have only a show of wisdom, but are really folly. It is true wisdom to keep close to the appointments of the Gospel, and an entire subjection to Christ, the only head of the church.

CHAPTER III.

I. The apostle exhorts us to set our hearts upon heaven and take them off from this world, ver. 1-4. II. He exhorts to the mortification of sin, in the various instances of it, ver. 5-11. III. He earnestly presses to mutual love and compassion, ver. 12-17. And concludes with exhortations to relative duties, of wives and husbands, parents and children, masters and servants, ver. 18-25.

If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. 2 Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. 3 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. 4 When Christ, who is our life, influence of two fundamental errors: first, the belief that they were under the influence, or, at any rate, needed the assistance of intermediate intelligences; secondly, the persuasion that circumcision, the symbol of purification appointed by God, must still be necessary. The first is met by the clause 'who is the head' (verse 10); the second by 'wherein also' (verse 12)" (Ellicott).

ii. 11. Best MSS. omit "of the sins."

ii. 12. "Through the faith:" "Faith is not the means by which the grace is wrought, effected, or conferred, but it may be and is the means by which it is accepted or received" (Waterland on "Justification").

ii. 14. "The handwriting in force against us by its decrees" (Ellicott). The whole law of God, whether written on stone or the tablets of the heart (Rom. ii. 13-15, iii. 19). This law, which must condemn us (Gal. iii. 21), was fulfilled for us by Christ. "While our Saviour bore the curse of the law, he destroyed its condemnatory shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

The apostle, having described our privileges by Christ in the former part of the epistle, and our discharge from the yoke of the ceremonial law, comes here to press upon us our duty as inferred thence. Though we are made free from the obligation of the ceremonial law, it does not therefore follow that we may live as we list. We must walk the more closely with God in all the instances of evangelical obedience. He begins with exhorting them to set their hearts on heaven, and take them off from this world. "If you then have risen with Christ." It is our privilege that we have risen with Christ; that is, have benefit by the resurrection of Christ, and by virtue of our union and communion with him are justified and sanctified, and shall be glorified. Hence he infers that we must seek those things which are above. We must mind the concerns of another world more than the concerns of this. We must make heaven our scope and aim, seek the favour of God above, keep up our communion with the upper world by faith, and hope, and holy love, and make it our constant care and business to secure our title to, and qualifications for, the heavenly bliss. And the reason is, because Christ sits at the right hand of God. He who is our best friend and our head is advanced to the highest dignity and honour in heaven, and has gone before to secure to us the heavenly happiness; and therefore we should seek and secure what he has purchased at so vast an expense, and is taking so much care about. We must live such a life as Christ lived here on earth, and lives now in heaven, according to our capacities.

First. He explains this duty; ver. 2. "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth." Observe. To seek heavenly things is to set our affections upon them, to love them, and let our desires be towards them. Upon the wings of affection the heart soars upwards, and is carried forth towards spiritual and Divine objects. We must acquaint ourselves with them, esteem them above all other things, and lay out ourselves in preparation for the enjoyment of them. David gave this proof of his loving the house of God, that he diligently sought after it, and prepared for it, Ps. xxvii. 4. This is to be spiritually minded, (Rom. viii. 6), and to seek and desire a better country, that is, a heavenly, Heb. xi. 14, 16. Things on earth are here set in opposition to things above. We must not dote upon them, nor expect too much from them, that we may set our affections on heaven; for heaven and earth are contrary one to the other, and a supreme regard to both is inconsistent; and the prevalence of our affection to one will proportionably weaken and abate our affection to the other.

Secondly. He assigns three reasons for this, ver. 3, 4:—

1. That we are dead; that is, to present things, and as our portion. We are so in profession and obligation; for we are "buried with Christ, and planted into the likeness of his death." Every Christian is "crucified unto the world, and the world is crucified unto him," Gal. vi. 14. And if we are dead to the earth, and have renounced it as our happiness, it is absurd for us to set our affections upon it, and seek it. We should be like a dead thing to it, unmoved, unaffected towards it. [Real believers are spiritually dead, not in sin, Eph. ii. 1, but to sin, Rom. vi. 11, the dominion and reign of sin being shaken off, Rom. vi. 14, and its strength much weakened by the power of grace, Gal. v. 17, though not totally subdued, Rom. vii. 18, and Christ having undertaken to subdue it wholly in them, Eph. v. 27.]

2. Our true life lies in the other world. "You are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God," ver. 3. The new man has its livelihood thence. It is born and nourished from above; and the perfection of its life is reserved for that state. It is "hid with Christ;" not hid from us only, in point of secrecy, but hid for us, denoting security. The life of a Christian "is hid with Christ." "Because I live you shall live also," 1 Jno. xiv. 19. Christ is at present a hidden Christ, or one "whom we have not seen;" but this is our comfort, that our "life is hid with him," and laid up safely with him. As we have reason to "love him whom we have not seen," (1 Pet. i. 8), so we may take the comfort of a happiness out of sight, and reserved in heaven for us.

3. Because at the second coming of Christ we hope for the perfection of our happiness. If we live a life of Christian purity and devotion now, "when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory," ver. 3. Observe, 1st. Christ is a believer's life. "I live, yet not I, but Christ lives in me," Gal. ii. 20. He is the principle and end of the Christian's life. He lives in us by his Spirit, and we live to him in all we do. "To me to live is Christ," Phil. i. 21. 2nd. Christ will appear again. He is now hid; and the heavens must contain him; but he will appear in all the pomp of the upper world, with his holy angels, and in "his own glory and his Father's glory," Mar. viii. 38; Lu. ix. 26. 3rd. We shall then appear with him in glory. It will be his glory to have him redeemed with him; he will come to be glorified in his saints, 2 Thes. i. 10; and it will be their glory to come with him, and be with him for ever. At the second coming of Christ there will be a general meeting of all the saints; and those whose life is now "hid with Christ" shall then appear with Christ in that glory which he himself enjoys, 1 Jno. xvii. 24. Do we look for such a happiness, and should we not set our affections upon that world, and live above this? What is there here to make us fond of it? What is there not there to draw our hearts to it? Our head is there, our home is there, our treasure is there, and we hope to be there for ever.

5 Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry: 6 For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience: 7 In the which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them.

The apostle exhorts the Colossians to the mortification of sin, the great hindrance to seeking the things which are above. Since it is our duty to set our affections upon heavenly things, it is our duty to "mortify our members which are upon the earth," and which naturally incline us to the things of the world. Mortify them, that is, subdue the vicious habits of mind which prevailed in your Gentile state. Kill them, suppress them, as you kill an enemy who vermin which spread and destroy all about them, or as you kill an enemy who fights against you and wounds you. "Your members which are upon the earth;" either the members of the body, which are the earthly part of us, and were "curiously wrought in the lower parts of the earth," (Ps. cxxxix. 15), or the corrupt affections of the mind, which lead us to earthly things, the members of the body of death, Rom. vii. 24. He specifies, power for ever; while he underwent sufferings and death, and the last efforts of baffled demoniacal malignity, he destroyed him that hath the power of death (Heb. ii. 14; 1 John iii. 8)" (Ellicott).

First. The lusts of the flesh, for which they were before so very remarkable.

ii. 15. "Triumphing over them in it" (Eph. ii. 16; Col. i. 20): the cross taken to represent all the sufferings connected with it, by which he was victorious. "He conquered the devils not by fighting, but suffering" (Grotius).

ii. 16. "Sabbath-days:" no argument for non-observance of the "Fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence,"—the various workings of the carnal appetites and fleshly impurities, which they indulged in their former course of life, and which were so contrary to the Christian state and the heavenly hope.

Secondly. The love of the world. "And covetousness, which is idolatry;" that is, an inordinate love of present good and outward enjoyments, which proceeds from too high a value in the mind, puts upon too eager a pursuit, hinders the proper use and enjoyment of them, and creates anxious fear and immoderate sorrow for the loss of them. Observe. Covetousness is spiritual idolatry; it is the giving of that love and regard to worldly wealth which are due to God only, and carries a greater degree of malignity in it, and is more highly provoking to God, than is commonly thought. And it is very observable that, among all the instances of sin which good men are recorded in the Scripture to have fallen into, (and there is scarcely any but some or other, in one or other part of their life, have fallen into,) there is no instance in all the Scripture of any good man charged with covetousness. He proceeds to shew how necessary it is to mortify sins, ver. 6, 7.

1. Because, if we do not kill them, they will kill us: "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience," ver. 3. See what we are all by nature more or less: we are "children of disobedience," not only disobedient children, but under the power of sin, and naturally prone to disobey. "The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they are born, speaking lies," Ps. lviii. 3. And, being children of disobedience, we are "children of wrath," Eph. ii. 3. The wrath of God comes upon all the children of disobedience. Those who do not obey the precepts of the law incur the penalties of it. The sins he mentions were their sins in their heathen and idolatrous state, and they were then especially the children of disobedience; and yet these sins brought judgments upon them, and exposed them to the wrath of God.

2. We should mortify these sins because they have lived in us. "In which you also walked some time, when you lived in them," ver. 7. Observe. The consideration that we have formerly lived in sin is a good argument why we should now forsake it. We have walked in by-paths, therefore let us walk in them no more. "If I have done iniquity, I will do no more," Job xxxiv. 32. The time past of our lives may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, 1 Pet. iv. 3. "When you lived among those who did such things," (so some understand it,) then you walked in those evil practices. It is a hard thing to live among those who do the works of darkness and not have fellowship with them, as it is to walk in the mire and contract no soil. Let us keep out of the way of evil-doers.

8 But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth. 9 Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds; 10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him: 11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all.

First. As we are to mortify inordinate appetites, so we are to mortify inordinate passions; ver. 8. "But now you also put off all these, anger, wrath, malice;" for these are contrary to the design of the Gospel, as well as grosser impurities; and, though they are more spiritual wickedness, have not less malignity in them. The gospel religion introduces a change of the higher as well as the lower powers of the soul, and supports the dominion of right reason and conscience over appetite and passion. Anger and wrath are bad, but malice is worse, because it is more rooted and deliberate; it is anger heightened and settled.

Secondly. As the corrupt principles in the heart must be cut off, so the product of them in the tongue; as blasphemy, which seems there to mean, not so much speaking ill of God as speaking ill of men, giving ill language to them, or raising ill reports of them, and injuring their good name by any evil arts,— "filthy communication," that is, all lewd and wanton discourse, which comes from a polluted mind in the speaker and propagates the same defilements in the hearers,—and lying. "Lie not one to another," ver. 9, for it is contrary both to the law of truth and the law of love; it is both unjust and unkind, and naturally tends to destroy all faith and friendship among mankind. Lying makes us like the devil, (who is the father of lies,) and is a prime part of the devil's image upon our souls; and therefore we are cautioned against this sin by this general reason, "Seeing you have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man," ver. 10. The consideration that we have by profession put away sin and espoused the cause and interest of Christ, that we have renounced all sin and stand engaged to Christ, should fortify us against this sin of lying. Those who have put off the old man have put it off with its deeds; and those who have put on the new man must put on all its deeds,—not only espouse good principles but act them in a good conversation. The new man is said to be "renewed in knowledge," because an ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. Without knowledge the heart cannot be good, Pr. xix. 2. The grace of God works upon the will and affections by renewing the understanding. Light is the first thing in the new creation, as it was in the first. "After the image of him who created him." It was the honour of man in innocence that he was made after the image of God; but that image was defaced and lost by sin, and is renewed by sanctifying grace: so that a renewed soul is something like what Adam was in the day he was created. In the privilege and duty of sanctification "there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free," ver. 11. There is now no difference arising from different country or different condition and circumstance of life; it is as much the duty of the one as of the other to be holy, and as much the privilege of the one as of the other to receive from God the grace to be so. Christ came to take down all partition-walls, that all might stand on the same level before God, both in duty and privilege. And for this reason, because "Christ is all in all," Christ is a Christian's all, his only Lord and Saviour, and all his hope and happiness. And to those who are sanctified, one as well as another and whatever they are in other respects, he is "all in all," the "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end;" he is all in all things to them.

12 Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and Lord's day can be founded on this; the Sabbath of the Jews was only a shadow of the Christian Lord's day. The shadow may be neglected when the reality is present.

ii. 19. "Of God:" which God supplies.

ii. 23. "Will worship:" i.e., self-imposed. "All which things have indeed the repute of wisdom in voluntary worship, and lowliness of mind, and unsparing treatment of the body, not in anything of real value, serving only to satisfy the flesh" (Ellicott).

beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, longsuffering; 13 Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any: even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. 14 And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness. 15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful. 16 Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. 17 And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

The apostle proceeds to exhort to mutual love and compassion: "Put on therefore bowels of mercy," ver. 12. We must not only put off anger and wrath, (as ver. 8,) but we must put on compassion and kindness; not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only not do hurt to any, but do what good we can to all.

First. The argument here used to enforce the exhortation is very affecting. "Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved." Observe,

1. Those who are holy are the elect of God; and those who are the elect of God, and holy, are beloved,—beloved of God, and ought to be so of all men.

2. Those who are the elect of God, holy and beloved, ought to conduct themselves in every thing as becomes them, and so as not to lose the credit of their holiness, nor the comfort of their being chosen and beloved. It becomes those who are holy towards God to be lowly and loving towards all men. Observe, What we must put on in particular. 1st. Compassion towards the miserable; "Bowels of mercy," the tenderest mercies. Those who owe so much to mercy ought to be merciful to all who are proper objects of mercy. "Be ye merciful as your Father is merciful," Lu. vi. 36. 2nd. "Kindness" towards our friends, and those who love us. A courteous disposition becomes the elect of God; for the design of the Gospel is not only to soften the minds of men, but to sweeten them, and to promote friendship among men as well as reconciliation with God. 3rd. "Humbleness of mind," in submission to those above us, and condescension to those below us. There must not only be an humble demeanour, but an humble mind; "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart," Mat. xi. 29. 4th. Meekness towards those who have provoked us, or been any way injurious to us. We must not be transported into any indecency by our resentment of indignities and neglects; but must prudently bridle our own anger, and patiently bear the anger of others. 5th. "Long-suffering" towards those who continue to provoke us. "Charity suffereth long," as well "as is kind," 1 Cor. xiii. 4. Many can bear a short provocation who are weary of bearing when it grows long. But we must suffer long both the injuries of men and the rebukes of Divine providence. If God is long-suffering to us, under all our provocations of him, we should exercise long-suffering to others in like cases. 6th. Mutual forbearance, in consideration of the infirmities and deficiencies under which we all labour; "Forbearing one another." We have all of us something which needs to be borne with, and this is a good reason why we should bear with others in what is disagreeable to us. We need the same good turn from others which we are bound to shew them. 7th. A readiness to forgive injuries; "Forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any." While we are in this world, where there is so much corruption in our hearts, and so much occasion of difference and contention, quarrels will sometimes happen, even among the elect of God, who are holy and beloved; as Paul and Barnabas had a "sharp contention, which parted them asunder one from the other," (Acts xv. 39.) and Paul and Peter, Gal. ii. 14. But it is our duty to forgive one another in such cases; not to bear any grudge, but put up with the affront and pass it by. And the reason is, "Even as Christ forgave you, so also do you." The consideration that we are forgiven by Christ so many offences is a good reason why we should forgive others. It is an argument of the Divinity of Christ that he had "power on earth to forgive sins;" and it is a branch of his example which we are obliged to follow, if we ourselves would be forgiven. "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us," Mat. vi. 12.

Secondly. In order to all this, we are exhorted here to several things:—

1. To clothe ourselves with love; ver. 14. "Above all things put on charity: ἐν πάσι δὲ τοῖς αἰσιν—over all things." Let this be the upper garment, the robe, the livery, the mark of our dignity and distinction. Or, let this be principal and chief, as the whole sum and abstract of the second table. "Add to faith virtue, and to brotherly kindness charity," 2 Pet. i. 5–7. He lays the foundation in faith, and the topstone in charity, "which is the bond of perfectness," the cement and centre of all happy society. Christian unity consists of unanimity and mutual love.

2. To submit ourselves to the government of the peace of God; ver. 15. "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts," that is, God's being at peace with you, and the comfortable sense of his acceptance and favour. Or, a disposition to peace among yourselves, a peaceable spirit that keeps the peace and makes peace. This is called "the peace of God," because it is of his working in all who are his; "The kingdom of God is righteousness and peace," Rom. xiv. 17. Let this peace "rule in your heart"—prevail and govern there, or as an umpire decide all matters of difference among you—"to which you are called in one body." We are called to this peace, to peace with God as our privilege, and peace with our brethren as our duty. Being united in one body, we are called to be at peace one with another, as the members of the natural body; for "we are the body of Christ, and members in particular," 1 Cor. xii. 27. To preserve in us this peaceable disposition, we must be thankful. The work of thanksgiving to God is such a sweet and pleasant work that it will help to make us sweet and pleasant towards all men. "Instead of envying one another upon account of any particular favours and excellence, be thankful for his mercies, which are common to all of you."

3. To let the "word of Christ dwell in us richly," ver. 16. The Gospel is the word of Christ, which has come to us; but that is not enough, it must dwell in us, or "keep house"—ἐνοικεῖται, not as a servant in a family, who is under another's control, but as a master, who has a right to prescribe to and direct all under his roof. We must take our instructions and directions from it, and our portion of meat and strength, of grace and comfort in due season, as from the master of the household. It must dwell in us; that is, be always ready and at hand to us in every thing, and have its due influence and use. We must be familiarly acquainted with it, and "know it for our good," ob v. 27. It must dwell in us richly; not only keep house in our hearts, but keep a good house. Many have the word of Christ dwelling in them, but it dwells in them but poorly; it has no mighty force and influence upon them. Then the soul prospers when the word of God dwells in us richly, when we have abundance of it in us, and are full of the Scriptures and of the grace of Christ. And this in all wisdom. The proper office of wisdom is to apply what we know to ourselves, for our own direction. The word of Christ must dwell in us, not in all notion and speculation, to make us doctors, but in all wisdom, to make us good Christians, and enable us to conduct ourselves in every thing as becomes wisdom's children.

4. To teach and admonish one another. This would contribute very much to our furtherance in all grace; for we sharpen ourselves by quickening others, and improve our knowledge by communicating it for their edification. We must "admonish one another in psalms and hymns." Observe, Singing of psalms is a Gospel ordinance; ψαλμοὶ καὶ ὕμνοι καὶ ᾠδαὶ—the Psalms of David, and spiritual hymns and odes, collected out of the Scripture, and suited to special occasions, instead of their lewd and profane songs in their idolatrous worship. Religious poetry seems countenanced by these expressions, and is capable of great edification. But, when we sing psalms, we make no melody unless we sing with grace in our hearts, unless we are suitably affected with what we sing, and go along in it with true devotion and understanding. Singing of psalms is a teaching ordinance as well as a praising ordinance; and we are not only to quicken and encourage ourselves, but to "teach and admonish one another," mutually excite our affections, and convey instructions.

5. All must be done in the name of Christ; ver. 17. "And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus," according to his command and in compliance with his authority, by strength derived from him, with an eye to his glory, and depending upon his merit for the acceptance of what is good and the pardon of what is amiss. "Giving thanks to God and the Father by him." Observe, 1st. We must give thanks in all things; whatsoever we do, we must still give thanks; Eph. v. 20. "Giving thanks always for all things." 2nd. The Lord Jesus must be the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers; "We give thanks to God and the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ," Eph. v. 20. Those who do all things in Christ's name will never want matter of thanksgiving to God, even the Father.

18 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. 19 Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them. 20 Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well pleasing unto the Lord. 21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. 22 Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God: 23 And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men; 24 Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. 25 But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons.

The apostle concludes the chapter with exhortations to relative duties, as before in the epistle to the Ephesians. The epistles which are most taken up in displaying the glory of Divine grace, and magnifying the Lord Jesus, are the most particular and distinct in pressing the duties of the several relations. We must never separate the privileges and duties of the gospel religion.

First. He begins with the duties of wives and husbands; ver. 18. "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. Submission is the duty of wives, ὑποτάσσεσθε. It is the same word which is used to express our duty to magistrates, (Rom. xiii. 1), "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," and is expressed by subjection and reverence, Eph. v. 24, 33. The reason is that "Adam was first formed, then Eve: and Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression," 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14. He was first in the creation and last in the transgression. "The head of the woman is the man;" and "the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man; neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man," 1 Cor. xi. 3, 8, 9. It is agreeable to the order of nature and the reason of things, as well as the appointment and will of God. But then it is submission, not to a rigorous lord or absolute tyrant, who may do his will and is without restraints, but to a husband, and to her own husband, who stands in the nearest relation, and is under strict engagements to proper duty too. And "this is fit in the Lord," it is becoming the relation, and what they are bound in duty to do, as an instance of obedience to the authority and law of Christ. On the other hand, "husbands must love their wives, and not be bitter against them," ver. 19. They must love them with tender and faithful affection, as Christ loved the church, and as their own bodies, and even as themselves, (Eph. v. 25, 28, 33), with a love peculiar to the nearest relation and the greatest comfort and blessing of life. And they must not be bitter against them, not use them unkindly, with harsh language or severe treatment, but be kind and obliging to them in all things; for "the woman was made for the man, neither is the man without the woman, and the man also is by the woman," 1 Cor. xi. 9, 11, 12.

Secondly. The duties of children and parents. "Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord," ver. 20. They must be willing to do all their lawful commands, and be at their direction and disposal; as those who have a natural right, and are fitter to direct them, than themselves. The apostle (Eph. vi. 2) requires them to honour as well as obey their parents; they must esteem them and think honourably of them, as the obedience of their lives must proceed from the esteem and opinion of their minds.

iii. 17. "To God the Father;" so best MSS.

iv. 9. "Who is one of you:" "belongs to your city" (Ellicott).

iv. 10. "Aristarchus;" see Acts xx. 4, xxvii. 2. "Fellow-prisoner:" probably voluntarily so.

Additional Notes.—The following summary of the more difficult portion of the epistle is from Ellicott's article in "Smith's Dictionary":—"After his usual salutation (chap. i. 1, 2), the apostle returns thanks to God for the faith of the Colossians, the spirit of

iii. 2. "Above:" all things belonging to "Jerusalem which is above" (Gal. iv. 26; Phil. iii. 20).

iii. 5. Literally, "make dead therefore." As you died, and your true life is not on earth, act conformably to your condition, kill the desires of a merely earthly life. "Covetousness:" specially marked out as a deadly sin. "Because a covetous man places the chief good in riches, he worships them as God, he pays to them love, faith, service, which are owed only to God" (Poole).

And this is "well-pleasing to God, or acceptable to him; for it is "the first commandment with promise" (Eph. vi. 2) with an explicit promise annexed to it, namely, "That it shall be well with them, and they shall live long on the earth." Dutiful children are the most likely to prosper in the world and enjoy long life. And parents must be tender, as well as children obedient; ver. 21, "Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged." Let not your authority over them be exercised with rigour and severity, but with kindness and gentleness, lest you raise their passions and discourage them in their duty, and by holding the reins too tight make them fly out with the greater fierceness. The bad temper and example of imprudent parents often prove a great hindrance to their children, and a stumblingblock in their way: see Eph. vi. 4. And it is by the tenderness of parents, and dutifulness of children, that God ordinarily furnishes his church with a seed to serve him, and propagates religion from age to age.

Thirdly. Servants and masters. "Servants, obey your masters in all things according to the flesh," ver. 22. Servants must do the duty of the relation in which they stand, and obey their master's commands in all things which are consistent with their duty to God their heavenly Master. "Not with eyeservice, as meek-pleasers." Not only when their master's eye is upon them, but when they are from under their master's eye, they must be both just and diligent. "In singleness of heart, fearing God." Without selfish designs, or hypocrisy and disguise, as those who fear God and stand in awe of him. Observe, The fear of God ruling in the heart will make people good in every relation. Servants who fear God will be just and faithful when they are from under their master's eye, because they know they are under the eye of God: see Gen. xx. 11, "Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place;" Neh. v. 15, "But so did not I, because of the fear of God;" "And whatsoever you do, do it heartily," ver. 23, with diligence, not idly and slothfully. Or, "Do it cheerfully, not discontented at the providence of God which put you in that relation." "As to the Lord, and not as to men." It sanctifies a servant's work when it is done as unto God, with an eye to his glory and in obedience to his command, and not merely as unto men, or with regard to them only. Observe, We are really doing our duty to God when we are faithful in our duty to men. And, for servants' encouragement, let them know that a good and faithful servant is never the farther from heaven for his being a servant. "Knowing that of the Lord you shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for you serve the Lord Christ," ver. 24. Serving your masters according to the command of Christ, you serve Christ, and he will be your paymaster; you will have a glorious reward at last. Though you are now servants, you will receive the inheritance of sons. But, on the other hand, "He who does wrong will receive for the wrong which he has done," ver. 25. There is a righteous God, who, if servants wrong their masters, will reckon with them for it, though they may conceal it from their master's notice. And he will be sure to punish the unjust as well as reward the faithful servant: and so if masters wrong their servants. "And there is no respect of persons with him." The righteous Judge of the earth will be impartial, and carry it with an equal hand towards master and servant; not swayed by any regard to men's outward circumstance and condition of life. The one and the other will stand upon a level at his tribunal.

It is probable that the apostle has a particular respect, in all these instances of duty, to the case mentioned, 1 Cor. vii., of relations of a different religion, as a Christian and heathen, a Jewish convert and an uncircumcised Gentile, where there was room to doubt whether they were bound to fulfil the proper duties of their several relations to such persons. And, if it hold in such cases, it is much stronger upon Christians one towards another, and where both are of the same religion. And how happy would the gospel religion make the world if it everywhere prevailed; and how much would it influence every state of things; and every relation of life!

CHAPTER IV.

I. He continues his account of the duty of masters, from the close of the former chapter, ver. 1. II. He exhorts to the duty of prayer, ver. 2-4; and to a prudent and decent conduct towards those with whom we converse, ver. 5, 6. III. He closes the epistle with the mention of several of his friends, of whom he gives an honourable testimony, ver. 7-18.

MASTERS, give unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

The apostle proceeds with the duty of masters to their servants, which might have been joined to the foregoing chapter, and is a part of that discourse. Here observe,

First. Justice is required of them; "Give unto your servants that which is just and equal," ver. 1; not only strict justice, but equity and kindness. Be faithful to your promises to them, and perform your agreements; not defrauding them of their dues, nor "keeping back by fraud the hire of the labourers," Jas. v. 4. Require no more of them than they are able to perform; and do not lay unreasonable burthens upon them, and beyond their strength. Provide for them what is fit, supply proper food and physic, and allow them such liberties as may fit them the better for cheerful service and make it the easier to them, and this though they be employed in the meanest and lowest offices, and of another country and a different religion from yourselves.

Secondly. A good reason for this regard; "Knowing that you also have a Master in heaven." You who are masters of others have a Master yourselves, and are servants of another Lord. You are not lords of yourselves, and are accountable to one above you. Deal with your servants as you expect God should deal with you, and as those who believe they must give an account. You are both servants of the same Lord in the different relations in which you stand, and are equally accountable to him at last. "Knowing that your Master also is in heaven, neither is there respect of persons with him," Eph. vi. 9.

2 Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving; 3 Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds: 4 That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak.

If this be considered as connected with the foregoing verse, then we may observe that it is part of the duty which masters owe their servants to pray with them, and to pray daily with them, or "continue in prayer." They must not only do justly and kindly by them, but act a Christian and religious part, and be concerned for their souls as well as their bodies. "As parts of your charge, and under your influence, be concerned for the blessing of God upon them, as well as the success of your affairs in their hands." And this is the duty of every one, to "continue in prayer." Keep up your constant times of prayer, without being diverted from it by other business; keep your hearts close to the duty, without wandering or deadness, and even to the end of it. "Watching in the same." Christians should lay hold of all opportunities for prayer, and choose the fittest seasons, which are least liable to disturbance from other things, and keep their minds lively in the duty, and in suitable frames. "With thanksgiving," or solemn acknowledgment of the mercies received. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer. "Withal praying also for us," ver. 3. The people must pray particularly for their ministers, and bear them upon their hearts at all times at the throne of grace, as if he had said, Do not forget us, whenever you pray for yourselves, Eph. vi. 19; 1 Thee. v. 25; Heb. xiii. 18. "That God would open to us a door of utterance," that is, either afford opportunity to preach the Gospel, (so he says, "a great door and effectual is opened to me," 1 Cor. xvi. 9), or else give me ability and courage, and enable me with freedom and faithfulness; so Eph. vi. 19. "And for me, that utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds;" that is, either the deepest doctrines of the Gospel with plainness, of which Christ is the principal subject, (he calls it "the mystery of the Gospel," Eph. vi. 19), or else he means the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentile world, which he calls "the mystery hidden from ages," ch. i. 26, and "the mystery of Christ," Eph. iii. 4. For this he was now in bonds. He was a prisoner at Rome by the violent opposition of the malicious Jews. He would have them pray for him, that he might not be discouraged in his work, nor driven from it by his sufferings. "That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak," ver. 4. That I may make this mystery known to those who have not heard of it, and make it plain to their understanding, in such a manner as I ought to do. He had been particular in telling them what he prayed for on their behalf, ch. i. Here he tells them particularly what he would have them pray for on his behalf. Paul knew as well as any man how to speak; and yet he begged their prayers for him, that he might be taught to speak. The best and most eminent Christians need the prayers of meaner Christians, and are not above asking them. The chief speakers need prayer that God would give them a door of utterance, and that they may speak as they ought to speak.

5 Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time. 6 Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.

The apostle exhorts them farther to a prudent and decent conduct towards all those with whom they conversed, towards the heathen world, or those out of the Christian church among whom they lived; ver. 5, "Walk in wisdom towards those who are without." Be careful, in all your converse with them, to get no hurt by them, or contract any of their customs; for "evil communications corrupt good manners;" and to do no hurt to them, or increase their prejudices against religion, and give them an occasion of dislike. Yea, do them all the good you can, and by all the fittest means and in the proper seasons recommend religion to them. "Redeeming the time;" that is, either improving every opportunity of doing them good, and making the best use of your time in proper duty, (diligence in redeeming time very much recommends religion to the good opinion of others,) or else walking cautiously and with circumspection, to give them no advantage against you, nor expose yourselves to their malice and ill-will, Eph. v. 15, 16. "Walk circumspectly, redeeming the time, because the days are evil;" that is, dangerous, or times of trouble and suffering. And towards others, or those who are within, as well as those who are without, "Let your speech be always with grace," ver. 6. Let all your discourse be as becomes Christians, suitable to your profession, savoury, discreet, seasonable. Though it be not always of grace, it must be always with grace; and, though the matter of our discourse be that which is common, yet there must be an air of piety upon it, and it must be in a Christian manner. "Seasoned with salt." Grace is the salt which seasons our discourse, makes it savoury, and keeps it from corrupting. "That you may know how to answer every man." One answer is proper for one man, and another for another man, Pr. xxvi. 4, 5. We have need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to give proper answers to every man, particularly in answering the questions and objections of adversaries against our religion, giving the reasons of our faith, and shewing the unreasonableness of their exceptions and cavils to the best advantage for our cause and least prejudice to ourselves. "Be ready always to give an answer to every man who asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear," 1 Pet. iii. 15.

7 All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful minister and fellowservant in the Lord: 8 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, and comfort your hearts; 9 With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They shall make known unto you all things which are done here. 10 Aristarchus my fellowprisoner saluteth you, and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, (touching whom ye received commandments: if he come unto you, receive him;) 11 And Jesus, which is called Justus, who are of the circumcision. These only are my fellowworkers unto the kingdom love they had shown, and the progress which the Gospel had made amongst them, as preached by Epaphras (chap. i. 3-8). This leads him to pray without ceasing that they may be fruitful in good works, and especially thankful to the Father, who gave them an inheritance with his saints, and translated them into the kingdom of his Son—his Son, the image of the invisible God, the first-born before every creature, the Creator of all things earthly and heavenly, the all things have been reconciled to the eternal Father (chap. i. 9-20). This reconciliation, the apostle reminds them, was exemplified in their own cases; they were once alienated, but now so reconciled as to be presented holy and blameless before God, if only they continued firm in the faith, and were not moved from the hope of which the Gospel was the source and origin (chap. i. 21-23). Of this Gospel the apostle declares himself the minister; the mystery of salvation was that for which he toiled and for which he suffered (chap. i. 24-29).

of God, which have been a comfort unto me. 12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. 13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis. 14 Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you. 15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church which is in his house. 16 And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea. 17 And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it. 18 The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.

In the close of this epistle the apostle does several of his friends the honour to leave their names upon record, with some testimony of his respect, which will be spoken of wherever the Gospel comes, and last to the end of the world.

First. Concerning Tychicus, ver. 7. By him this epistle was sent; and he does not give them an account in writing of his present state, because Tychicus would do it by word of mouth more fully and particularly. He knew they would be glad to hear how it fared with him. The churches cannot but be concerned for good ministers, and desirous to know their state. He gives him this character, "A beloved brother and faithful minister." Paul, though a great apostle, owns a faithful minister for a brother and a beloved brother. Faithfulness in any one is truly lovely, and renders him worthy our affection and esteem. "And a fellow-servant in the Lord." Ministers are servants to Christ, and fellow-servants to one another. They have one Lord, though they have different stations and capacities of service. Observe, It adds much to the beauty and strength of the gospel ministry when ministers are thus loving and condescending to one another, and by all just means support and advance one another's reputation. Paul sent him not only to tell them of his affairs, but to bring him an account of theirs; "Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, and comfort your hearts," ver. 8. He was as willing to hear from them as they could be to hear from him, and thought himself as much obliged to sympathise with them as he thought them obliged to sympathise with him. It is a great comfort, under the troubles and difficulties of life, to have the mutual concern of fellow Christians.

Secondly. Concerning Onesimus, ver. 9, "With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you." He was sent back from Rome along with Tychicus. This was he whom Paul had begotten in his bonds, Phile. 10. He had been servant to Philemon, and was a member, if not a minister, of their church. He was converted at Rome, whither he had fled from his master's service; and was now sent back, it is probable, with the epistle to Philemon, to introduce him again into his master's family. Observe, Though he was a poor servant, and had been a bad man, yet, being now a convert, Paul calls him "a faithful and beloved brother." The meanest circumstance of life, and greatest wickedness of former life, make no difference in the spiritual relation among sincere Christians: they partake of the same privileges, and are entitled to the same regards. The "richness of God by faith of Jesus Christ is unto all and upon all those that believe, for there is no difference," Rom. iii. 22; and "there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free, for you are all one in Christ Jesus," Gal. iii. 28. Perhaps this was some time after he was converted and sent back to Philemon, and by this time he had entered into the ministry, because Paul calls him a brother.

Thirdly. "Aristarchus, a fellow-prisoner." Those who join in services and sufferings should be thereby engaged to one another in holy love. Paul had a particular affection for his fellow-servants and his fellow-prisoners.

Fourthly. "Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas." This is supposed to be the same who wrote the Gospel which bears his name. "If he come unto you receive him." Paul had a quarrel with Barnabas upon the account of this Mark, who was his nephew, and "thought not good to take him with them, because he departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not with them to the work," Acts xv. 38. He would not take Mark with him, but took Silas, because Mark had deserted them; and yet Paul is not only reconciled to him himself, but recommends him to the respect of the churches, and gives a great example of a truly Christian and forgiving spirit. If men have been guilty of a fault, it must not be always remembered against them. We must forget as well as forgive. "If a man be overtaken in a fault, you who are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness," Gal. vi. 1.

Fifthly. Here is one who is called Jesus, which is the Greek name for the Hebrew Joshua. "If Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterwards have spoken of another day," Heb. iv. 8. "Who is called Justus." It is probable that he changed his name for that of Justus, in honour to the name of the Redeemer. Or else Jesus was his Jewish name, for he was of the circumcision; and Justus his Roman or Latin name. "These are my fellow-labourers unto the kingdom of God, who have been a comfort unto me." Observe, What comfort the apostle had in the communion of saints and ministers! One is his fellow-servant, another his fellow-prisoner, and all his fellow-workers, who were working out their own salvation and endeavouring to promote the salvation of others. Good ministers take great comfort in those who are their fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God. Their friendship and converse together are a great refreshment under the sufferings and difficulties in their way.

Sixthly. "Epaphras," ver. 12, the same with Epaphroditus. He is "one of you," one of your church; "he salutes you," or sends his service to you, and his best affections and wishes. "Always labouring fervently for you in prayers." Epaphras had learned of Paul to be much in prayer for his friends. Observe, 1. In what manner he prayed for them. He laboured in prayer, laboured fervently, and always laboured fervently for them. Those who would succeed in prayer must take pains in prayer; and we must be earnest in prayer, not only for ourselves, but for others also. It is the effectual fervent prayer which is the prevailing prayer, and availeth much, Jas. v. 16; and "Elias prayed earnestly that it might not rain," ver. 17. 2. What is the matter of this prayer; "That you may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." Observe, To stand perfect and complete in the will of God is what we should earnestly desire both for ourselves and others. We must stand complete in all the will of God; in the will of his precepts by a universal obedience, and in the will of his providence by a cheerful submission to it; and we stand perfect and complete in both by constancy and perseverance unto the end. The apostle was witness for Epaphras that he had a great zeal for them; "I bear him record;" I can testify for him that he has a great concern for you, and that all he does for you proceeds from a warm desire for your good. And his zeal extended to all about them; To "those who are in Laodicea and Hierapolis." He had a great concern for the Christian interest in the neighbouring places, as well as among them.

Seventhly. Luke is another here mentioned, whom he calls the beloved physician. This is he who wrote the Gospel and Acts, and was Paul's companion. Observe, He was both a physician and an evangelist. Christ himself both taught and healed, and was the great physician as well as prophet of the church. He was the beloved physician; one who recommended himself more than ordinary to the affections of his friends. Skill in physic is a useful accomplishment in a minister, and may be improved to more extensive usefulness and greater esteem among Christians.

Eighthly. Demas. Whether this was written before the second epistle to Timothy or after is not certain. There we read, 2 Tim. iv. 10, "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world." Some have thought that this epistle was written after; and then it is an evidence that, though Demas forsook Paul, yet he did not forsake Christ; or he forsook him but for a time, and recovered himself again, and Paul forgave him and owned him as a brother. But others think more probably that this epistle was written before the other; this in A.D. 62, that in 66, and then it is an evidence how considerable a man Demas was, who yet afterwards revolted. Many who have made a great figure in profession, and gained a great name among Christians, have yet shamefully apostatized; "They went forth from us, because they were not of us," 1 John ii. 19.

Ninthly. The brethren in Laodicea are here mentioned, as living in the neighbourhood of Colosse; and Paul sends salutations to them, and orders that this epistle should be read in the church of the Laodiceans, ver. 16; that a copy of it should be sent thither, to be read publicly in their congregation. And some think Paul sent another epistle at this time to Laodicea, and ordered them to send for that from Laodicea, and read it in their church; "And that you likewise read the epistle from Laodicea." If so, that epistle is now lost, and did not belong to the canon; for all the epistles which the apostles ever wrote were not preserved, any more than the words and actions of our blessed Lord; "There are many other things which Jesus did, which if they should be written every one, I suppose the world itself could not contain the books which would be written," John xxi. 25. But some think it was the epistle to the Ephesians, which is still extant.

Tenthly. Nymphas is mentioned (ver. 15) as one who lived at Colosse, and had a church in his house; that is, either a religious family, where the several parts of worship were daily performed, or some part of the congregation met there, when they had no public places of worship allowed, and they were forced to assemble in private houses for fear of their enemies. "The disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews," John xx. 19, and the apostle preached in his "own lodging and hired house," Acts xxviii. 23, 30. In the former sense it shewed his exemplary piety; in the latter, his zeal and public spirit.

Eleventhly. Concerning Archippus, who was one of their ministers at Colosse. They are bidden to admonish him to mind his work as a minister, to "take heed to it, and to fulfil it;" to be diligent and careful of all the parts of it, and to persevere in it unto the end. They must attend to the main design of their ministry, without troubling themselves or the people with things foreign to it, or of less moment. Observe, 1. The ministry we have received is a great honour; for it is "received in the Lord," and is by his appointment and command. 2. Those who have received it must fulfil it, or do the full duty of it. Those betray their trust, and will have a sad account at last, who "do this work of the Lord negligently." 3. The people may put their ministers in mind of their duty, and excite them to it. "Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry," though no doubt with decency and respect, not from pride and conceit.

Twelfthly. Concerning himself; ver. 18, "The salutation of me Paul. Remember my bonds." He had a scribe to write all the rest of the epistle, but these words he wrote with his own hand. "Remember my bonds." He does not say, Remember I am a prisoner, and send me supply; but, Remember I am in bonds as the apostle of the Gentiles, and let this confirm your faith in the Gospel of Christ. It adds weight to this exhortation; "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you to walk worthy," Eph. iv. 1. "Grace be with you." The favour of God, and all good, the blessed fruits and effects of it, be with you, and be your portion.

COLOSSE.

And his sufferings were not only for the Church at large, but for them and others whom he had not personally visited, even that they might come to the full knowledge of Christ, and might not fall victims to plausible sophistries: they were to walk in Christ and to be built on him (chap. ii. 1-7). Especially were they to be careful that no philosophy should lead them from Him in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, who was the head of all spiritual powers, and who had quickened them, forgiven them, and in his death had triumphed over all the hosts of darkness (chap. ii. 8-15). Surely, with such spiritual privileges, they were not to be judged in the matter of mere ceremonial observances, or beguiled into creature worship. Christ was the head of the body, if they were truly united with him, to what need were bodily austerities? (chap. ii. 16-23). They were, then, to mind things above, spiritual things, not carnal ordinances, for their life was hidden with Christ (chap. iii. 1-4); they were to mortify their members, and the evil principles in which they once walked; the old man was to be put off, and the new man put on, in which all are one in Christ (chap. iii. 5-12)."

OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF CAVALRY.

ST. PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

THESSALONICA was formerly the metropolis of Macedonia. It is now called Salonichi, and is the best peopled, and one of the best towns for commerce, in the Levant. The apostle Paul being diverted from his design of going into the provinces of Asia, properly so called, and directed after an extraordinary manner to preach the Gospel in Macedonia, Acts xvi. 9, 10, in obedience to the call of God went from Tarsus to Samothracia, and from thence to Neapolis, and from thence to Philippi, where he had good success in his ministry, but met with hard usage, being cast into prison with Silas his companion in travel and labour, from whence, being wonderfully delivered, they comforted the brethren there and departed. Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where the apostle planted a church that consisted of some believing Jews, and many converted Gentiles, Acts xvii. 1-4; but, a tumult being raised in the city by the unbelieving Jews, and the few and baser sort of the inhabitants, Paul and Silas, for their safety, were sent away by night unto Berea, and afterwards Paul was conducted to Athens, leaving Silas and Timotheus behind him, but sent directions that they should come to him with all speed. When they were come, Timotheus was sent to Thessalonica to inquire after their welfare, and to establish them in the faith, ch. iii. 2, who returned to Paul while he tarried at Athens, and was sent again, together with Silas, to visit the churches in Macedonia; so that Paul being left at Athens alone, ch. iii. 1, departed from thence to Corinth, where he continued a year and a half; in which time Silas and Timotheus returned to him from Macedonia, Acts xviii. 5. And then he wrote this epistle to the church of Christ at Thessalonica, which, though it is placed after the other epistles of this apostle, is supposed to be first in time of all Paul's epistles, and to be written about A.D. 51; the main scope whereof is to express the thankfulness of this apostle for the good success his preaching had among them, and to establish them in the faith, and persuade them to a holy conversation.

A.D. 54.

CHAPTER I.

After the introduction, ver. 1, the apostle begins with a thanksgiving to God for the saving benefits bestowed on them, ver. 2-5; and then mentions the sure evidences of the good success of the Gospel among them, which was notorious and famous in several other places, ver. 6-10.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

In this introduction we have, First. The inscription; where we have,

1. The persons from whom this epistle came, or by whom it was written. Paul was the inspired apostle and writer of this epistle, though he maketh no mention of his apostleship, which was not doubted of by the Thessalonians; nor opposed by any false apostles among them. He joins Silvanus, or Silas, and Timotheus with himself, who were now come to him with an account of the prosperity of the churches in Macedonia, which sheweth this great apostle's humility, and how desirous he was to be put honour upon the ministers of Christ that were of an inferior rank and standing. A good example this is to such ministers as are of greater abilities and reputation in the church than some others.

2. The persons to whom this epistle is written; namely, the church of the Thessalonians, that is, the converted Jews and Gentiles in Thessalonica; and it is observable that this church is said to be "in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:" they had fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, 1 Jno. i. 3. Therefore they were a Christian church, because they believed in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ. They believed the principles both of natural and revealed religion. The Gentiles among them were turned to God from the idols, and the Jews among them believed Jesus to be the promised Messiah. All of them were devoted and dedicated to God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. To God as their chiefest good and highest end; to Jesus Christ as their Lord, and Mediator between God and man. God the Father is the original and centre of all natural religion, and Jesus Christ is the author and centre of all revealed religion. "Ye believe in God," saith our Saviour, "believe also in me," Jno. xiv. 1.

* The Exposition of I and II Thessalonians is by the Rev. Daniel Mayo. The additional Notes are from the Exposition of Rev. R. Fergusson, of Kilwinning, except as otherwise marked.

Introductory Note.—This epistle was written from Corinth, after St. Paul's first visit to Thessalonica (Acts xvii.); the date of writing, according to Alford, being the winter of A.D. 52. Its authorship has been questioned in modern times by Baur and Schrader, but their objections have been answered by De Wette, Davidson, and others, and have never obtained even in Germany. The following summary of contents is from Dr. Vaughan's "Epistles of St. Paul for English Readers:"—"Beginning, as ever, with a word of kindly and Christian Secondly. The salutation or apostolical benediction. "Grace be with you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." This is the same for substance as in the other epistles. Grace and peace are well joined together; for the free grace and favour of God is the spring and fountain of all that peace and prosperity we do or can enjoy; and where there are gracious dispositions in us we may hope for peaceful thoughts in our own breasts. Both grace and peace, and all spiritual blessings, do come to us from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: from God the original of all good, and from the Lord Jesus the purchaser of all good for us. From God in Christ, and so our Father in covenant, because he is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Note, As all good cometh from God, so no good can be hoped for by sinners but from God in Christ. And the best good may be expected from God as our Father, for the sake of Christ.

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers; 3 Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father; 4 Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God. 5 For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake.

First. The apostle begins with thanksgiving unto God. Being about to mention the things that were matter of joy to him, and highly praiseworthy in them, and greatly for their advantage, he chooseth to do this by way of thanksgiving to God, who is the author of all that good that cometh to us, or is done by us at any time. God is the object of all religious worship of prayer and praise. And thanksgiving to God is a great duty to be performed always, or constantly; even when we do not actually give thanks to God by our words, we should have a grateful sense of God's goodness upon our minds. Thanksgiving should be often repeated; and not only should we be thankful for the favours we ourselves do receive, but for benefits bestowed on others also, upon our fellow creatures and fellow Christians. The apostle gave thanks not only for those that were his most intimate friends, or most eminently favoured of God, but for them all.

Secondly. He joined prayer with his praise or thanksgiving. When we do "in every thing by prayer and supplication make our requests known to God," we should join thanksgiving therewith, Phil. iv. 6; so when we give thanks for any greeting, he gives thanks in the recollection of what he had himself witnessed of their faith, and love, and hope. He gathers from that remembrance the assurance of the good purpose of God towards them. Their example had become a gospel. All Macedonia and Achaia had heard of their great change. The way of the evangelist had been prepared by the tidings. It was known without his telling what the Gospel of Christ was in both its parts, in its doctrine and in its expectation (chap. i.). He goes back to the thought of his stay benefit we receive, we should join prayer. We should pray always and without ceasing; and should pray not only for ourselves, but for others also—for our friends, and should make mention of them in our prayers. We may sometimes mention their names, and should make mention of their cases and condition; at least we should have their persons and circumstances in our minds, remembering them without ceasing. Note, As there is much that we ought to be thankful for on behalf of ourselves and our friends, so there is much occasion of constant prayer for farther supplies of good.

Thirdly. He mentions the particulars for which he was so thankful to God; namely,

1. The saving benefits bestowed on them. These were the grounds and reasons of his thanksgiving. For example, 1st. Their faith and their work of faith. This he tells them, ver. 8, was very famous and spread abroad. This is the radical grace; and their faith was a true and living faith, because a working faith. Note, Wherever there is a true faith it will work. It will have an influence upon heart and life; it will put us upon working for God and for our own salvation. Then we have comfort in our own faith, and the faith of others, when we perceive the work of faith. "Shew me thy faith by thy works," Jas. ii. 18. 2nd. Their love, and the "labour of love." Love is one of the cardinal graces, and of great use to us in this life, and will remain and be perfected in the life to come. "Faith works by love;" it shews itself in the exercise of love to God and love to our neighbour. As love will shew itself by labour, it will put us upon taking pains in religion. 3rd. Their hope, and the "patience of hope." We are saved by hope. This grace is compared to the soldier's helmet and sailor's anchor, and is of great use in times of danger. And wherever there is a well-grounded hope of eternal life, that will appear by the exercise of patience; in a patient bearing the calamities of the present time, and a patient waiting for the glory to be revealed; "For if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it," Rom. viii. 25. 4th. The apostle not only mentions these three cardinal graces, faith, hope, and love, but also taketh notice, First. Of the object and the efficient cause of these graces, namely, our Lord Jesus Christ. Secondly. Of the sincerity of them. Being in "the sight of God and our Father." The great motive to sincerity is the apprehension of God's eye as always upon us; and it is a sign of sincerity when in all we do we endeavour to approve ourselves to God; and that is right which is so in the sight of God. Then is the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope, sincere, when it is done as under the eye of God. Thirdly. He mentions the fountain from whence these graces did flow, namely, God's electing love; "Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God," ver. 4, [or, knowing, brethren beloved of God, your election.] Thus he runs up these streams to the fountain, and that was God's eternal election. Some by their election of God would understand only the temporary separation of the Thessalonians from the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles in their conversion; but this was according to the eternal "purpose of him who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will," Eph. i. 11. And speaking of their election, he calls them "brethren beloved;" for the original of the brotherhood that is between Christians, and the relation wherein they stand one to another, is election; and that is a good reason why we should love one another, because we are all loved of God, and were loved of him and his counsels, when there was not any thing in us to merit his love. The election of these Thessalonians was known to the apostle, and therefore might be known to themselves, and that by the fruits and effects thereof, namely, their sincere faith, and hope, and love; by the successful preaching of the gospel among them. Observe, 1st. That all those who in the fulness of time are effectually called and sanctified were from eternity elected and chosen to salvation. 2nd. That that election of God is of his own good pleasure and mere grace, not for the sake of any merit in them that are chosen. 3rd. That the election of God may be known by the fruits thereof. 4th. That whenever we are giving of thanks to God for his grace, either to ourselves or others, we should run up the streams to the fountain, and give thanks to God for his electing love by which we are made to differ.

2. Another ground or reason of the apostle's thanksgiving is the success of his ministry among them. He was thankful on his own account as well as theirs, that he had not laboured in vain. He had the seal and evidence of his apostleship hereby, and great encouragement in his labours and sufferings. Their ready acceptance and entertainment of the Gospel he preached to them was an evidence of their being elected and beloved of God. It was by this way he knew their election. It is true he had been in the third heavens, but had not searched the records of eternity, and found their election there; but knew this by the success of the Gospel among them, ver. 5; and he taketh notice with thankfulness, 1st. That the Gospel came to them also, not "in words only but in power," that is, they did not only hear the sound of it, but submitted to the power of it. It did not only tickle the ear, and please the fancy, not only fill their heads with notions, and amuse their minds for awhile, but did affect their hearts. A Divine power went along with it for the convincing their consciences, and amending their lives. Note, That by this we may know our election, if we not only speak of the things of God by rote, as parrots, but feel the influence of those things in our hearts, mortifying our lusts, and weaning us from the world, and raising us up to heavenly things. 2nd. It came "in the Holy Ghost," that is, with the powerful energy of the Divine Spirit. Note, Wherever the Gospel comes in power, it is to be attributed to the operation of the Holy Ghost; and unless the Spirit of God accompanies the word of God, to render it effectual by his power, it will be to us but as a dead letter, and the letter killeth; it is the Spirit giveth life. 3rd. The Gospel came to them in much assurance. Thus did they entertain it by the power of the Holy Ghost: they were fully convinced of the truth of it, so as not to be easily shaken in mind by objections and doubts; they were willing to leave all for Christ, and to venture their souls and everlasting condition upon the verity of the gospel revelation. The word was not to them like the sentiments of some philosophers about matters of opinion and doubtful speculation, but the object of their faith and assurance. Their "faith was the evidence of things not seen;" and the Thessalonians did thus "know what manner of men" the apostle and his fellow-labourers were among them, and what they did for their sake, and with what good success.

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost: 7 So that ye were ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia. 8 For from you sounded out the word of the Lord not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to God-ward is spread abroad; so that we need not to speak any thing. 9 For they them-among them. They knew what his teaching had been, and what his life—how sincere the one; how pure, how devoted, and how laborious the other. He thanks God for the blessing granted to this twofold influence. They had listened, they had obeyed, and they had patiently suffered for the truth's sake (chap. ii. 1–16). Great had been his sorrow in leaving them, great his desire to return. Once and again had he purposed it, but was let hitherto. At last anxiety became intolerable, and he had sent Timotheus in his stead. The selves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; 10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.

ACHAIA.—VER. 8.

In these words we have the evidence of the apostle's success among these Thessalonians, which were notorious and famous in several places: for,

First. They were careful in their holy conversation to imitate the good examples of the apostles and ministers of Christ, ver. 6. As the apostle took care to demean himself well, not only for his own credit's sake, but for the benefit of others, by a conversation suitable to his doctrine, that he might not pull down with one hand what he builded up with the other, so the Thessalonians, who observed what manner of men they were among them, how their preaching and living was all of a piece, shewed a conscientious care to be followers of them; that is, to imitate their good example; and herein they became also followers of the Lord, who is the perfect example we must strive to imitate; and we should be followers of others no farther than they are followers of Christ, 1 Cor. xi. 1; and the Thessalonians acted thus notwithstanding their afflictions, that much affliction the apostles and themselves also were exposed to. They were willing to share in the sufferings that attended the embracing and professing Christianity. They entertained the Gospel, notwithstanding the troubles and hardships which attended the preachers and professors of it too. Perhaps this made the word more precious, being dear bought, and the examples of the apostles shone very bright under their afflictions; so that the Thessalonians embraced the word cheerfully, and followed the example of the suffering apostles joyfully, "with joy in the Holy Ghost;" such solid, and spiritual, and lasting joy as the Holy Ghost is the author of, who, when our afflictions do abound, maketh our consolations much more abound.

Secondly. Their zeal prevailed to that degree that they were themselves examples to all about them, ver. 7, 8. Observe here,

1. Their example was very effectual to make good impressions upon many others. They were τοτοι, 'stamps,' or instruments to make impression. They had themselves received good impressions from the preaching and conversation of the apostles; and they made good impressions, and their conversation had an influence upon others. Note, 1st. Christians should be so good as by their example to influence others. [2nd. There is not any one thing which maketh the Gospel sound louder, the sound of it to be heard better, and its offer embraced more readily, than when a sound profession is beautified, adorned, and seconded by sober, sincere, painful and conscientious practice; for it was such a profession seconded with such a practice, in these of Thessalonica, which made the Gospel sound from them in Macedonia and Achaia. The word signifies to sound shrill and far, as with the noise of a trumpet or voice of a lion-herald. 3rd. It tendeth much to giving credit to the Gospel far and near, that great cities and honourable personages did once receive it; for Thessalonica was the chief city in all Macedonia, where were many women of credit and note, Acts xvii. 4; and therefore, upon their receiving the Gospel, the word of the Lord did sound out in all Macedonia and Achaia.]

2. It was very extensive, and reached beyond the confines of Thessalonica, even to the believers of all Macedonia, and farther in Achaia. The Philippians and others, that received the Gospel before the Thessalonians, were edified by their example. Note, Some that were last hired into the vineyard may sometimes outstrip those that come in before them, and become examples to them.

3. It was very famous. The word of the Lord, or its wonderful effects upon the Thessalonians, sounded, or was famous and well known, in the regions round about that city, and in every place, not strictly every where, but here and there, up and down in the world; so that, from the good success of the Gospel among them, many others were encouraged to entertain it, and to be willing when called to suffer for it. Their faith was spread abroad. 1st. The readiness of their faith was famed abroad. These Thessalonians embraced the Gospel as soon as it was preached to them; so that every body took notice what manner of entering in among them the apostles had; that there were no such delays as at Philippi, where it was a great while before much good was done. 2nd. The effects of their faith were famous. First. They quitted their report of their condition, brought by his friend, had filled him with joy. How can he thank God as he would for such consolation? May he grant a speedy re-union, and at all events a blessed assurance in the great day (chap. ii. 17–iii. 13). Let them, to this end, walk watchfully in Christ's way. In particular, let them keep themselves pure. Let them live a quiet and diligent life, in all love and honesty (chap. iv. 1–12). There was one subject on which he would correct a misapprehension—the condition and prospect of the Christian dead. They idolatry; they turned from their idols, and abandoned all that false worship they had been educated in. Secondly. They gave themselves up to God, to the living and true God, and devoted themselves to his service. Thirdly. They set themselves to wait for the Son of God from heaven, ver. 10. And this is one of the peculiarities of our holy religion to wait for Christ's second coming, as those that believe he will come, and hope he will come to our joy. The believers under the Old Testament waited for the coming of the Messiah, and believers now wait for his second coming; he is yet to come. And there is good reason to believe he will come, because God hath raised him from the dead, which is a full assurance unto all men that he will come to judgment, Acts xvii. 31. And there is good reason to hope and wait for his coming, because he hath "delivered us from wrath to come." He came to purchase salvation, will when he cometh again bring salvation with him, full and final deliverance from sin, and death, and hell; from that wrath which is yet to come upon unbelievers, and which, when it is once come, will be yet to come, because it is "everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," Mat. xxv. 41.

[We may learn hence divers doctrinal truths concerning Christ, wherein the apostle had doubtless instructed the Thessalonians at greater length, but doth now propound them in most wonderful brevity, as, 1. That Jesus Christ is true God; for he calls him the Son of the Father, and therefore of the same substance with him, even God himself; "To wait for the Son of God." 2. He is also man; for it is implied he was once dead, and therefore he behaved to be also man; "Whom he raised from the dead." 3. Though he have two natures, yet he is but one person; for he speaks of the Son of God and him who was dead, not as of two, but as of one and the same; "For his Son, whom he raised from the dead." 4. Jesus Christ, at his Father's appointment, (Ps. xl.) hath undertaken to be a Saviour, Redeemer, and Deliverer of the elect from that wrath which is due to them for sin; for therefore is he called "Jesus," which signifies a saviour, Mat. i. 21, and is said "to deliver us from the wrath to come." 5. Jesus Christ, the Lord of life, did give himself to death, thereby to satisfy provoked justice for the sins of the elect; for it is implied he was dead while it is said, "Whom he raised from the dead." 6. Jesus Christ, having satisfied the Father's justice by his death, was loosed out of prison, raised up from death, and absolved by the Father, as having performed all he undertook; for "He raised him from the dead." 7. Jesus Christ, after his resurrection, did ascend to heaven, to take possession of it in the name of the elect, Eph. ii., and to make application unto the elect of all those good things which he had purchased by his death, Acts v. 31; for that they looked for him "from heaven," saith he is there, and consequently that he ascended thither. 8. Jesus Christ in his bodily presence doth now reside in heaven, and not upon earth; for there he resides, whence he is expected to come; "And to wait for his Son from heaven." 9. As Jesus Christ did deliver the elect from the wrath to come, by paying of a sufficient ransom to provoked justice in his death, so he is carrying on, while he is now in heaven, the work of their delivery towards perfection, by making application of the redemption purchased, both to pardon sin in its guilt and to subdue sin in its strength, Acts v. 31; for the word "delivered," in the original, may be read in the present time, as well as the preterit; "Who delivereth us." 10. Jesus Christ shall again return from heaven, and come to earth at the last day, to judge the quick and the dead, 2 Tim. iv. 1, for his coming is waited for by believers, and therefore it must be: "To wait," for his coming. 11. Then, and at that time, shall Jesus Christ complete the work of the elect's delivery from that wrath to come, by acquitting them openly, and pronouncing, as their Judge, that blessed sentence, "Come, ye blessed of my Father," Mat. xxv.; for so much is implied, while his delivering of us from the wrath to come is annexed to his second coming; "Look for his Son—who delivered, or delivereth us from the wrath to come." 12. Jesus Christ the Judge shall not then acquit or deliver all from that wrath, but only such who here have lived by faith, and fled to him for a refuge, and laid hold upon the ransom paid by him; for, saith he, who delivereth "us," to wit Paul with the believing Thessalonians, and such believers as they were, leaving all others to drink the dregs of that most bitter cup of God's unmixed wrath for ever and ever, Jno. iii. 36].

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter the apostle puts the Thessalonians in mind of the manner of his preaching among them, ver. 1—6; then of the manner of his conversation among them, ver. 7—12; afterwards of the success of his ministry, with the effects both on himself and themselves, ver. 13—16. And then apologizeth for his absence, ver. 17—20.

OR yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain: 2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention. 3

For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile: 4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts. 5 For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness: 6 Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

must not allow themselves to doubt the place—the sure and foremost place—of them that are asleep, in all the glories of the promised advent. The time, indeed, of that great event is veiled from human knowledge, but not on that account can it come suddenly on the watchful (chap. iv. 13—v. 11). Various precepts of divine wisdom close the letter."

i. 1. From "peace" to the end of the verse is omitted by the Vatican MS. and ancient Syriac version.

Here we have an account of Paul's manner of preaching, and his comfortable reflection upon his entrance in among the Thessalonians. And as he had the testimony of his own conscience witnessing to his integrity, so he could appeal to the Thessalonians how faithfully he, and Silas, and Timotheus, his helpers in the work of the Lord, had discharged their office. "You yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you." Note, It is a great comfort to a minister to have his own conscience, and the consciences of others, witnessing for him, that he set out well, with good designs, and from good principles; and that his preaching "was not in vain," or, as some read it, "was not vain." The apostle here comforts himself either in the success of the ministry, that it was not fruitless or in vain, (according to our translation); or, as others think, reflecting upon the sincerity of his preaching, that it was not vain and empty, or deceitful and treacherous. The subject matter of the apostle's preaching was not vain and idle speculations about useless niceties and foolish questions, but sound and solid truth, such as was most likely to profit his hearers. A good example this is to be imitated by all the ministers of the Gospel. Much less was the apostle's preaching vain or deceitful. He could say to these Thessalonians what he told the Corinthians, 2 Cor. iv. 2, "He had renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully." He had no sinister or worldly design in his preaching, which he puts them in mind to have been.

First, With courage and resolution. "We were bold in our God to speak unto you the Gospel of God," ver. 2. The apostle was inspired with a holy boldness, nor was he discouraged at the afflictions he met with, or the opposition that was made against him. He had met with ill usage at Philippi, as these Thessalonians well knew; there it was that he and Silas were shamefully entreated, being put in the stocks; yet no sooner were they set at liberty but they went to Thessalonica and preached the Gospel with as much boldness as ever. Note, Suffering in a good cause should rather sharpen than blunt the edge of holy resolution. The Gospel of Christ at its first setting out in the world met with much opposition; and they that preached it preached it with contention, with great agony; which denoteth either the apostles' striving in their preaching, or their striving against the opposition they met with. This was Paul's comfort, he was neither daunted in his work nor driven from it.

Secondly, With great simplicity and godly sincerity. "Our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile," ver. 3. This no doubt was matter of the greatest comfort to the apostle, the consciousness of his own sincerity, and was one reason of his success. It was the sincere and uncorrupted Gospel that he preached and exhorted them to believe and obey. His design was not to set up a faction, to draw men over to a party, but to promote "pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father." The Gospel he preached was without deceit, it was true and faithful; it was not fallacious, nor a cunningly-devised fable. Nor was it of uncleanness; his Gospel was pure and holy, worthy of its holy Author, tending to discountenance all manner of impurity. The word of God is pure. There should be no corrupt mixtures therewith; and, as the matter of the apostle's exhortation was thus true and pure, the manner of his speaking was without guile. He did not pretend one thing and intend another; he believed, and therefore he spake. He had no sinister and secular aims and views, but was in reality what he seemed to be. The apostle not only asserts his sincerity, but subjoineeth the reasons and evidences thereof. The reasons are contained in ver. 4, 5, namely,

1. They were stewards, "put in trust with the Gospel;" and it is required of a steward that he be faithful. The Gospel which Paul preached was not his own, but the Gospel of God. Note, Ministers have a great favour shewn them, and honour put upon them, and trust committed to them. They must not dare to corrupt the word of God; they must diligently make use of what is intrusted with them, so as God hath allowed and commanded, knowing they shall be called to an account when they must be no longer stewards.

2. Their design was to please God and not men. God is a God of truth, and requireth truth in the inward parts; and if sincerity be wanting all that we do cannot please God. The Gospel of Christ is not accommodated to the vain fancies and lusts of men, to gratify their appetites and passions; but, on the contrary, it was designed for the mortifying their corrupt affections, and delivering them from the power of fancy, that they might be brought under the power of faith. "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ," Gal. i. 10.

3. They acted under the consideration of God's omniscience, as in the sight of him who "trieth our hearts." This is indeed the great motive to sincerity, to consider God not only seeth all that we do, but knoweth our thoughts afar off, and searcheth the heart. He is well acquainted with all our aims and designs, as well as our actions; and it is from this God that trieth our hearts that we must receive our reward.

The evidences of the apostle's sincerity do follow, and they are these:—

1st. He avoided flattery; "Neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know," ver. 5. He and his fellow-labourers preached Christ and him crucified, and did not aim to gain an interest in men's affections for themselves, by glorying, and fawning, and wheedling them. No, they were far from that; nor did they flatter men in their sins, nor tell them if they would be of his party they might live as they listed. He did not flatter them with vain hopes, nor indulge them in any evil work or way, promising them life, and so dabbling with untempered mortar.

2nd. He avoided covetousness. He did not make the ministry a cloak or a covering for covetousness, as God was witness, ver. 5. His design was not to enrich himself by preaching the Gospel; so far from that, he did not condition with them for bread. He was not like the false apostles, who "through covetousness with vain words made merchandise" of the people," 2 Pet. ii. 3.

3rd. He avoided ambition and vain glory; "Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others," ver. 6. They neither expected people's purses, nor their caps, neither to be enriched by them, or caressed and adored by them, and called Rabbi. This apostle exhorts the Galatians, ch. v. 26, "not to be desirous of vain glory;" his ambition was to obtain "that honour which comes from God," Jno. v. 44. He tells them they might have used greater authority as apostles, and expected greater esteem, and demanded maintenance, which is meant by the phrase of "being burdensome," because perhaps some would have thought this too great a burthen for them to bear.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children: 8 So being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us. 9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for

i. 2, 3. "Without ceasing" belongs to "making mention," not to "remembering" (Rom. i. 9).

i. 4. "Knowing, brethren beloved of God, your election:" not as Authorised Version. The apostle was assured of their election by their conduct since their reception of the Gospel (verse 5).

i. 10. Not "which delivered," but "who delivereth," or "who is our deliverer."

ii. 1. "Not in vain:" this does not refer to results, but to the labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God. 10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe: 11 As ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, 12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

In these words the apostle reminds the Thessalonians of the manner of their conversation among them. And,

First. He mentions the gentleness of their behaviour; "We were gentle among you," ver. 7. He shewed great mildness and tenderness who might have acted with the authority of an apostle of Christ. Such a behaviour greatly recommendeth religion, and is most agreeable to God's gracious dealings with sinners in and by the Gospel. This great apostle, though he abhorred and avoided flattery, was most condescending to all men. He accommodated himself to all men's capacities, and "became all things to all men." He shewed the kindness and care of "a nurse that cherisheth her children;" and this is the way to win people, rather than to rule with rigour. The word of God is indeed powerful; and as it cometh oftentimes with awful authority upon the minds of men, as it always hath enough in it to convince every impartial judgment, yet it cometh with the more pleasing power when the ministers of the Gospel recommend themselves to the affection of the people; and as a nursing mother beareth with forwardness in a child, and condescends to mean offices for its good, and draws out her breast, cherishing it in her bosom, so in like manner should the ministers of Christ behave towards their people. "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, and patient," 2 Tim. ii. 24. This gentleness and goodness the apostle expressed several ways.

1. By the most affectionate desire of their welfare; "Being affectionately desirous of you," ver. 8. The apostle had a most affectionate love to their persons, and sought them, not theirs; themselves, not their goods; and to gain them, not to be a gainer by them, or to make a merchandise of them. It was their spiritual and eternal welfare and salvation that he was earnestly desirous of.

2. By great readiness to do them good; willingly imparting to them "not the Gospel of God only, but also their own souls," ver. 8. See here the manner of Paul's preaching; he spared no pains therein; he was willing to run hazards, and venture his soul or life in preaching the Gospel; he was willing to spend and be spent in the service of men's souls; and, as they who give bread to the hungry from a charitable principle are said to impart their souls in what they give, Isa. lviii. 10, so did the apostles in giving forth the bread of life; so dear were these Thessalonians in particular to this apostle, and so great was his love to them.

3. By bodily labour to prevent their charge; or that his ministry might not be expensive and burthensome to them; "You remember our labour and travail, for labouring night and day," &c., ver. 9. He denied himself the liberty he had of taking wages from the churches. As to the labour of the ministry he added that of his calling as a tentmaker, that he might get his own bread. We are not to suppose the apostle spent the whole night and day in bodily labour or work to supply the necessities of his body, for then he would have had no time for the work of the ministry; but he spent part of the night as well as the day in this work, and was willing to forego his rest in the night that he might have an opportunity to do good to the souls of men in the day time. A good example is here set before the ministers of the Gospel to be industrious for the salvation of men's souls, though it will not follow they are always obliged to preach freely. There is no general rule to be drawn from this instance, either that ministers may at no time work with their hands for supply of their outward necessities, or that they ought always so to do. [It is the duty of people to call to mind, and not to forget, the great pains and labour that ministers have been at for bringing about their spiritual good, that so they may be thankful to God, who hath stirred up and to lay their otherwise perishing condition so near to their heart, and acknowledge their obligation to instruments who have willingly spent themselves for their sake.]

4. By the holiness of their conversation concerning which he appeals not only to them, but to God also; ver. 10, "Ye are witnesses, and God also." They were observers of their outward conversation in public before men, and God was witness not only of their behaviour in secret, but of the inward principles from whence they acted. Their behaviour was holy towards God, just towards all men, and unblameable, without giving cause of scandal or offence; and they were careful not only not to give offence to them that were without, but to them also that did believe, that they might give no ill example—that their preaching and living might be all of a piece. Herein, said the apostle, "do I exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men," Acts xxiv. 16.

Secondly. He mentions their faithful discharge of the work and office of the ministry, ver. 11, 12. Concerning this also he could appeal to them as witnesses; Paul and his fellow-labourers were not only good Christians, but faithful ministers. And we should not only be good as to our general calling as Christians, but in our particular callings and relations. Paul exhorted the Thessalonians, not only informing them in their duty, but exciting and quickening them to the performance of it, by proper motives and arguments. And he comforted them also, endeavouring to cheer and support their spirits under the difficulties and discouragements they might meet with. And this he did not only publicly but privately also, and from house to house, Acts xx. 20; and charged every one of them by personal addresses; and this some think is intended by the similitude of a father's charging his children. This expression also denoteth the affectionate and compassionate counsels and consolations which this apostle used. He was their spiritual father; and as he cherished them like a nursing mother, so he charged them as a father, with a father's affection rather than a father's authority. "As my beloved sons I warn you," 1 Cor. iv. 14.

The manner of this apostle's exhortation ought to be regarded by ministers in particular for their imitation, and the matter of it is greatly to be regarded by them and all others; namely, that "they would walk worthy of God, who hath called them to his kingdom and glory," ver. 12. Observe, 1. What is our great gospel privilege. That God hath called us to his kingdom and glory. The Gospel calls us into the kingdom and state of grace here, and unto the kingdom and state of glory hereafter; to heaven and happiness as our end, and to holiness as the way to that end. 2. What is our great gospel duty. That we walk worthy of God; that the temper of our minds, and tenor of our lives, be answerable to this call, and suitable to this privilege. We should accommodate ourselves to the intention and design of the Gospel, and live suitably to our profession and privileges, our hopes and expectations, as becometh those that are called with such a high and holy calling.

[There is not any thing of greater force to make a man walk worthy of God, by leading a holy life, than his well-grounded faith and hope of glory to be enjoyed in heaven: the man who looketh to be in heaven for ever cannot choose but have his conversation in heaven, and imitate himself somewhat to the customs and manners of that country wherein he intends to live eternally. For Paul makes the partaking of God's glory to follow necessarily upon reception to his kingdom, and both an argument to make them "walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory."]

13 For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe. 14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judæa are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews: 15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men: 16 Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

Here observe, First. The apostle maketh mention of the success of his ministry among these Thessalonians, ver. 13; which is expressed,

1. By the manner of their receiving the word of God. "When ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God." Where note, 1st. That the word of the Gospel is preached by men like ourselves, men of like passions and infirmities with others; "We have this treasure in earthen vessels." The word of God these Thessalonians received they heard from the apostles, 2nd. However, it is in truth the word of God. Such was the word the apostles preached by Divine inspiration, and such is that which is left upon record, written in the Scriptures by Divine inspiration; and such is that word which in our days is preached, being either contained, or evidently founded on, or deduced from, these sacred oracles. 3rd. They are greatly to blame who give out their own fancies or injunctions for the word of God. This is the vilest way of imposing upon people, and to deal unfaithfully. 4th. They are also to blame that, in hearing of the word, look no farther than to the ministry of men, or the words of men, who are only or chiefly pleased with the elegance of the style, or the beauty of the composure, or the voice and manner in which the word is preached, and expect to receive their advantage herein. 5th. We should receive the word of God as the word of God, with affections suitable to the holiness, wisdom, verity, and goodness thereof. The words of men are frail and perishing like themselves, and sometimes false, and foolish, and fickle. But God's word is holy, wise, just, and faithful, and, like its Author, liveth and abideth for ever. Let us accordingly receive and regard it.

2. By the wonderful operation of this word they received. It effectually worketh in them that believe, ver. 13. They that by faith receive the word find it profitable. It doth good to them that walk uprightly, and by its wonderful effects doth evidence itself to be the word of God. This converts their souls, and enlightens their minds, and rejoiceth their hearts, &c., Ps. xix; and such as have this inward testimony of the truth of the Scriptures, the word of God, by the effectual operations thereof on their hearts, have the best evidence of their Divine original to themselves, though this is not sufficient to convince others who are strangers thereto.

Secondly. He mentions the good effects his successful preaching had.

1. Upon himself and fellow-labourers. It was a constant cause of thankfulness; "For this cause thank we God without ceasing," ver. 13. The apostle expresses his thankfulness to God so often upon this account, that he seemeth to think he never could be sufficiently thankful that God had counted him faithful, and put him into the ministry, and made his ministrations successful.

2. Upon themselves. The word wrought effectually in them, not only to be examples unto others in faith and good works, which he had mentioned before, but also in constancy and patience under sufferings and trials for the sake of the Gospel. "Ye became followers of the churches of God, and have suffered like things as they have done," ver. 14; and with like courage and constancy, with like patience and hope. Note, The cross is the Christian's mark; if we are called to suffer, we are called only to be followers of the churches of God. "So persecuted they the prophets that were before you," Mat. v. 12. It is a good effect of the Gospel when we are enabled to suffer for its sake. The apostle mentions the sufferings of the churches of God, "which in Judæa were in Christ Jesus." Those in Judæa first heard the Gospel, and they first suffered for it; for the Jews were the most bitter enemies Christianity had, and were especially enraged against their countrymen that embraced Christianity. Note, Bitter zeal and fiery persecution will set countrymen at variance, and break through all the bonds of nature, as well as contradict all the rules of religion. In every city where the apostles went to preach the Gospel the Jews stirred the inhabitants up against them. They were the ring-leaders of persecution in all places, so in particular it was at Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 5. "The Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city in an uproar." Upon this occasion the apostle gives a character of the unbelieving Jews, ver. 15; enough to justify their final rejection, and the ruin of their place, and church, and nation, which was now approaching. 1st. They killed the Lord Jesus, and impudently and presumptuously wished that his blood might be on them, and their children. 2nd. They killed their own prophets; so they had done all along. Their fathers had done so; they had been a persecuting generation. 3rd. They hated the apostles, and did "them all the mischief they character of the apostle's teaching; it was no empty scheme, no vain thing he came to tell them of.

ii. 2. "With much contention;" Wickliffe translates "with much business;" Tyndal, Cranmer, Geneva, "with much striving;" Rheims, "with much carefulness."

ii. 6. "'Burdensome' seems to denote here all that self-assertion and parade of office which might have claimed at their hands both extraordinary deference and also pecuniary maintenance" (Vaughan).

"When we might have stood on our dignity" (Alford). So Olshausen, Chrysostom, Calvin.

ii. 8. St. Paul here seems to place "our own lives" above the Gospel in value. A reference to 1 Cor. ix. 16 explains his feeling. He looked upon the "imparting the Gospel" as his duty, but giving up his life as a voluntary act of love.

ii. 12. "Who calleth you?" the sense is present, not past. "His kingdom and glory:" "kingdom" here is taken variously to signify could. They persecuted them, and drove and chased them from place to place; and no marvel, if they killed the Lord Jesus, that they persecuted his followers. 4th. They pleased not God. They had quite lost all sense of religion, and due care to do their duty to God. It was a most fatal mistake to think they did God service by killing God's servants. Murder and persecution are most hateful to God, and cannot be justified on any pretence; it is so contrary to natural religion, that no zeal for any true or only pretended institution of religion can ever excuse it. 5th. They were contrary to all men. Their persecuting spirit was a perverse spirit; contrary to the light of nature, and contrary to humanity; contrary to the welfare of all men, and contrary to the sentiments of all men not under the power of bigotry. 6th. They had an implacable enmity to the Gentiles, and envied them the offers of the Gospel, forbidding the apostles to speak to them that they might be saved. The means of salvation had long been confined to the Jews: "Salvation is of the Jews," saith our Saviour. And they were envious against the Gentiles, and angry that they should be admitted to share in the means of salvation. Nothing provoked them more than our Saviour's speaking to them at any time concerning this matter; this enraged the Jews at Jerusalem, when in his defence Paul told them he was "sent unto the Gentiles," Acts xxii. 21. They heard him patiently till he uttered these words, but then could endure no longer, but "lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live." Thus did the Jews fill up their sins; and nothing tends more to any person's or people's filling up the measure of their sins than opposing the Gospel, and obstructing the progress of it, and hindering the salvation of precious souls. For the sake of these things "wrath is come upon them to the uttermost," that is, wrath was determined against them, and would soon overtake them. It was not many years after this that Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Jewish nation cut off by the Romans. Note, 1. When the measure of any man's iniquity is full, and he hath sinned to the uttermost, then cometh wrath, and that to the uttermost. [2. The more eminent mercies and favours from God a people or person have lived under and enjoyed, the more signal judgments shall they be surprised with, in case of their continued abuse of, and ingratitude for, such excellent receipts: for the Lord, in the point of mercy and favour, dealt so with the Jews as he did not with any people, Pz. cxlvii. 19, 20; and because of their ingratitude they are made examples of God's wrath and judgment. "The wrath is come upon them to the uttermost."]]

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire. 18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us. 19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? 20 For ye are our glory and joy.

In these words, First. The apostle apologiseth for his absence. Here observe,

1. He tells them they were involuntarily forced from them. "We, brethren, were taken from you," ver. 17; such was the rage of his persecutors. He was unwillingly sent away by night to Berea, Acts xvii. 10.

2. Though he was absent in body, yet he was present in heart. He had still a remembrance of them, and great care for them.

3. Even his bodily absence was but for a short time, (the time of an hour.) Time is short; all our time on earth is short and uncertain, whether we are present with our friends or absent from them. This world is not a place where we are always or long to be together. It is in heaven holy souls shall meet, and never part more.

4. He earnestly desired and endeavoured to see them again. "We endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire," ver. 17. So that the apostle at least intended his absence should be but for a short time; his desire and endeavour was to return again very soon to Thessalonica. But men of business are not masters of their own time. Paul did his endeavour, and he could do no more, ver. 18.

5. He tells them Satan hindered his return, ver. 18; that is, either some enemy or enemies, or the great enemy of mankind, who stirred up opposition to Paul, either in his return to Thessalonica, when he intended to return thither, or stirred up such contentions or dissensions in those places whither he went as made his presence necessary. Note, 1st. Satan is a constant enemy to the work of God, and doth all he can to obstruct it. [2nd. As the child of God can no sooner enterprise that which is really good, but usually he doth as soon meet with some impediment, so, whoever be the means or instruments for impeding us in the way of duty, the devil himself, through God's permission, is the prime author of that woful work, and all others do but fight under his banner; for, though other means were doubtless accessory to Paul's stay, yet "Satan hindered us," saith he.]

6. He assureth them of his affection and high esteem for them, though he was not able as yet to be present with them, according to his desire. They were his "hope and joy, and crown of rejoicing, his glory and joy." These are expressions of great and endeared affection, and high estimation. And it is happy when ministers and people have such mutual affection and esteem of each other; and especially if they shall thus rejoice, if they that sow and they that reap shall then rejoice together, "in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming."

Secondly. The apostle here puts the Thessalonians in mind that, though he could not come to them as yet, and though he should never be able to come to them, yet our Lord Jesus Christ will come,—nothing shall hinder that. And farther, when he shall come, all must appear in his presence, or before him; ministers and people must all appear before him, and faithful people will be the glory and joy of faithful ministers in that great and glorious day.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter the apostle giveth farther evidence of his love to the Thessalonians, reminding them of his sending Timothy to them, with the mention of his design therein, and his inducements so to do, ver. 1—3; by acquainting them with his great satisfaction at the return of Timothy with good tidings concerning them, ver. 3—10. And concludeth with fervent prayer for them, ver. 11—13.

the present possession of a Christian (Col. i. 13), or the future inheritance (2 Tim. iv. 18). "Glory" can refer only to the heavenly state.

ii. 13. Not as in Authorised Version, but "when ye received the word of God, hearing it from us, ye accepted not the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God," &c. The "as" inserted by Authorised Version before "the word of men" injures the sense; the apostle is not speaking of the opinion the Thessalonians formed of HEREFORE when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone; 2 And sent Timotheus, our brother, and minister of God, and our fellowlabourer in the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith: 3 That no man should be moved by these afflictions: for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto. 4 For verily, when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know. 5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain.

In these words the apostle gives an account of his sending Timothy to the Thessalonians. Though he was hindered from going to them himself, yet his love was such that he could not forbear sending Timothy to them; though he was very useful to him, and could not well spare him, yet he was content for their good to be left alone at Athens. Note, Those ministers do not duly value the establishment and welfare of their people who cannot deny themselves in many things for that end. Observe,

First. The character he giveth of Timothy; ver. 2. We "sent Timotheus our brother." Elsewhere he calls him "his son;" here he calls him "brother." Timothy was Paul's junior in age, his inferior in gifts and graces, and of a lower rank in the ministry. For Paul was an apostle, and Timothy but an evangelist; yet Paul calls him brother. This was an instance of the apostle's humility, and shewed his desire to put honour upon Timothy, and to recommend him to the esteem of the churches. He calls him also a "minister of God." Note, Ministers of the Gospel of Christ are ministers of God, to promote the kingdom of God among men. He calls him also his "fellow-labourer in the Gospel of Christ." Note, Ministers of the Gospel must look upon themselves as labourers in the Lord's vineyard; they have an honourable office, and hard work, yet a good work. "This is a true saying, If any man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work," 1 Tim. iii. 1. And ministers should look upon one another as fellow-labourers, and should therefore love one another, and strengthen one another's hands; not strive and contend one with another, which will hinder their work, but strive together to carry on the great work they are engaged in, namely, to preach and publish the Gospel of Christ, and to persuade people to embrace and entertain it, and live suitably thereto.

Secondly. The end and design why Paul sent Timothy, which was to establish them and comfort them concerning their faith, ver. 2. Paul had converted them to the Christian faith, and now he was desirous they might be confirmed and comforted; that they might be confirmed in the choice they had made of the Christian religion, and be comforted in the profession and practice of it. Note, The more we are comforted, the more we shall be confirmed; because, when we find pleasure in the ways of God, we shall thereby be engaged to continue and persevere therein. The apostle's design was to establish and comfort the Thessalonians concerning their faith; concerning the object of their faith, namely, the truths of the Gospel, and particularly that Jesus Christ was the Saviour of the world, and so wise and good, so powerful and faithful, that they might rely upon him; concerning the recompence of faith, which was more than sufficient to balance all their losses and reward all their labours.

Thirdly. The motives inducing Paul to send Timothy for this end; namely, a godly fear or jealousy, lest they should be moved from the faith of Christ, ver. 3. He was desirous that no man, not one among them, should be moved or shaken in mind; that they should not apostatise or waver in the faith, and yet, 1. He apprehended there was danger, and feared the consequence.

1st. There was danger, First. By reason of affliction and persecution for the sake of the Gospel, ver. 3. These Thessalonians could not but perceive what afflictions the apostles and preachers of the Gospel met with, and that might possibly stumble them; and also those who made profession of the Gospel were persecuted, and without doubt these Thessalonians themselves were afflicted. Secondly. By reason of the tempter's subtlety and malice. The apostle was afraid "lest by some means the tempter had tempted" them, ver. 5. The devil is a subtle and unwearied tempter, that seeks an opportunity to beguile and destroy us, and taketh all advantages against us, both in a time of prosperity and adversity, and hath often been successful in his attacks upon persons under afflictions. He hath often prejudiced the minds of men against religion, on account of the sufferings its professors are exposed to. We have reason therefore to be jealous over ourselves and others, lest we be ensnared by him.

2nd. The consequence the apostle feared was, lest his labour should be in vain. And thus it would have been if the tempter had tempted them, and prevailed against them to move them from the faith. They had lost what they had wrought, and the apostle would have lost what he laboured for. Note, It is the devil's design to hinder the good fruit and effect of the preaching the gospel. If he cannot hinder ministers from labouring in the word and doctrine, he will, if he be able, hinder them of the success of their labours. Note also, Faithful ministers are much concerned about the success of their labours. No one would willingly labour in vain; and ministers are loath to spend their strength, and pains, and time for nought.

2. To prevent this danger, with its bad consequence, the apostle tells them what care he took in sending Timothy. 1st. To put them in mind of what he had told them before concerning suffering tribulation, ver. 4, he saith, ver. 3, "We are appointed thereunto," that is, unto afflictions. So is the will and purpose of God, that "through many afflictions we must enter into his kingdom." Their troubles and persecutions did not come by chance, nor merely from the wrath and malice of the enemies of religion, but by the appointment of God. It only the word, but of the fact that they accepted "the word of God" when they accepted the Gospel from him and his helpers. "On receiving a word of hearing from us of God, ye accepted not a word of men, but even as it is truly, a word of God" (Vaughan). So Alford and Olshausen.

ii. 15. "And the prophets;" all best MSS. omit "their own." Dr. Vaughan's paraphrase of verses 15 and 16 is as follows: "That blinded race, which having killed the prophets and the Saviour came to pass according as God had determined, and they knew he had told them before it would be; so that they should not think it strange, and being forewarned they should be fore-armed. Note, The apostles were so far from flattering people with an expectation of worldly prosperity in religion, that on the contrary they told them plainly they must count upon trouble in the flesh. And herein they followed the example of their great Master, the author of our faith. Besides, it might prove a confirmation of their faith, when they perceived that it only happened to them, as was predicted before. 2nd. To know their faith, that so he might inform the apostles whether they remained stedfast under all their sufferings, whether their faith failed or not; because, if their faith did not fail, they would be able to stand their ground against the tempter and all his temptations. Their faith would be "a shield to defend them against all the fiery darts of the wicked," Eph. vi. 16.

6 But now when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you: 7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith: 8 For now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord. 9 For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God; 10 Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith?

Here we have Paul's great satisfaction upon the return of Timothy with good tidings from the Thessalonians. In which we may observe,

First, The good report Timothy made concerning them, ver. 6. Without question he was a willing messenger of these good tidings. Concerning their faith, that is, concerning their stedfastness in the faith, that they were not shaken in mind, nor turned aside from the profession of the Gospel. Their love also did continue—their love to the Gospel, and the ministers of the Gospel; for they had a good and a kind remembrance of the apostles, and that constantly, or always. Their names were very dear to them, and the thoughts of them, and what they had received from them, were very precious, inasmuch that they desired greatly to see them again, and receive some spiritual gift from them; and there was no love lost, for the apostle was as desirous to see them. It is happy were there is such mutual love between ministers and people. This tends to promote religion, and the success of the gospel. The world hateth them, and therefore they should love one another.

Secondly, The great comfort and satisfaction the apostle had in this good report concerning them; ver. 7, 8, "Therefore, brethren, we were comforted in all our affliction and distress." The apostle thought this good news of them was sufficient to balance all the troubles he met with. It was easy to him to bear affliction, or persecution, or fightings from without, when he found the good success of his ministry, and constancy in the converts he made to Christianity; and his distress of mind on account of his fears within, lest he had laboured in vain, was now in a good measure over, when he understood their faith, and the perseverance of it. This put new life and spirit into the apostle, and made him vigorous and active in the name of the Lord. Thus he was not only comforted, but greatly rejoiced also: "Now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord," ver. 8. It would have been a killing thing to the apostles, if the professors of religion had been unsteady, or proved apostates; whereas nothing was more encouraging than their constancy.

Thirdly, The effects of this were thankfulness and prayer to God on their behalf. 1. Observe, how thankful the apostle was, ver. 9. He was full of joy, and full of praise and thanksgiving. When we are most cheerful we should be most thankful. What we rejoice in we should give thanks for. This is to rejoice before our God, to spiritualize our joy. Paul speaketh as if he could not tell how to express his thankfulness to God, or his joy and rejoicing for their sakes; but he was careful God should not lose the glory of that comfort he received in the welfare of his friends. His heart was enlarged with love to them, and with thanksgiving to God: he was willing to express the one and the other as well as he could. As to thankfulness to God, this especially is very imperfect in the present state; but when we come to heaven we shall do this work better than now we can.

2. He prayed for them night and day, ver. 10; that is, evening and morning, or very frequently, in the midst of the business of the day, or slumber of the night, lifting up his heart to God in prayer. Thus we should pray always. And Paul's prayer was fervent prayer; he prayed exceedingly, and was earnest in his supplication. Note, When we are most thankful we should also give ourselves to prayer; and those we give thanks for yet have need to be prayed for. Those we most rejoice in and that are our greatest comforts, must be our constant care while in this world of temptation and imperfection. There was something still lacking in their faith that Paul desired might be perfected, and to see their face in order thereunto. Note, 1st. The best of men have something wanting in their faith; if not as to the matter of it, there being some mysteries or doctrines not sufficiently known or believed by them, yet as to the clearness and certainty of the faith, there being some remaining darknesses and doubtings, at least as to the effects and operations of it, these being not so conspicuous and perfect as they should be. And, 2nd. The ministry of the word and ordinances is helpful, and to be desired and used for the perfecting that which is lacking in our faith.

11 Now God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you. 12 And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you: 13 To the end he may stablish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

himself, now pursues its course as the enemy of God and man, by obstructing our work everywhere as apostles to the Gentiles; and thus obstinately seals upon itself that fearful judgment which the full cup of its iniquity has made at last inevitable."

ii. 17. Olshausen remarks that the third chapter should begin with this verse, since the apostle here introduces a new subject, whereas between verse 20 and chap. iii. 1 there is no break, but an intimate connection.

In these words we have the earnest prayer of the apostle. He desired to be instrumental in the farther benefit of the Thessalonians: and the only way to do so whilst at a distance was by prayer for them, together with his writing or sending to them. He desired that their faith might be perfected, which he could not be the proper cause or author of; for he pretended not to dominion over their faith, nor to have the donation of it, and he therefore concludeth with prayer for them. In which observe,

First, Whom he prayeth to; namely, God and Christ. Prayer is a part of religious worship, and all religious worship is due unto God only. Prayer is here made to God, even the Father and our Father; and also to Christ, even our Lord Jesus Christ; therefore Jesus Christ our Lord is God, even as God our Father is God. Prayer is to be offered to God as our Father. So Christ taught his disciples to pray; and so the Spirit of adoption prompts them to pray, to cry, "Abba, Father." Prayer is not only to be offered in the name of Christ, but offered up to Christ himself as our Lord and our Saviour.

Secondly, What he prayeth for, with respect to himself and his fellow labourers, and on behalf of the Thessalonians.

1. He prayeth that they might have a prosperous journey to them by the will of God; that their way might be directed to them, ver. 11. The taking of a journey to this or that place, one would think, is a thing depending so much upon a man's own will, and lies so much in his own power, that Paul needed not by prayer to go to God about it; but the apostle knew that "in God we live, and move, and have our being;" that we depend upon God in all our motions and actions, as well as for the continuance of life and being; that Divine providence orders all our affairs, and that it is owing thereto if we prosper therein; that God our Father doth direct and order his children whither they shall go, and what they shall do; that our Lord Jesus Christ in a particular manner directs the motions of his faithful ministers, "those stars which he holdeth in his right hand." Let us acknowledge God in all our ways, and he will direct our paths.

2. He prayeth for the prosperity of the Thessalonians. Whether he should have an opportunity of coming to them or not, yet he earnestly prayeth for the prosperity of their souls; and there are two things he desired for them, which we should desire for ourselves and our friends.

1st. That they might "increase and abound in love," ver. 12; in love to one another, and in love to all men. Note, That mutual love is required of all Christians; and not only that they love one another, but that they also have a charitable disposition of mind, and due concern for the welfare of all men. Love is of God, and is the fulfilling of the Gospel as well as of the law. Timothy brought good tidings of their faith, yet something was lacking therein; and of their charity and love, and yet the apostle prayeth that that might increase and abound. Note, We have reason to desire to grow in every grace, and have need of the Spirit's influence in order to growth in grace; and the way to obtain that is prayer. We are beholden to God not only for the stock put into our hands at first, but for the improvement of it also. And to our prayer we must add endeavour. To excite this in the Thessalonians the apostle again mentions his love, his abounding love towards them. The more we are beloved, the more loving we should be.

2nd. That they might be established unblameable in holiness, ver. 13. This spiritual benefit is mentioned as an effect of increasing and abounding love. "To the end that he," that is, the Lord, "may stablish your hearts." Note, The more we grow and abound in grace, and particularly in the grace of love, the more we are established and confirmed in it. Note also, That holiness is required of all those that would go to heaven, and that therein we must be unblameable, that is, we must carry ourselves in every thing so as that we may not in the least contradict the profession we make of holiness. Our desire should be to have our hearts established in holiness before God, and be preserved safe to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that we may be unblameable before God, even the Father, now, and be presented blameless before the throne of his glory, when the Lord Jesus will come with all his saints. Note, First, The Lord Jesus will certainly come, and come in his glory. Secondly, When he cometh, his saints will come with him; they shall appear with him in glory. Thirdly, Then the excellency, as well as the necessity, of holiness will appear, because without this no hearts shall be established at that day, nor shall any one be unblameable, or avoid everlasting condemnation.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter the apostle gives earnest exhortations to abound in holiness, with a caution against uncleanness, enforced with several arguments, ver. 1—8. He then mentions the great duties of brotherly love, and quietness with industry in our callings, ver. 9—12. And concludeth with comforting them that mourned for their relations and friends that died in the Lord, ver. 13—18.

FURTHERMORE then we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more. 2 For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus. 3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication: 4 That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour; 5 Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God: 6 That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter: because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you

iii. 2. Best MSS. omit "and our fellow-labourer," and read "minister of God in the Gospel of Christ."

iii. 5. "Our labour be in vain:" or, "prove in vain." It might be in vain as far as the Thessalonians were concerned, if the tempter had prevailed, but not as it concerned the apostle, who had faithfully laboured amongst them (1 Cor. iii. 8).

iii. 11. "And our Lord Jesus (best MSS. omit "Christ"); it is worthy of remark that in the Greek the two nominatives "God and testified. 7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness. 8 He therefore that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God, who hath also given unto us his holy Spirit.

Here we have,

First. An exhortation to abound in holiness; to "abound more and more" in that which is good, ver. 1, 2. In which we may observe,

1. The manner in which the exhortation is given; namely, very affectionately. The apostle entreateth them as brethren; he calls them so, and loved them as such; because his love to them was very great, he exhorts them very earnestly, "We beseech and exhort you." The apostle was unwilling to take any denial, and therefore repeateth his exhortation again and again.

2. The matter of his exhortation. That they would "abound more and more" in holy walking, or excel in those things that are good, in good works. Their faith was justly famed abroad, and they were already examples to other churches; however, the apostle would have them yet farther to excel others, and to make further progress in holiness. Note, 1st. Those who do most excel others yet fall short of perfection. The very best of us should "forget those things which are behind, and reach forth unto those things that are before." 2nd. It is not enough that we abide in the faith of the Gospel, but we must abound in the work of faith. We must not only persevere to the end, but we should grow better, and walk more evenly and closely with God.

3. The arguments with which the apostle enforceth his exhortation; namely, 1st. They had been informed of their duty. They knew their Master's will, and could not plead their ignorance as an excuse. Now as faith, so knowledge, is dead without practice. They had received of them who had converted them to Christianity, or been taught of them how they ought to walk; where observe, the design of the Gospel is not only to teach men what they should believe, but also how they ought to live; not so much to fill men's minds with notions, as to regulate their temper and behaviour. The apostle taught them how to walk, not how to talk. To talk well without living well will never bring us to heaven; for the character of those that are in Christ Jesus is this, "they walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." 2nd. Another argument is, that the apostle taught and exhorted them in the name or by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was Christ's minister and ambassador, declaring to them what was the will and command of the Lord Jesus. 3rd. Another argument is this, herein they would please God. Holy walking is most pleasing to the holy God, who is glorious in holiness. This ought to be the aim and ambition of every Christian, to please God, and to be accepted of him. We should not be men pleasers, nor flesh pleasers, but should walk so as to please God. 4th. The rule according to which they ought to walk and act; that is, the commandments they had given them by the Lord Jesus Christ, which were the commandments of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, because given by authority and direction from him, and such as were agreeable to his will. The apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ were only commissioned by him to teach men to observe all things whatsoever he had commanded them, Mat. xxviii. 20. Though they had great authority from Christ, yet that was to teach men what Christ had commanded, not to give forth commandments of their own. They did not act as "lords over God's heritage," 1 Pet. v. 3, nor should any do so that pretend to be their successors. The apostle could appeal to the Thessalonians, who knew what commandments he gave them, that they were no other than what he had received from the Lord Jesus.

Secondly. A caution against uncleanness, that being a sin directly contrary to sanctification, or that holy walking he so earnestly exhorts them to. This caution is expressed and also enforced by many arguments.

1. It is expressed in these words, "That ye should abstain from fornication," ver. 3; by which words we are to understand all uncleanness whatsoever, either in a married or unmarried state: to be sure adultery is here included, though fornication is particularly mentioned. And other sorts of uncleanness are also forbidden, of which it is "a shame even to speak," though they are done by too many in secret. All that is contrary to chastity in heart, speech, and behaviour, is contrary to the command of God in the Decalogue, and contrary to that holiness the Gospel requireth.

2. There are several arguments to enforce this caution, As,

1st. This branch of sanctification in particular "is the will of God," ver. 8. Not only is it the will of God in general that we should be holy, because "he that called us is holy," and because we are chosen unto salvation through the sanctification of the Spirit; and not only doth God require holiness in the heart, but also purity in our bodies, and that we should cleanse ourselves from all "filthiness both of flesh and spirit," 2 Cor. vii. 1. Wherever the body is as it ought to be, devoted to God, and dedicated and set apart for him, it should be kept clean and pure for his service; and as chastity is one branch of our sanctification, so this is one thing God commands in his law, and what his grace effects in all true believers.

2nd. This will be greatly for our honour; so much is plainly implied, ver. 4. Whereas the contrary will be a great dishonour, "And his reproach shall not be wiped away," Pr. vi. 33. The body is here called the vessel of the soul that dwells therein, so 1 Sam. xxi. 5; and that must be kept pure from defiling lusts. Every one should be careful in this matter, as he valueth his own honour, and will not be contemptible on this account, that his inferior appetites and passions gain not the ascendancy, and tyrannize over his reason and conscience, and enslave the superior faculties of his soul. What can be more dishonourable than for a rational soul to be enslaved by bodily affections and brutal appetites?

3rd. To indulge the lusts of concupiscence is to live and act like heathens; "Even as the Gentiles which know not God," ver. 5. The Gentiles, and especially the Grecians, were commonly guilty of some sins of uncleanness, which were not so evidently forbidden by the light of nature. But they did not know God, nor his mind and will, so well as Christians do and should know this his will, namely, our sanctification in this branch of it. It is not so much to be wondered at therefore if the Gentiles indulge their fleshly appetites and lusts; but Christians should not walk as unconverted Gentiles, "in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings," &c., 1 Pet. iv. 3; because they that are in Christ "have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts."

4th. The sin of uncleanness, especially adultery, is a great piece of injustice that God will be the avenger of; so we may understand those words, "That no man go beyond or defraud his brother," ver. 6, "in any matter,"—ἐν τῇ προίτιᾳ, this matter of which the apostle is speaking in the preceding and following verses, namely, the sin of uncleanness. Some understand these words as a farther warning and caution against injustice and oppression, all fraud and deceit in our dealings with men, which are certainly a crime, and which are contrary to the Gospel. And Christians should not impose upon the ignorance and necessity of those they deal with, and so go beyond them, nor should they by equivocations or lying arts defraud them; and although this may be practised by some, and lie long undiscovered, and so go unpunished among men, yet the righteous God will render a recompence. But the meaning may rather be to shew the injustice and wrong that in many cases is done by the sin of uncleanness. Not only are fornication and other acts of uncleanness sins against his own body that committeth them, 1 Cor. vi. 18; not only are they very injurious to the sinner himself, both in soul and body; but sometimes very injurious and no less than defrauding, and acts of injustice to others, particularly to them that are joined together in the marriage covenant, and to their posterity. And as this sin is of such a heinous nature, so it follows that God will be the avenger of it. "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge," Heb. xiii. 4. This the apostle had forewarned and testified by his Gospel; which, as it contained exceeding great and precious promises, so also it "revealed from heaven the wrath of God against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," Rom. i. 18.

5th. The sin of uncleanness is contrary to the nature and design of our Christian calling; "For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness," ver. 7. The law of God forbids all impurity, and the Gospel requires the greatest purity; that calls us from uncleanness unto holiness.

6th. The contempt therefore of God's law and Gospel is the contempt of God himself. "He that despiseth, despiseth God, not man" only. Some might possibly make light of the precepts of purity and holiness, because they heard them from men like themselves; but the apostle lets them know that they were God's commands, and to violate them was no less than to despise God. He adds that God hath given Christians his Spirit, intimating that all sorts of uncleanness do in an especial manner grieve the Holy Spirit, and will provoke him to withdraw from us; and also the Holy Spirit is given unto us to arm us against these sins, and to help us to mortify these deeds of the body, that we may live, Rom. viii. 13.

9 But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. 10 And indeed ye do it toward all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more; 11 And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you; 12 That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

In these words the apostle mentions the great duties, First. Of "brotherly love." This he exhorts them to increase in yet more and more. The exhortation is introduced, not with a compliment, but with a commendation, because they were remarkable in the exercise of it, which made it less needful he should write to them about it, ver. 9. Thus by his good opinion of them he insinuated himself into their affections, and so maketh way for his exhortation to them. Note, We should take notice of that in others which is good to their praise, that by so doing we may lay engagements upon them to abound therein more and more. Observe,

1. What it is that the apostle commendeth in them. It was not so much their own virtue as God's grace, yet he taketh notice of the evidence they shewed of the grace of God in them. 1st. It was God's grace he taketh special notice of; that God had taught them this good lesson, "Ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another," ver. 9. Whoever do that which is good are taught of God to do it, and God must have the glory. All that are savingly taught of God are taught this lesson, to love one another. This is the livery of Christ's family. Note also, That the teaching of the Spirit exceeds the teachings of men; and as no man should teach contrary to what God teacheth, so none can teach so effectually as he teacheth; and men's teaching is vain and useless unless God teach also. [2nd. Those are easily taught whom God doth teach; and therefore, though eminent abilities are much to be wished for in ministers, Tit. i. 9, yet we ought not to be so anxious about the weakness or eminency of gifts in them, as fervently desirous to have God's teaching to come along with theirs; for Paul shews that God, by his teaching those Thessalonians, had made them stand the less in need of being taught by him, while he saith, "Ye need not that I write unto you, for ye yourselves are taught of God." 3rd. The Thessalonians gave good evidence of their being taught of God by their love to "the brethren in all Macedonia," ver. 10. They not only loved them of their own city and society, or such as were near them, and just of their own sentiments; but their love was extensive; and a true Christian's is so to all the saints, though distant from him in place, and differing from him in some opinions or practices of less moment.]

2. The exhortation itself is to "increase more and more" in this great grace and duty of brotherly love, ver. 10. Though these Thessalonians had in some sense no need of an exhortation to brotherly love, as if it were wholly wanting, yet they must be exhorted to pray for more, and labour for more. There are none on this side heaven who love in perfection. Those that are eminent in this or any other grace have need of increase therein, as well as perseverance unto the end.

Secondly. Of quietness and industry in their callings. Observe, 1. The apostle exhorteth to these duties; that they should "study to be quiet," ver. 11. It is a most desirable thing to have a calm and quiet temper, and to be of a peaceable and quiet behaviour. This tends much to our own and others' happiness, and Christians should study how to be quiet. We should be ambitious and industrious how to be calm and quiet in our minds, and in patience to possess our own souls, and to be quiet towards others; or of a meek and mild, a gentle and peaceable disposition, not given to strife, or contention, or division. Satan is very busy to disquiet us; and we have that in our own hearts that disposeth us to be unquiet. Therefore let us study to be quiet. It follows, "Do your own business," and when we go beyond that we expose ourselves to a great deal of inquietude. Those who are busy-bodies, meddling in other men's matters, generally have but little quiet in their own minds, and cause great disturbances among their neighbours; at least they seldom mind the other exhortation, to be diligent in their own calling, "to work with their own hands." And yet this was what the apostle commanded them, and what is required of us also. Christianity doth not discharge us of the work and duty of our particular calling, but teacheth us to be diligent therein.

2. The exhortation is enforced with a double argument. Namely, 1st. So we shall live creditably. Thus we shall walk honestly, or decently and creditably, towards them that are without, ver. 12. This will be to act as becomes the Gospel, and will gain a good report from them that are strangers, yea, enemies to it. Note, It is a great ornament to a religion when the professors of it are of meek and quiet spirits, diligent to do their own business, and not busy-bodies himself" and "Lord Jesus" are followed by a singular verb, which could scarcely be the case unless in the writer's mind absolute unity existed between them. Athanasius uses this passage in support of the unity of the Father and Son.

iv. 1. Not "by the Lord Jesus," in the form of an adjuration, but "in the Lord Jesus." The whole appeal is made as by one who is in Christ, united to him, and so has power to exhort Christians (John xv. 4, 5).

iv. 3—8. This whole passage refers to moral purity. Olshausen explains verses 4 and 5 thus: "Let each learn, by means of practice and experience, to guide and to master his body as a true instrument of the soul, and not abandon it to a fierce violence of the passions." Vaughan paraphrases, "Let nothing tempt you to think lightly of the sin of impurity. It is the business of every Christian to gain the mastery of his own body, to consecrate it wholly to God, and to treat it with the honour due to that which is thus dedicated. Leave to in other men's matters. 2nd. We shall live comfortably, and "have lack of nothing," ver. 12. People oftentimes by their slothfulness bring themselves into narrow circumstances, and reduce themselves to great straits, and are liable to many wants; when such as are diligent in their own business live comfortably, and have lack of nothing. They are not burthensome to their friends, nor scandalous to strangers. They earn their own bread, and have the greatest pleasure in so doing.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. 14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. 15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. 16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: 17 Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. 18 Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

In these words the apostle comforts the Thessalonians that mourned for the death of their relations and friends that died in the Lord. His design is to dissuade them from excessive grief or inordinate sorrow on that account. All grief for the death of friends is far from being unlawful; we may weep at least for ourselves, if we do not weep for them—weep for our own loss, though that may be their gain. Yet we must not be immoderate or excessive in our sorrows; because,

First. This looketh as if we had no hope, ver. 13. It is to act too much like the Gentiles, who had no hope of a better life after this: whereas we Christians, who have a most sure hope, the hope of eternal life after this, which God, who cannot lie, hath promised us, should moderate all our joys and our sorrows on account of any worldly thing. This hope is more than enough to balance all our griefs upon the account of any of the crosses of the present time.

Secondly. This is an effect of ignorance concerning those that are dead, ver. 13. There are some things which we cannot but be ignorant of concerning them that are asleep; for the land they are removed to is a land of darkness, which we know but little of, and have no correspondence with. To go among the dead is to go among we know not whom, and to live we know not how. Death is an unknown thing, and the state of the dead, or the state after death, we are much in the dark about; yet there are some things concerning them especially that die in the Lord that we need not, nor ought not, to be ignorant of; and if these things are rightly understood, and duly considered, they will be sufficient to allay our sorrow concerning them: namely,

1. They sleep in Jesus. They are asleep, ver. 13. They are "fallen asleep in Christ," 1 Cor. xv. 18. Death doth not annihilate them. It is but a sleep to them. It is the rest, and undisturbed rest. They are retired out of this troublesome world, to rest from all their labours and sorrows, and they sleep in Jesus, ver. 14. Being still in union with him, they sleep in his arms, and are under his special care and protection. Their souls are in his presence, and their dust under his care and power, so that they are not lost, nor are they losers, but great gainers by death, and their removal out of this world is into a better, [that is, who are dead in Christ, and shall continue in the faith whereby they are engrafted in Christ, Eph. iii. 17, to the last gasp.]

2. They shall be raised up from the dead, and awakened out of their sleep, for God "will bring them with him," ver. 14. They then are with God, and are better where they are than when they were here; and when God cometh he will bring them with him. [Through virtue of that union betwixt believers and Christ, it cometh to pass that whatever hath befallen Christ, as he is the head of believers, shall in God's due time be verified in believers themselves, that due proportion and distance being always kept which is betwixt head and members; for he inferreth that we shall be raised because he arose, because of our union with him: "Them will God bring with him." The doctrine of the resurrection, and the second coming of Christ, is a great antidote against the fear of death, and inordinate sorrow for the death of our Christian friends; and this doctrine we have a full assurance of, because "we believe that Jesus died and rose again," ver. 14. It is taken for granted, that as Christians they knew and believed this. The death and resurrection of Christ are fundamental articles of the Christian religion, and give us hope of a joyful resurrection; for "Christ, being risen from the dead, is become the first fruits of them that sleep;" and therefore "they who are fallen asleep in him are not perished or lost," 1 Cor. xv. 18, 20. His resurrection is a full confirmation of all that is said in the Gospel, or by the word of the Lord, which hath brought life and immortality to light.

3. Their state and condition shall be glorious and happy at the second coming of Christ. This the apostle informeth the Thessalonians of "by the word of the Lord," ver. 15; that is, by Divine revelation from the Lord Jesus. For, though the resurrection of the dead, and future state of blessedness, were part of the creed of the Old Testament saints, yet it is much more clearly revealed in and by the Gospel. By this word of the Lord we know,

1st. That the Lord Jesus will come down from heaven in all the pomp and power of the upper world; ver. 16, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout." He ascended up into heaven after his resurrection, and is passed through these material heavens into the third heaven, that must retain him till the restitution of all things; and then he will come again, and appear in his glory. He will descend from heaven into this our air, ver. 17. The appearance will be with pomp and power, "with a shout;" the shout of a king, and the power and authority of a mighty king and conqueror. "With the voice of the archangel;" an innumerable company of angels will attend him; perhaps one, as general of those hosts of the Lord, shall give notice of his approach, and the glorious appearance of this great Redeemer and Judge shall be proclaimed and ushered in by the trump of God: "For the trumpet shall sound," and that will wake them that sleep in the dust of the earth, and shall summon all the world to appear. For,

2nd. The dead shall be raised. "The dead in Christ shall rise first," ver. 16, that is, before those that are found alive at Christ's coming shall be changed; and so it appeareth that those who shall then "be found alive shall not prevent them that are asleep," ver. 15. The first cure of the Redeemer in that day will be about his dead saints; he will raise them before the great change passeth on them that shall be found alive; so that those that did not sleep in death will have no greater privilege nor joy at that day than those who fell asleep in Jesus.

3rd. They that shall be found alive will then be changed. They "shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air," ver. 17. At or immediately before this rapture into the clouds those that are alive will undergo a mighty change, that will be equivalent to dying. This change is so mysterious we cannot comprehend it, we know little or nothing of it, 1 Cor. xv. 51. Only, in the general, "this mortal must put on immortality;" and these bodies shall be made fit to inherit the kingdom of God, which flesh and blood in its present state is not capable of. This change will be "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," 1 Cor. xv. 52; in the very instant, or not long after the raising up of them that sleep in Jesus. And these who are raised and thus changed shall meet together in the clouds, and there meet with their Lord to congratulate his coming, and receive the crown of glory he will then bestow upon them, and to be assessors with him in judgment, approving and applauding that sentence he will then pass upon the prince of the power of the air, and all the wicked who shall be doomed to destruction with the devil and his angels.

4th. Here is the bliss of the saints at that day. They shall "be ever with the Lord," ver. 17. It will be some part of their felicity that all the saints shall meet together, and remain together for ever. But the principal happiness of heaven is this, to be with the Lord, to see him, live with him, and enjoy him for ever. This should comfort the saints upon the death of their pious friends; that, although death hath made a separation, yet their souls and bodies will meet again; we and they shall meet together again. We and they with all the saints shall meet our Lord, and be with him for ever, no more to be separated, either from him or from one another, for ever. And the apostle would have us "comfort one another with these words," ver. 18. We should endeavour to support one another in times of sorrow; not deaden one another's spirits, nor weaken one another's hands, but should comfort one another; and that may be done by serious consideration and discourse on the many good lessons to be learned from the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and the second coming of Christ, and the glory of the saints in that day.

[In the catacombs at Rome are epitaphs referring to the pagans and early Christians, whose remains are interred there. These shew how the two classes were influenced in the view of death—the one "having no hope," the believing friend of the other being regarded as "asleep" in Christ.

iv. 13–18. The best MSS. read "we" for "I" in verse 13. For general sense of this passage, see Dr. Vaughan's summary in the Introductory Notes. "Them which are asleep:" the Greek expresses "those who from time to time are laid to rest." "As others:" literally, "the rest"—i.e., those who have not the Christian's hope of a joyful resurrection. "Them also which sleep in Jesus:" literally, "through Jesus;" through his instrumentality, his work, his promise, his power, their death was what it was, a falling asleep in sure and certain hope. "We which are alive," &c.: "A living man naturally classes himself with the living, in contradistinction to those who are dead" (Vaughan). St. Paul does not here assert that he should be amongst the living at Christ's advent; he did not expect that event immediately (2 Thess. ii. 3). He uses the "we" as in 1 Cor. xv. 52. "In the clouds;" rather, "in" or "amongst clouds."

[Learn hence, (says Barnes,) 1. That the world without religion is destitute of hope. It is just as true of the heathen world now as it was of the ancient pagans, that they have no hope of a future state. They have no evidence that there is any such future state of blessedness; and without such evidence there can be no hope. Compare Eph. ii. 12. 2. That the excessive sorrow of the children of this world, when they lose a friend, is not to be wondered at. They bury their hopes in the grave. 3. It is only the hope of future blessedness that can mitigate this sorrow. 4. It is a sad thing to die without hope—so to die as to have no hope for ourselves, and to leave none to our surviving friends that we are happy. Such is the condition of the whole heathen world; and such the state of those who die in Christian lands, who have no evidence that their peace is made with God. As I love my friends—my father, my mother, my wife, my children, I would not have them go forth and weep over my grave as those who have no hope in my death. I would have their sorrow for my departure alleviated by the belief that my soul is happy with my God, even when they commit my cold clay to the dust; and were there no other reason for being a Christian, this would be worth all the effort which it requires to become one. It would demonstrate the unspeakable value of religion, that my living friends may go forth to my grave and be comforted in their sorrows with the assurance that my soul is already in glory, and that my body will rise again! No eulogium for talents, accomplishments, or learning; no panegyrs of praise for eloquence, beauty, or martial deeds; no remembrances of wealth and worldly greatness, would then so meet the desires which my heart cherishes, as to have them enabled, when standing around my open grave, to sing the song which only Christians can sing:—

Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb,
Take this new treasure to thy trust;
And give these sacred relics room
To seek a slumber in the dust.
Nor pain, nor grief, nor anxious fear
Invade thy bounds. No mortal woes
Can reach the peaceful sleeper here,
While angels watch the soft repose.
So Jesus slept: God's dying Son
Passed thro' the grave, and blest the bed;
Rest here, blest saint, till from his throne
The morning break, and pierce the shade.
Break from his throne, illustrious morn;
Attend, O Earth, his sovereign word;
Restore thy trust—a glorious form—
Called to ascend, and meet the Lord.—Watts.]

CHAPTER V.

The apostle having spoken in the end of the foregoing chapter concerning the resurrection, and the second coming of Christ, he proceeds to speak concerning the uselessness of inquiring after the particular time of Christ's coming, which would be sudden and terrible to the wicked, but comfortable to the saints, ver. 1–5. He then exhorts them to the duties of watchfulness, sobriety, and exercise of faith, love, and hope, as being suitable to their state, ver. 6–10. In the next words he exhorts them to several duties they owed to others, or to one another, ver. 11–15; and afterwards to several other Christian duties of great importance, ver. 16–22. And then concludes this epistle, ver. 23–28.

OF the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. 2 For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. 3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape. 4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. 5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

In these words observe,

First. The apostle tells the Thessalonians it was useless or needless to inquire about the particular time of Christ's coming: "Of the times and seasons ye need not that I write unto you," ver. 1. The thing is certain that Christ will come, and there is a certain time appointed for his coming; but there was no need that the apostle should write about that, and therefore he had no revelation given him. Nor should they or we inquire into this secret, "which the Father hath reserved in his own power;" "Of that day and hour knoweth no man." Christ himself did not reveal this while upon earth; it was not in his commission as the great Prophet of the church. Nor did he reveal this to his apostles; there was no need of this. There are times and seasons for us to do our work in, that it is our duty and interest to know and observe; but the time and season when we must give up our account we know not, nor is it needful we should know that. Note, There are many things which our vain curiosity desireth to know which there is no necessity at all of our knowing, nor would our knowledge of them do us good.

Secondly. He tells them the coming of Christ would be sudden, and a great surprise to most men, ver. 2. And this is what they knew perfectly, or might know, because our Lord himself had so said: "In such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh," Mat. xxiv. 44. So Mar. xiii. 35, 36, "Watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping." And no doubt the apostle had told them, as of the coming of Christ, so also of his coming suddenly, which is the meaning of his coming as a thief in the night, Rev. xvi. 15. As the thief usually cometh in the dead time of the night, when he is least expected, such a surprise will the day of the Lord be; so sudden and surprising his appearance. And the knowledge of this will be more useful than to know the exact time, because this should awaken us to stand upon our watch, that we may be ready whenever he cometh.

Thirdly. He tells them how terrible Christ's coming would be to the ungodly, ver. 3. It will be to their destruction in that day of the Lord. The righteous God will bring ruin upon his and his people's enemies; and this their destruction, as it will be total and final, so, 1. It will be sudden. It will overtake them, and fall upon them in the midst of their carnal security and jollity; when they say in their hearts, "Peace and safety," when they dream of felicity, and please themselves with vain amusements of their fancies or their senses, and think not of it, "as travail cometh upon a woman with child," at the set time indeed, but was not perhaps just then expected, nor greatly feared. 2. It will be unavoidable destruction too. "They shall not escape;" they shall in no wise escape; there will be no means possible for them to avoid the terror or the punishment of that day. There will be "no place where the workers of iniquity shall be able to hide themselves;" no shelter from the storm, nor shadow from the burning heat that shall consume the wicked.

Fourthly. He tells them how comfortable this day will be to the righteous, ver. 4, 5; where observe,

1. Their character and privilege. They are not in darkness; they are the children of the light, &c. This was the happy condition of the Thessalonians, and of all true Christians; they were not in a state of sin and ignorance, as the heathen world. They were "sometime darkness, but were made light in the Lord." They were favoured with the Divine revelation of things that are unseen and eternal, particularly concerning the coming of Christ and the consequences thereof. They were "the children of the day," for "the day star had risen upon them," yea, the Sun of righteousness had shined on them with healing under his wings. They were no longer under the darkness of heathenism, nor under the shadows of the law, but under the Gospel, which brings life and immortality to light.

2. Their great advantage on this account; "That that day should not overtake them as a thief," ver. 4. It was at least their own fault if they were surprised by that day. They had fair warning and sufficient helps to provide against that day, and might hope to stand with comfort and confidence before the Son of man. This would be a time of "refreshing to them from the presence of the Lord," who to "them that look for him will appear without sin unto their salvation," and will come to them as a friend in the day, not as a thief in the night.

6 Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober. 7 For they that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night. 8 But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation. 9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, 10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

From what had been said the apostle grounds seasonable exhortations to several needful duties.

First. To watchfulness and sobriety, ver. 6. These duties are distinct, yet they mutually befriend one another; for whilst we are compassed about with so many temptations to intemperance and excess we shall not keep sober, unless we be upon our guard; and unless we keep sober we shall not long watch.

1. Then "let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch;" that is, we must not be secure and careless, nor indulge spiritual sloth and idleness. We must not be off our watch, but continually upon our guard against sin and temptation to it. The generality of men are too careless of their duty and regardless of their spiritual enemies. They say "Peace and safety" when they are in the greatest danger, and doze away their precious moments, on which eternity depends, indulging idle dreams; and have no more thoughts and cares about another world than men that are asleep have about this. Either they do not consider the things of another world at all, because they are asleep, or they do not consider them aright, because they dream. But let us watch, and act like men that are awake, and that stand upon their guard.

2. Let us also be sober, or temperate, and moderate. Let us keep our natural desires and appetites after the things of this world within due bounds. Sobriety is usually opposed to excess in meats and drinks, and here particularly in is opposed to drunkenness. But it also extends to other temporal things. Thus our Saviour warned his disciples to "take heed lest their hearts were overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon them unawares," Lu. xxi. 34. "Our moderation," then, as to all temporal things "should be known to all men, because the Lord is at hand."

Besides this, watchfulness and sobriety are most suitable to the Christian's character and privilege, as being "children of the day," because "they that sleep sleep in the night, and they that be drunken are drunken in the night," ver. 7. It is a most reproachful thing for men to sleep away the daytime, which is for work, and not for sleep; to be drunken in the day, when so many eyes are upon them to behold their shame. It was not so strange if those who had not the benefit of Divine revelation suffered themselves to be lulled asleep by the devil in carnal security, and if they laid the reins upon the neck of their appetites, and indulged themselves in all manner of riot and excess,—for it was night time with them: "they were not sensible of their danger, therefore they slept; they were not sensible of their duty, therefore they were drunk. But it ill becomes Christians to do thus. What! shall Christians, who have the light of the blessed Gospel shining in their faces, be careless about their souls, and mindless of another world? They that have so many eyes upon them should carry themselves decently.

Secondly. To be well armed as well as watchful; to put on the whole armour of God. And this is necessary, in order to such sobriety as becomes us, and will be a preparation for the day of the Lord, because our spiritual enemies are many, and mighty, and malicious. They draw many to their interest, and keep them in it, by making them careless, and secure, and presumptuous; by making them drunk,—drunk with pride, drunk with passion, drunk and giddy with self-conceit, drunk with the gratifications of sense; so that we have need to arm ourselves against their attempts, by putting on the spiritual breastplate to keep

"Robed round with upbearing clouds" (Ellicott). "Wherefore comfort one another with these words:" observe the apostle's tone of perfect satisfaction, as opposed to the sadness of heathen writers. "Suns can set and rise again; when once our brief light sets, we must sleep through one perpetual night" (Catullus). "Hopes are for the living; the dying are without hope" (Theocritus).

v. 1–3. The apostle passes from the circumstances of the resurrection to the time. This he declares unknown equally to himself and others. "Neither is it to be asserted 'the Lord is coming even now,' nor yet 'he comes not now, but only at such and such a time;' every fixing of the time, be it of a positive or of a negative nature, is of evil. In this acceptance, the doctrine of the advent is of a truly practical nature, in that it promotes moral watchfulness without countenancing anything fanatical" (Olshausen).

v. 4. "Not in darkness:" spiritual or moral.

v. 5. Literally, "For all ye are sons of light and sons of day."

the heart, and the spiritual helmet to secure the head; and this spiritual armour consists of the three great graces of the Christians, faith, love, and hope, ver. 8.

1. We must live by faith, and that will keep us watchful and sober. If we believe that the eye of God, who is a spirit, is always upon us; that we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, that there is a world of spirits to prepare for, we shall see reason to watch and be sober. Faith will be our best defence against the assaults of our enemies.

2. We must get a heart inflamed with love; and this also will be our defence. True and fervent love to God, and the things of God, will keep us watchful and sober, and hinder our apostasy in times of trouble and temptation.

3. We must make salvation our hope, and should have a lively hope of it. This good hope, through grace, of eternal life, will be as a helmet to defend the head, and hinder our being intoxicated with the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season. If we have hope of salvation let us take heed of doing any thing that shall shake our hopes, or render ourselves unworthy of, or unfit for, the great salvation we hope for. Having mentioned salvation and the hope of it, the apostle shews what grounds and reasons the Christians have to hope for it, the apostle shews, as to which observe he saith nothing of their meriting it. No; the doctrine of our merits is altogether unscriptural and antisciptural. There is no foundation of any good hope upon that account. But our hopes are to be grounded, 1st. Upon God's appointment; because "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation," ver. 9. If we would trace our salvation to the first cause, that is God's appointment. Those that live and die in darkness and ignorance, that sleep and are drunken, as in the night, it is but too plain they are appointed to wrath; but as for those who are of the day, if they watch and be sober, it is evident they are appointed to obtain salvation. And the sureness and firmness of the Divine appointment is the great support and encouragement of our hope. Were we to obtain salvation by our own merit or power, we could have but little or no hope of it; but seeing we are to obtain it by virtue of God's appointment, which we are sure cannot be shaken, "for his purpose according to election shall stand," on that we build unshaken hope; especially when we consider, 2nd. Christ's merit and grace, and that salvation is "by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us." Our salvation therefore is owing to, and our hopes of it grounded on, Christ's atonement as well as God's appointment; and as we should think on God's gracious design and purpose, so also on Christ's death and sufferings for this end, "that whether we wake or sleep," that is, whether we live or die, for death is but a sleep to believers, as the apostle had before intimated, "we should live together with Christ," that is, live in union with him, and in glory with him for ever. And as it is the salvation that Christians hope for, to "be for ever with the Lord," so one foundation of their hope is their union with him. And if they are united with Christ, and live in him, and live to him here, the sleep of death will be no prejudice to the spiritual life, much less to the life of glory hereafter. On the contrary, Christ hath died for us, that living and dying we might be his, that we might live to him whilst we are here, and live with him when we go hence.

11 Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do. 12 And we beseech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; 13 And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves. 14 Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient toward all men. 15 See that none render evil for evil unto any man; but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men.

In these words the apostle exhorts the Thessalonians to several duties.

First. Towards those that were nearly related one to another. Such should comfort themselves, or exhort one another, and edify one another, ver. 11.

1. They must comfort or exhort themselves and one another, for the original word may be rendered both these ways. And we may observe, as those are most able and likely to comfort others who can comfort themselves, so the way to have comfort ourselves, or to administer comfort to others, is by compliance with the exhortation of the word. Note, We should not only be careful about our own comfort and welfare, but to promote the comfort and welfare of others also. He was a Cain that said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" We "must bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

2. They must edify one another, by "following after those things whereby one may edify another." Rom. xiv. 19. As Christians are "lively stones built up together a spiritual house," they should endeavour to promote the good of the whole church by promoting the work of grace in one another. And it is the duty of every one of us to study that which is for the edification of those with whom we converse, to please all men for their real profit. We should communicate our knowledge and experiences one to another; we should join in prayer and praise one with another; we should set a good example one before another. And it is the duty of those especially that live in the same vicinity and family thus to comfort and edify one another; and this is the best neighbourhood, the best means, to answer the end of society. Such as are nearly related together, and have affection for one another, as they have the greatest opportunity, so they are under the greatest obligation, to do this kindness one to another. This the Thessalonians did, which also ye do; and this is what they are exhorted to continue and increase in doing. Note, Those that do that which is good have need of further exhortations to excite them to do good, to do more good, as well as continue in doing what they do.

Secondly, He sheweth them their duty towards their ministers, ver. 12, 13. Though the apostle himself was driven from them, yet they had others who laboured among them, and to whom they owed these duties. The apostle here exhorts them to observe,

1. How the ministers of the Gospel are described by the work of their office; and they should rather mind the work and duty they are called to than affect venerable and honourable names they may be called by. Their work is very weighty, and very honourable and useful. 1st. Ministers must labour among their people, labour with diligence, and unto weariness, so the word in the original imports, "They must labour in the word and doctrine," 1 Tim. v. 17. They are called labourers, and should not be loiterers; they must labour with their people, that is, to instruct, and comfort, and edify them. And, 2nd. Ministers are to rule the people also, so the word is rendered, 1 Tim. v. 17; not rule with rigour, but with love. They must not exercise dominion as temporal lords, but rule as spiritual guides, by setting a good example to the flock. They are over the people in the Lord, to distinguish them from civil magistrates, and to denote also that they are but ministers under Christ, appointed by him, and must rule the people by Christ's laws, and not by laws of their own. This may also intimate the end of their office and all their labour, namely, the service and honour of the Lord. 3rd. They must also admonish the people, and that not only publicly, but privately, as there may be occasion. They must instruct them to do well, and should reprove them when they do ill. It is their duty not only to give good counsel, but also to give admonition; to give warning to the flock of the dangers they are liable to, and reproof for negligence, or what else may be amiss.

2. What the duty of the people is towards their ministers. There is a mutual duty between ministers and people. If ministers should labour among the people, then, 1st. The people must know them. As the shepherd should know his flock, so the sheep must know their shepherd. They must know his person, and hear his voice, and acknowledge him for their pastor, and pay due regard to his teaching, and ruling, and admonitions. 2nd. They must esteem their ministers highly in love. They should greatly value the office of the ministry, and honour and love the persons of their ministers, and shew their esteem and affection in all proper ways, and this "for their work's sake," because their business is to promote the honour of Christ, and the welfare of men's souls. Note, 1. Faithful ministers ought to be so far from being lightly esteemed because of their work, that they should be highly esteemed on the account thereof. The work of the ministry is so far from being a disgrace to them who upon other accounts deserve esteem, that it puts an honour upon them who are faithful and diligent, which otherwise they could lay no claim to, and will procure them that esteem and love among good people which otherwise they could not expect. [2. So great an enemy is Satan to the ordinance of a public ministry, 1 Thes. ii. 18,—so necessary is it that people do countenance that ordinance, and encourage those who are intrusted with it, even for their own good, Heb. xiii. 17,—so ignorant, unmindful, and neglective are they of those duties which they ought to perform for that end, 2 Cor. xii. 11,—that the servants of Christ should, with much seriousness and affectionate insinuation, press upon the Lord's people all such duties of respect, reverence, love, obedience, submission, Heb. xiii. 17, and gratitude, Gal. vi. 6, as they owe unto their ministers and those who are over them in the Lord; so far should they be from a total neglect of pressing any such duties, under a pretence of self-denial, or from preposterous modesty; for Paul doth here most seriously and affectionately press duties of that kind: "And we beseech you, brethren, to know" &c.]

Thirdly, He giveth divers other exhortations touching the duty Christians owe to one another.

1. To "be at peace among themselves," ver. 13. Some understand this exhortation, according to the reading in some copies, as referring to the people's duty to their ministers, to live peaceably with them, and not raise or promote dissensions at any time between minister and people, which will certainly prove a hindrance to the success of a minister's work and the edification of the people. This is certain: ministers and people should avoid every thing that tends to alienate their affections one from another; and the people should be at peace among themselves, doing all they can to hinder any differences from rising or continuing among them, and using all proper means to preserve peace and harmony.

2. To "warn the unruly," ver. 14. There will be in all societies some that walk disorderly, who go out of their rank and station; and it is not only the duty of ministers, but of private Christians also, to warn and admonish them. Such should be reprov'd for their sin, and warned of their danger, and told plainly of the injury they do their own souls, and the hurt they may do to others. Such should be put in mind of what they should do, and be reprov'd for doing otherwise.

3. To "comfort the feeble-minded," ver. 14. By these are intended the timorous and faint-hearted, or such as are dejected and of a sorrowful spirit. Some are cowardly, and afraid of difficulties, and disheartened at the thoughts of hazards, and losses, and afflictions. Now such should be encouraged; we should not despise them, but comfort them. And who knows what good a kind and comfortable word may do them?

4. To "support the weak," ver. 14. Some are not well able to perform their work, nor bear up under their burthens; we should therefore support them and help their infirmities, and lift at one end of the burthen, and so help to bear it. It is the grace of God indeed that must strengthen and support such, but we should tell them of that grace, and endeavour to minister of that grace to them.

5. To "be patient towards all men," ver. 14. We must bear and forbear. We must be long-suffering, and suppress our anger, if it begins to rise upon the apprehension of affronts or injuries; at least we must not fail to moderate our anger, and this duty must be exercised towards all men, good and bad, high and low, &c. We must not be high in our expectations and demands, nor harsh in our resentments, nor hard in our impositions; but endeavour to make the best we can of every thing, and think the best we can of every body.

6. Not to "render evil for evil to any man," ver. 15. This we must look to, and be very careful about; that is, we must by all means forbear to revenge ourselves: if others do us an injury, that will not justify us in returning it, in doing the same, or the like, or any other injury to them. It becomes us to forgive, as those that are, and that hope to be, forgiven of God.

7. "Ever to follow that which is good," ver. 15; that is, in the general we must study to do what is our duty, and pleasing to God in all circumstances, whether men do us good turns or ill turns; whatever men do to us, we must do good to others. We must always endeavour to be beneficent, and instrumental to promote the welfare of others, both among ourselves, in the first place to "them that are of the household of faith," and then "as we have opportunity unto all men," Gal. vi. 10.

16 Rejoice evermore. 17 Pray without ceasing. 18 In every thing give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you. 19 Quench not the Spirit. 20 Despise not prophesyings. 21 Prove all things; hold fast that which is good. 22 Abstain from all appearance of evil.

Here we have divers short exhortations, that will not burthen our memories, but will be of great use to direct the motions of our hearts and lives; for the duties are of great importance. And we may observe how they are connected together, and have a dependence upon one another.

This expression seems to involve the idea of having received one's higher life from the Light (John i. 9).

v. 9. "Others:" literally, "the rest" (chap. iv. 13).

v. 10. "Whether we wake or sleep:" these words seem at first sight strange, since in verse 6 sleeping among the faithful was forbidden, and spoken of as the sin of the unconverted. The explanation must be that the apostle uses the word in different senses in the two passages—in verse 6 apathy to spiritual things is indicated; in verse 10 sleep signifies death, waking, life. Hence the meaning of St. Paul is, that our hope of salvation through our Lord is equally certain of fulfilment, whether we live to see his coming or die before he comes (Rom. xiv. 8).

v. 12, 13. "Know:" i.e., acknowledge, recognise their due position amongst you. "Are over you in the Lord" &c.: "Have the oversight of you in the Lord, and give you exhortation." So Cranmer, Tyndal, Geneva. "Very highly:" literally, "more than abundantly."

First. "Rejoice evermore," ver. 16. This must be understood of spiritual joy; for we must rejoice in our creature comforts as if we rejoiced not, and must not expect to live many years, and rejoice in them all. But if we do rejoice in God, we may do that evermore; in him our joy will be full, and it is our fault if we have not a continual feast. If we are sorrowful upon any worldly account, yet still we may always rejoice, 2 Cor. vi. 10. Note, A religious life is a pleasant life, it is a life of constant joy.

Secondly. "Pray without ceasing," ver. 17. Note, The way to rejoice evermore is to pray without ceasing. We should rejoice more if we did pray more. We should keep up stated times for prayer, and continue instant in prayer. Pray always, and not faint; pray without weariness, and continue in prayer, till we come to that world where prayer shall be swallowed up in praise. The meaning is not, that men should do nothing but pray, but that nothing else we do should hinder prayer in its proper season. Prayer will help forward, and not hinder all other lawful business, and every good work.

Thirdly. "In every thing give thanks," ver. 18. And if we pray without ceasing, we shall not want matter for thanksgiving, in every thing. As we must in every thing make our requests known to God by supplications, so we must not omit thanksgiving, Phi. iv. 6. We should be thankful in every condition, even in adversity as well as prosperity. It is never so bad with us but it might be worse. If we have never so much occasion to make our humble complaints to God, we never can have any reason to complain of God, and have always much reason to praise and give thanks; and the apostle saith, "This is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us," that we do give thanks; that is, seeing God is reconciled to us in Christ Jesus; in him and through him, and for his sake, he alloweth us to rejoice evermore, and appointeth us in every thing to give thanks. It is pleasing to God.

Fourthly. "Quench not the Spirit," ver. 19. For it is this Spirit of grace and supplication that helpeth our infirmities, that assisteth us in our prayers and thanksgivings. Christians are said "to be baptized with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." He worketh as fire, by enlightening, and enlivening, and purifying the souls of men. We must be careful not to quench this holy fire. As fire is put out by withdrawing fuel, so we quench the Spirit if we do not stir up our spirits, and all that is within us, to comply with the motions of the good Spirit; and as fire is quenched by pouring water, or putting a great quantity of dirt upon it, so we must be careful not to quench the Holy Spirit, by indulging in carnal lusts and affections, or minding only earthly things.

Fifthly. "Despise not prophesyings," ver. 20. For if we neglect the means of grace, we forfeit the Spirit of grace. By prophesyings here we are to understand the preaching of the word, the interpretation and applying of the Scriptures; and this we must not despise, but should prize and value, because it is the ordinance of God, appointed of him for our furtherance and increase in knowledge and grace, and holiness and comfort. We must not despise preaching, though it be plain, and not with enticing words of men's wisdom, and though we are told no more than what we knew before. It is useful, and many times needful, to have our minds stirred up, our affections and resolutions excited, to those things that we knew before to be our interest and our duty.

Sixthly. "Prove all things, but hold fast that which is good," ver. 21. This is a needful caution to prove all things; for, though we must put a value on preaching, we must not take things upon trust from the preacher, but try them by the law and the testimony. We must search the Scriptures, whether what they say be true or not. We must not believe every spirit, but must try the spirits; but we must not be always trying, always unsettled; no, at length we must be settled, and "hold fast that which is good." When we are satisfied that any thing is right, and true, and good, we must hold it fast, and not let it go, whatever opposition or whatever persecution we meet with for the sake thereof. Note, The doctrines of human infallibility, and implicit faith, and blind obedience, are not the doctrines of the Bible. Every Christian hath, and ought to have, the judgment of discretion, and should have his "senses exercised in the discerning between good and evil," truth and falsehood, Heb. v. 13, 14. And proving all things must be in order to the holding fast that which is good. We must not always be seekers, or fluctuating in our minds, "like children tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine."

Seventhly. "Abstain from all appearance of evil," ver. 22. And this is a good means to prevent our being deceived with false doctrines, or unsettled in our faith; for our Saviour hath told us, Jno. vii. 17, "If a man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." Corrupt affections indulged in the heart, and evil practices allowed of in the life, will greatly tend to promote fatal errors in the mind; whereas purity of heart, and integrity of life, will dispose men to receive the truth in the love of it. We should therefore abstain from evil, and all appearances of evil, from sin, and that which looks like sin, and that leads to it, and borders upon it. He that is not shy of the appearances of sin, and who shuns not the occasions of sin, and who avoids not the temptations and approaches to sin, will not long abstain from the actual commission of sin.

23 And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. 24 Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it. 25 Brethren, pray for us. 26 Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss. 27 I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren. 28 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

These words conclude this epistle. In which observe, First, Paul's prayer for them, ver. 23. He had told them, in the beginning of this epistle, he always made mention of them in his prayers; and now he is writing to them, he lifteth up his heart to God in prayer for them. Take notice,

1. To whom the apostle prays; namely, "The very God of peace." He is the God of grace, and the God of peace and love; he is the author of peace and lover of concord; and by their peaceableness and unity, from God as the author, those things would best be obtained which he prays for.

2. The things he prays for on behalf of the Thessalonians are,—their sanctification, that God would sanctify them wholly; and their preservation, that they might be "preserved blameless." He prays they may be wholly sanctified, that is, that the whole man might be sanctified; and then that the whole man, spirit, soul, and body, might be preserved. Or, he prays that they might be wholly sanctified, that is, more perfectly, for the best are sanctified but in part, while in this world; and therefore we should pray for, and press towards, complete sanctification. And where the good work of grace is begun, it shall be carried on, be protected and preserved; and all those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus shall be preserved to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. And because, if God did not carry on his good work in the soul, that would miscarry, we should pray God to perfect his work, and preserve us blameless, that is, free from sin and impurity, till at length we are presented faultless before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy.

Secondly. His comfortable assurance that God would hear his prayer. "Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it," ver. 24. The kindness and love of God had appeared to them in calling them to the knowledge of his truth, and the faithfulness of God was their security that they should persevere to the end; and therefore, the apostle assures them God would do what he desired; he would effect what he had promised; he would accomplish all the good pleasure of his goodness towards them. Note, That our fidelity to God depends upon his faithfulness to us.

Thirdly. His request of their prayers; "Brethren, pray for us," ver. 25. We should pray one for another, and brethren should thus express brotherly love. This great apostle did not think it beneath him to call the Thessalonians brethren, nor below him to request their prayers. Ministers stand in need of their people's prayers; and the more people do pray for their ministers the more good ministers may have from God, and the people may receive by their ministry.

Fourthly. His salutation. "Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss," ver. 26. Thus the apostle sends a friendly salutation from himself, and Silvanus and Timothy; and would have them salute each other in their names. And thus he would have them signify their mutual love and affection to one another, by the kiss of charity, 1 Pet. v. 14; which is here called an holy kiss, to intimate how cautious they should be of all impurity in the use of this ceremony then commonly practised; as it should not be a treacherous kiss like that of Judas, so not a lascivious kiss like that of the harlot, Pr. vii. 13: see on Rom. xvi. 16.

Fifthly. His solemn charge for the reading this epistle, ver. 27. This is not only an exhortation, but an adjuration by the Lord. And this epistle was to be read to all the holy brethren. It is not only allowed to the common people to read the Scriptures, and what none should prohibit, but it is their indispensable duty, and what they should be persuaded to do; and in order to this, these holy oracles should not be kept concealed in an unknown tongue, but be translated into the vulgar languages; that, all men being concerned to know the Scriptures, they all may be able to read them, and be acquainted with them. The public reading of the law was one part of the worship of the sabbath among the Jews in their synagogues, and the Scriptures should be read in the public assemblies of Christians also.

Sixthly. The apostolical benediction that is usual in other epistles. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, Amen," ver. 28. We need no more to make us happy than to know that grace which our Lord Jesus Christ hath manifested, and be interested in that grace he hath purchased, and partake of that grace that dwells in him as the Head of the church. This is an ever-flowing and overflowing fountain of grace to supply all our wants.

TREADING THE GRAPES.
1 Tim. v. 18.

"For their work's sake:" "the work of forwarding your salvation and the kingdom of God." "Be at peace among yourselves:" the "and" of the Authorised Version is not in the Greek. Most connect this charge with the preceding subject, though in somewhat varying senses. "Here the charge follows closely upon the call to appreciate and esteem the Christian ministry. Subordination is peace" (Vaughan). "Where teachers and taught stand in a false position towards each other, there the peace of the Church is already undermined" (Olshausen). "Let there not only be peace between ministers and their flocks, but also no party rivalries among yourselves—one contending in behalf of one favourite minister, another in behalf of another" (Fausset).

v. 14. "Support the weak, be patient toward all men:" "There is no believer who needs not the exercise of patience 'toward' him; there is none to whom a believer ought not to show it. Many show it more to strangers than to their own families, more to the great than to the humble; but we ought to show it 'toward all men'" (Bengel).

v. 22. The Authorised Version, "from all appearance of evil," cannot be sustained. The reading "from every form of evil" is supported by Ellicott, Conybeare, Alford, Olshausen, and others. The apostle is not distinguishing between "good" and the appearance of evil, but actual evil in any form: "Hold fast that which is good; abstain from every form of evil."

CHARIOTS.

ST. PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

This second epistle was written soon after the former, and seems to be designed to prevent their running into a mistake, which might arise from some passages in the former epistle, concerning the second coming of Christ, as if it were near at hand. The apostle in this epistle is careful to prevent any wrong use some among them might make of those expressions of his, that were agreeable to the dialect of the prophets of the Old Testament, and informeth them that there were many intermediate counsels yet to be fulfilled before that day of the Lord shall come, though because it is sure he had spoken of it as near. There are other things he writeth about for their consolation under sufferings, and exhortation and direction in duty.

CHAPTER I.

After the introduction, ver. 1, 2, the apostle begins this epistle with an account of his high esteem for these Thessalonians, ver. 3, 4. He then comforteth them under their afflictions and persecutions, ver. 5—10; and tells them what his prayers were to God for them, ver. 11, 12.

AUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: 2 Grace unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. 3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth; 4 So that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

Here we have,

First. The introduction, ver. 1, 2, in the same words as in the former epistle; from whence we may observe, that as this apostle did not account it grievous to him to write the same things, Phil. iii. 1, in his epistles that he had delivered in preaching, so he willingly wrote the same things to one church as he did to another. And here the same words in the second epistle, as in the former, sheweth us that ministers ought not so much to regard the variety of expression and elegance of style as the truth and usefulness of the doctrines they preach. And great care should be taken lest, from an affectation of novelty in method and phrases, we advance new notions or doctrines contrary to the principles of natural or revealed religion, upon which this church of the Thessalonians was built, as all true churches are; namely, "in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

Secondly. The high esteem this apostle had for them. He not only had a great affection for them, as he had expressed in his former epistle, and now again, in his pious wish of grace and peace for them, but he also expresseth his great esteem for them. Concerning which observe,

1. How his esteem of them is expressed, namely,

1st. He glorifieth God on their behalf; "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet," ver. 3. He chooseth rather to speak of what was praiseworthy in them in a way of thanksgiving to God than by commendation of them; and as what he mentions was matter of his rejoicing, he accounted it matter of thanksgiving; and it was meet or fit it should be so, for we are bound, and it is our duty, to be thankful to God for all the good that is found in us or others; and it not only is an act of kindness to our fellow Christians, but our duty, to thank God on their behalf.

2nd. He also glories in them before the churches of God, ver. 4. The apostle never flattered his friends, but he took pleasure in commending them, and speaking well of them, to the glory of God, and for the excitement and encouragement of others. Paul did not glory in his own gifts, nor his labour among them, but he gloried in the grace of God which was bestowed upon them, and so his glorying was good; because all the commendation he gave to them, and the pleasure he took himself, centred in the praise and glory of God.

2. For what he esteemed them and thanked God; namely, the increase of their faith, and love, and patience. In his former epistle, ch. i. 3, he gave thanks for their faith, and love, and patience; here he giveth thanks for the increase of all those graces, that they were not only true Christians, but growing Christians. Note, 1st. That where there is the truth of grace there will be increase of it. The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day; and where there is the increase of grace God must have all the glory of it. We are as much indebted to him for the improvement of grace, and the progress of that good work, as we are for the first work of grace, and the very beginning of it. We may be tempted to think that though, when we were bad, we could not make ourselves good, yet when we are good we can easily make ourselves better; but we have as much dependence on the grace of God for the increasing the grace we have as for the planting of grace when we had it not. [2nd. As the Lord giveth sometimes way unto the rage and fury of men and devils, to trouble and persecute his dearest saints for righteousness' sake, so it usually falleth out that the more they rage the less they gain their intent; the more they stain the church's outward beauty the more doth her inward beauty, the sanctifying graces of God's Spirit and faith in Jesus Christ, increase and grow; for so was it with this persecuted and afflicted church, as the general scope of this part of the chapter, which is to comfort them under their sufferings, doth imply, and the following verse doth express; and yet Paul affirmeth here, their faith did grow exceedingly, and their charity abound.] The matter of the apostle's thanksgiving and glorying on behalf of the Thessalonians was,

1st. That their faith did grow exceedingly, ver. 3. They were more confirmed in the truth of gospel revelations, and confided in gospel promises, and had lively expectations of another world. The growth of their faith appeared by the works of faith; and where faith groweth all other graces grow proportionably.

2nd. Their charity abounded, ver. 3; that is, their love to God and man. Note, Where faith groweth love will abound, for faith worketh by love; and not only the charity of some few of them, but of every one to each other, did abound. There were no such divisions among them as in some other churches.

3rd. Their patience as well as faith did increase in all their persecutions and tribulations. And then patience hath its perfect work when it extendeth itself to all trials. There were many persecutions which the Thessalonians endured for the sake of righteousness, as well as other troubles which they met with in this calamitous life; yet they endured all these, by faith "seeing him that is invisible," and looking to the recompence of reward; and endured them with patience, not with an insensibility under them, but with patient bearing them, and that from Christian principles, which kept them quiet and submissive, and afforded them inward strength and support.

5 Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer: 6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; 7 And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, 8 In flaming fire taking vengeance on them

Introductory Note.—This epistle was written from Corinth, probably about a year after the first epistle—i.e., about the autumn of A.D. 53. For (1) the state of the Thessalonian church described in the two epistles is almost identical; (2) the same cause was exciting the church—misapprehension as to the nearness of the advent of the Lord; (3) some neglected their duty, on this account. (Compare 2 Thess. iii. 6—14, 1 Thess. iv. 10—12.) The excitement and misapprehension seems to have been aggravated by some writing that had reached Thessalonica, purporting to be from St. Paul (chap. ii. 2); and the apostle hearing of this writes this epistle to quiet and instruct the church. The objections to the genuineness and authenticity of this epistle are all modern, and are stated by Ellicott to be of a most arbitrary and subjective character, and not deserving serious consideration; they have been answered by Davidson, "Introduction," vol. ii., p. 454, &c.

i. 4—7. That which at times seemed strange to David (Psa. lxxiii.) that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: 9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; 10 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

Having mentioned their persecutions and tribulations, which they endured principally for the cause of Christ, the apostle proceedeth to offer several things for their comfort under them; as,

First. He tells them of the present happiness and advantage of their sufferings, ver. 5. Their faith being thus tried, and patience exercised, they were improved by their sufferings, inasmuch that they were "counted worthy of the kingdom of God." Their sufferings were "a manifest token" of this, that they were worthy or meet to be accounted Christians indeed, seeing they could suffer for Christianity. And the truth is, religion, if it is worth any thing, is worth every thing; and those either have no religion at all, or none that is worth having, or know not how to value it, that cannot find in their hearts to suffer for it. Besides, from their patient suffering it appeared that according to the righteous judgment of God they should be counted worthy of the heavenly glory; not by worthiness of condignity, but of congruity only; not that they could merit heaven, but were made meet for heaven. We cannot by all our sufferings, any more than by our services, merit heaven as a debt; but by our patience under our sufferings we are qualified for the joy that is promised to patient sufferers in the cause of God.

Secondly. He tells them next of the future recompence that shall be given to persecutors and persecuted, namely,

1. There will be a punishment inflicted on persecutors. God will "recompence tribulation to them that trouble you," ver. 6. And there is nothing that doth more infallibly mark a man for eternal ruin than a spirit of persecution and enmity to the name and people of God. As the faith, and patience, and constancy of the saints is to them an earnest of everlasting rest and joy, so the pride, and malice, and wickedness of their persecutors is to them an earnest of everlasting misery; for every man carries about with him, and carries out of the world with him, either his heaven or his hell. God will render a recompence, and will trouble them that trouble his people. This he hath done sometimes in this world, (witness the dreadful end of many persecutors;) but especially this he will do in the other world, where the portion of the wicked must be "weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

2. There is a reward for them that are persecuted. God will recompence their trouble with rest, ver. 7. There is a rest that remains for the people of God, a rest from sin and sorrow. Though many may be the troubles of the righteous now, yet God will deliver them out of them all; the future rest will abundantly recompence all their present troubles. "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed." There is enough in heaven to countervail all that we may lose or suffer for the name of Christ in this world. The apostle saith, "To you that are troubled, rest with us." In heaven ministers and people shall rest together, and rejoice together, who suffer together here; and the meanest Christian shall rest with the greatest apostle; nay, what is far more, if we suffer for Christ, we shall also reign with him, 2 Tim. ii. 12. Concerning this future recompence we are farther to observe,

1st. The certainty of it proved by the righteousness and justice of God. "It is a righteous thing with God," ver. 6, to render to every man according to his works; and the thoughts of this should be terrible to wicked men and persecutors, and the great support of the righteous, and such as are persecuted; for seeing there is a righteous God, there will be a righteous recompence, and God's suffering people shall lose nothing by their sufferings, and their enemies will gain nothing by their advantages against them.

2nd. The time when this righteous recompence shall be made; namely, "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven," ver. 7. That will be the day of "the revelation of the righteous judgment of God;" for then will God judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath appointed, even Jesus Christ, the righteous Judge. The righteousness of God doth not so visibly appear unto all men in the procedure of his providence as it will in the process of the great judgment-day. The Scripture hath made known to us the judgment to come, and we are bound to receive the revelation here given concerning Christ; as,

First. That the Lord Jesus will in that day appear from heaven. Now the heavens retain him, they conceal him, but then he will be revealed and made manifest; he will come in all the pomp and power of the upper world, from whence we look for the Saviour.

Secondly. He will be revealed with his mighty angels, ver. 7, or the angels of his power. These will attend upon him to grace the solemnity of that great day of his appearance; they will be the ministers of his justice and mercy in that day; they will summon the criminals to his tribunal, and gather in the elect, and be employed in executing his sentence.

Thirdly. He will come in flaming fire, ver. 8. A fire goeth before him that shall consume his enemies. The earth and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. This will be a trying fire to try every man's works; a refining fire to purify the saints, who shall share in the purity, and partake of the felicity, of the new heaven and the new earth; a consuming fire to the wicked. His light will be piercing, and his power consuming, to all those who in that day shall be found as chaff.

Fourthly. The effects of this appearance will be terrible to some and joyful to others.

1st. They will be terrible to some, for he will then take vengeance on the wicked. (1.) On those that sinned against the principles of natural religion, and rebelled against the light of nature; "That know not God," ver. 8; though the invisible things of him are manifested in the things that are seen. (2.) On those that rebel against the light of revelation, who "obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light. This is the great crime of multitudes,—"the Gospel is revealed to them, and they will not believe it; or, if they pretend to believe it, they will not obey it." Note, The believing truths of the Gospel is in order to our obeying the precepts of the Gospel; there must be the obedience of faith. To such persons as are here mentioned the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ will be terrible, because of their doom which is mentioned, ver. 9. Where observe, (1st.) They will then be punished. Though sinners may be long reprieved, yet they will be punished at last. Their misery will be a proper punishment for their crimes, and only what they have deserved. They did sin's work, and must receive sin's wages. (2nd.) Their punishment will be no less than destruction, not of their being, but of their bliss, not that of the body alone, but both as to body and soul. (3rd.) This destruction will be everlasting. They shall be always dying, and yet never die. Their misery will run parallel with the line of eternity. The chains of darkness are everlasting chains, and the fire everlasting fire. It must needs be so, since the punishment is inflicted by an eternal God, fastening upon an immortal soul, set out of the reach of Divine mercy and grace. (4th.) This destruction shall come from the presence of the Lord, that is, immediately from God himself. Here God punisheth sinners by creatures, by instruments, but then he will take the work into his own hands. It will be destruction from the Almighty, more terrible than the consuming fire which consumed Nadab and Abihu, which came from before the Lord. (5th.) It shall come from the glory of his power, or from his glorious power. Not only the justice of God, but his almighty power, will be glorified in the destruction of sinners; and who knows the power of his anger? He is able to cast into hell.

2nd. It will be a joyful day to some, even to the saints, unto them that do believe and obey the Gospel. And then the apostle's testimony concerning this day will be confirmed and believed, ver. 10. In that bright and blessed day, (1.) Christ Jesus will be glorified and admired by his saints. They shall behold his glory, and admire it with pleasure; they will glorify his grace, and admire the wonders of his power and goodness towards them, and sing Hallelujahs to him in that day of his triumph, for their complete victory and happiness. (2.) Christ will be glorified and admired in them. His grace and power will then be manifested and magnified, when it shall appear what he hath purchased for, and wrought in, and bestowed upon, all those that believe in him. As his wrath and power will be made known in and by the destruction of his enemies, so his grace and power will be magnified in the salvation of his saints. Note, 1. Christ's dealings with those that believe will be what the world shall one day wonder at. Now they are "a wonder to many," but how will they be wondered at in this great and glorious day; or, rather, how will Christ, whose name is Wonderful, be admired when the mystery of God shall be finished? Christ will not be so much admired in the glorious esteem of angels that he will bring from heaven with him, as in the many saints, the many sons, he will bring to glory. [2. As it is the duty of Christ's ministers to make application of general promises unto the particular case of the Lord's people to whom they are sent, so they should carefully guard lest they apply those promises unto any but such as are so qualified as the promise doth require; otherwise they speak peace to whom the Lord doth not speak peace; for the apostle applyeth the general comfort unto them in particular, having found them endued with faith, that necessary qualification which is required in the person to whom the promise doth belong; "Because our testimony was believed among you," saith he.]

11 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power: 12 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ.

In these verses the apostle again tells the Thessalonians of his earnest and constant prayer for them. He could not be present with them, yet he had a constant remembrance of them; they were much upon his thoughts, and he wished them well, and could not express his goodwill and good wishes to them better than in earnest, constant prayer to God for them: "Wherefore also we pray," &c. Note, The believing thoughts and expectation of the second coming of Christ should put us upon prayer to God for ourselves and others; we should "watch and pray." So our Saviour directeth his disciples, Lu. xxi. 36, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that you may be counted worthy to stand before the Son of man." Observe,

First. What the apostle prayed for, ver. 11. And it is of great concern to be well instructed what to pray for; and without Divine instruction we know not what to pray for, as without Divine assistance we shall not pray in such a manner as we ought. Our prayers should be suitable to our expectations. Thus the apostle prayeth for them,

1. That God would begin his good work of grace in them; so we may understand this expression, "That our God would count you" (or, as it may be read, make you,) "worthy of this calling." We are called with a high and holy calling; we are called to God's kingdom and glory; and no less than the inheritance of the saints is the hope of our calling, nothing less than the enjoyment of that glory and felicity which shall be revealed when Christ Jesus shall be revealed from heaven. Now, if this be our calling, our great concern should be to be worthy of it, or meet and prepared for this glory. And because we have no worthiness of our own but what is owing purely to the grace of God, we should pray that he would make us worthy, and then count us worthy, of his calling, or that he would make us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light, Col. i. 12.

2. That God would carry on the good work that is begun, and "fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness." The good pleasure of God denoteth his gracious purposes towards his people, which flow from his goodness, and are full of goodness towards them, and it is from thence that all good doth come to us. If there be any good in us, it is the fruit of God's goodwill to us, it is owing to the good pleasure of his goodness, and therefore it is called grace. Now there are various and manifold purposes of grace and goodwill in God towards his people, and the apostle prays that all of them may be fulfilled or accomplished towards these Thessalonians. There are several good works of grace begun in the hearts of God's people, which proceed from this good pleasure of God's goodness, and we should desire that they may be completed and perfected. In particular the apostle prayeth that God would fulfil in them "the work of faith with power." Note, 1st. The fulfilling the work of faith is in order to the fulfilling of every other good work. And, 2nd. It is the power of God, that not only begins, but that carrieth on and perfecteth, the work of faith. [3rd. As God doth not accomplish all the good pleasure of his goodness unto the elect at once, but by degrees and measures, until it be fully accomplished in glory, Mat. xxv. 34, so, though no endeavours of ours could have any influence on God for moving him to enact such a gracious decree in our favour, Rom. ix. 11, yet they may promote the execution of it; and especially fervent prayer is a mean appointed by God for furthering his decree to its full accomplishment; for the apostle, by praying unto God that "he would fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness," doth intimate the usefulness of prayer in order to that end.]

Secondly. Why the apostle prayed for these things, ver. 12, namely, "That the name of the Lord Jesus might be glorified;" and this is the end we should and to Jeremiah (Jer. xii. 1-4) was no mystery to St. Paul. To refer the "just judgment" (Authorised Version, "righteous judgment") only to the perfecting of the saints through suffering does not fully satisfy the sense, as Olshausen seems to think; rather, as Ellicott writes, "the apostle's argument is that their endurance of suffering in faith is a token of God's righteous judgment and of a future reward, which will display itself in rewarding the patient sufferers, as surely as it will inflict punishment on their persecutors."

"Seeing it is a righteous thing:" rather, "if so be that it is righteous." No doubt is expressed here; "as we know it is" must be understood, as if the apostle would say, "Our own feeling of what is just confirms what we know by revelation." "With his mighty angels:" rather, "with the angels of his power," the exponents and instruments of his power.

i. 8. "In flaming fire;" or, "fire of flame"—i.e., accompanied or encompassed by flame. Here the same mode of manifestation is aim at in every thing we do and desire, that God and Christ in all things might be glorified. Our own and others' happiness should be subordinate unto this ultimate end. Our good works should so shine before men that others may glorify God, that Christ may be glorified in and by us, and then we shall be glorified in and with him. And this is the great end and design of the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ, which is manifested to us, and wrought in us; or thus, it is according to the grace of God and Christ, that is, it is an agreeable thing, considering the grace that is manifested to us, and bestowed on us by God and Christ, that we direct all we do to the glory of our Creator and Redeemer.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle is very careful to hinder the spreading of an error which some among them had fallen into concerning the coming of Christ, as being very near, ver. 1—3. Then he proceedeth to confute this error he cautioned them against, by telling them of two great events that were antecedent to the coming of Christ, namely, a general apostasy, and the revelation of Antichrist, concerning whom the apostle tells them many remarkable things about his name, his character, and his rise, and his fall, and his reign, and the sin and ruin of his subjects, ver. 3—12. He then comforts them against the terror of this apostasy, and exhorts them to steadfastness, ver. 13—15. And concludeth with a prayer for them, ver. 16, 17.

NOW we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, 2 That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. 3 Let no man

From these words it appeareth that some among the Thessalonians had mistaken the apostle's meaning in what he had written in his former epistle about the coming of Christ, by thinking it was near at hand, that Christ was just ready to appear, and come to judgment; or it may be, some among them pretended that they had the knowledge of this by particular revelation from the Spirit, or else from some words they had heard from the apostle when he was with them, or some letter he had written, or they pretended he had written, to them or some other person; and hereupon the apostle is careful to rectify this mistake, and to prevent the spreading of this error. Observe, If errors and mistakes arise among Christians, we should take the first opportunity to rectify them, and hinder the spreading thereof; and good men will be especially careful to suppress errors that may arise from a mistake of their words and actions, though that which was spoken or done was never so innocent or well. We have a subtle adversary, who watcheth all opportunities to do mischief, and will sometimes promote errors even by means of the words of Scripture. Observe,

First. How very earnest and solicitous this apostle was to prevent mistakes. "We beseech you, brethren," &c., ver. 1. He entreats them as brethren, who might have charged them as a father chargeth his children; he sheweth great kindness and condescension, and insinuateth himself into their affection. And this is the best way to deal with men, when we would preserve or recover them from errors, to deal gently and lovingly with them; rough and rigorous treatment will but exasperate their spirits, and prejudice them against the reasons we may offer. He obtests, and even conjureth them in the most solemn manner, "By the coming of Christ," &c. The words are in the form of an oath, and his meaning is, that if they believed Christ would come, and if they desired he would come, and rejoiced in the hope of his coming, they should be careful to avoid the error, and the evil consequence thereof, that he was now cautioning them against. From this form of obtestation used by the apostle, we may observe,

1. That it is most certain that the Lord Jesus Christ will come to judge the world, that he will come in all the pomp and power of the upper world in the last day, to execute judgment upon all. Whatever uncertainty we are at, or whatever mistakes may arise, about the time of his coming, his coming itself is certain. This hath been the faith and hope of all Christians in all ages of the church, nay, it was the faith and hope of the Old Testament saints, ever since Enoch the seventh from Adam, who said, "Behold, the Lord cometh," &c., Jude 14.

3. At the second coming of Christ all the saints will be gathered together to him; and this mention of the gathering of the saints together unto Christ at his coming, sheweth that the apostle speaketh of Christ's coming to judgment at the last day, and not of his coming to destroy Jerusalem. He speaketh of a proper, and not a metaphorical advent; and, as it will be part of Christ's honour in that day, so it will be the completing of the happiness of his saints. 1st. That they all shall be gathered together. There will then be a general meeting of all the saints, and none but saints; all the Old Testament saints that got acquaintance with Christ by the dark shadows of the law, and saw this day at a distance, and all the New Testament saints, to whom life and immortality were brought to light by the Gospel—they will all be gathered together. There will then come from the four winds of heaven all that are, or ever were, or ever shall be, from the beginning to the end of time; all shall be gathered together. 2nd. That they shall be gathered together to Christ. He will be the great centre of their unity. They shall be gathered together to him, to be attendants on him, to be assessors with him, to be presented by him to the Father, to be with him for ever, and altogether happy in his presence to all eternity.

3. The doctrines of Christ's coming, and our gathering together to him, are of great moment and importance to Christians, otherwise they would not be the proper matter of the apostle's obtestation. We ought, therefore, not only to believe these things, but highly to account of them also, and look upon them as things we are greatly concerned in, and should be much affected with.

Secondly. The thing itself the apostle cautions the Thessalonians against is, that they should not be deceived about the time of Christ's coming, and so be "shaken in mind, or be troubled." Note, That errors in the mind tend greatly to weaken our faith, and cause us trouble; and such as are weak in faith, and of troubled minds, are oftentimes apt to be deceived, and fall a prey to seducers.

1. The apostle would not have them be deceived. "Let no man deceive you by any means," ver. 3. There are many that lie in wait to deceive, and they have many ways of deceiving; we have reason therefore to be cautious, and stand upon our guard. Some deceivers will pretend new revelations, and others misinterpret Scripture, and others will be guilty of gross forgeries, divers means and artifices of deceit men will use, but we must be careful that no man deceive us by any means. The particular matter in which the apostle cautions them not to be deceived is about the near approach of Christ's coming, as if it was to have been in the apostle's days; and, as harmless as this error might have seemed to many, yet, because it was indeed an error, it would have proved of bad consequence to many persons. Therefore,

2. He giveth them warning, and would not have them soon shaken in mind, or be troubled. 1st. He would not have their faith weakened. We should firmly believe the second coming of Christ, and be settled and established in the faith of this; but there was danger lest the Thessalonians, if they apprehended the coming of Christ was just at hand, upon the finding they, or others whom they too much regarded, were mistaken as to the time, should thereupon question the truth or certainty of the thing itself, whereas they ought not to waver in their minds as to this great thing, which is the faith and hope of all the saints. False doctrines are like the winds that toss the water to and fro, and they are apt to unsettle the minds of men, who are sometimes as "unstable as water." Then, 2nd. He would not have their comforts lessened, that they should not be troubled or affrighted with false alarms. It is likely the coming of Christ was represented in so much terror as to trouble many serious Christians among them, though in itself it should be matter of the believer's hope and joy; or else many might be troubled with the thoughts how surprising this day would be, or with the fear of their unpreparedness, or upon the reflection on their mistake about the time of Christ's coming. We should always watch and pray, but must not be discouraged nor uncomfortable at the thoughts of Christ's coming.

3—For that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; 4 Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. 5 Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? 6 And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time. 7 For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. 8 And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming: 9 Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying

i. 9. "Everlasting destruction:" "All the sounder commentators on this text recognise in αἰώνιος a testimony to the eternity of future punishment that is not easy to be explained away" (Ellicott).

i. 10. "That had believed;" not as Authorised Version.

ii. 1. The Authorised Version, "by the coming," &c., is inadmissible (Ellicott, Alford), as it involves a construction not found in the New Testament. Conybeare translates, "But concerning the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together to meet him," &c. Alford reads, "Touching the coming of," &c.

ii. 2. "By spirit;" i.e., of prophecy, possibly assumed for a purpose. "Nor by word, nor by letter as from us:" "Let no pretended saying, no pretended epistle of mine, shake you in this matter" (Alford).

ii. 3—12. "Man of sin" or "of lawlessness," as the Sinaitic and

KEY OF HOUSE OF LORETTO.

In these words the apostle confuteth the error he had cautioned them against, and giveth the reasons why they should not expect the coming of Christ as just at hand. There were several events previous to the second coming of Christ; in particular he tells them,

First. There would be a general apostasy; there would come "a falling away first," ver. 3. By this apostasy we are not to understand a defection in the state or from civil government, but in spiritual or religious matters, from sound doctrine, and instituted worship, and church government, and a holy life. The apostle speaks of some very great apostasy which would be very general, and not only of some converted Jews or Gentiles, but such as should be very general, though gradual, and what would give occasion to the revelation or rise of Antichrist, that man of sin. This he tells them, ver. 5, he had told them of when he was with them, with design, no doubt, that they should not take offence or be stumbled at it. And let us observe, that no sooner was Christianity planted and rooted in the world, but there began to be a defection in the Christian church. It was so in the Old Testament church; presently after any considerable advance made in religion there followed a defection. Soon after the promise there was revolting; for example, soon after that men began to call upon the name of the Lord, all flesh corrupted their way; soon after the covenant with Noah, the Babel builders had defiance to heaven; soon after the covenant with Abraham, his seed degenerated in Egypt; soon after the Israelites were planted in Canaan, when the first generation was worn off, they forsook God and served Baal; soon after God's covenant with David, his seed revolted and served other gods; soon after the return out of captivity there was a general decay of piety, as appeareth by the story of Ezra and Nehemiah; and therefore it was not strange thing that after the planting of Christianity there should come a falling away.

Secondly. There would be a revelation of "that man of sin," ver. 3; that is, Antichrist, who would take his rise from this general apostasy. The apostle afterwards speaks of the revelation of "that wicked" one, ver. 8; intimating the discovery was made of his wickedness, in order to his ruin. Here he seemeth to speak of a rise, which should be occasioned by that general apostasy he had mentioned; and seemeth to intimate that all sorts of false doctrines and corruptions should centre in him. Great disputes have been, who or what is intended by this man of sin, and son of perdition; and if it is not certain that the papal power and tyranny is principally or only intended, yet this is plain, what is here said doth very exactly agree thereto. For observe, 1. The names of this person, or rather, the state and power here spoken of. He is called "the man of sin," to denote his egregious wickedness; not only he is addicted to, and practiseth wickedness himself, but he doth also promote and countenance, and command sin and wickedness in others. And he is "the son of perdition," because he himself is devoted to certain destruction, and is the instrument of destroying many others, both in soul and body. These names may properly be applied for these reasons to the papal state, and thereto agree also.

2. The characters here given, ver. 4; namely, 1st. That he "opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped;" and thus have the bishops of Rome not only opposed God's authority, and that of the civil magistrate, who are called gods, but have exalted themselves above God, and earthly governors, in demanding greater regard to their commands than to the commands of God, or the magistrate. 2nd. "As God, he sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God." As God was in the temple of old, and worshipped there, and is in and with his church now, so the Antichrist here mentioned is some usurper of God's authority in the Christian church who claims Divine honours; and to whom can this better agree than to the bishops of Rome? to whom the most blasphemous titles have been given, as Dominus Deus noster papa,—"Our Lord God the pope," Deus alter in terra,—"Another God on earth," Idem est Dominum et papa,—"The dominion of God and the pope is the same."

3. His rise is mentioned, ver. 6, 7. Concerning which we are to observe two things: 1st. That there was something that did hinder, or withhold, or did "let, until it was taken away." This is supposed to be the power of the Roman empire, which the apostle did not think fit to mention more plain, at that time; and it is notorious that while this power continued, that prevented the advances of the bishops of Rome to that height of tyranny which soon afterwards they arrived to.

[The simple facts are these: (1.) There were early corruptions in the church of Rome, as there were elsewhere, but peculiarly there, as Rome was the seat of philosophy and of power. (2.) There were great efforts made by the bishop of Rome to increase his authority, and there was a steady approximation to what he subsequently claimed—that of being universal bishop. (3.) There was a constant tendency to yield to him deference and respect in all matters. (4.) This was kept in check as long as Rome was the seat of the imperial power. Had that power remained there, it would have been impossible for the Roman bishop ever to have obtained the civil and ecclesiastical eminence which he ultimately did. Rome could not have had two heads, both claiming and exercising supreme power; and there never could have been a "revelation of the man of sin." (5.) Constantine removed the seat of empire to Constantinople; and this removal or "taking away" of the only restraint on the ambitious projects of the Roman bishops, gave all the opportunity which could be desired for the growth of the papal power. In all history there cannot, probably, be found a series of events corresponding more accurately with a prophetic statement than this; and there is every evidence, therefore, that these are the events to which the Spirit of inspiration referred.—Barnes.]

Vatican MSS. read. "The fearful child of man, of whom sin is the special characteristic and attribute, and in whom it is as it were impersonated and incarnate" (Ellicott). Rightly, therefore, interpreted by the Fathers and others to be Antichrist. But who is this Antichrist? That he has not yet been destroyed (verse 8) seems clear, therefore no interpretation of the prophecy can be satisfactory which assumes that it is already fulfilled. Another interpretation adopted by many modern German expositors, and in England by

2nd. That this mystery of iniquity was gradually to arrive to its height. And so it was in effect that the universal corruption of doctrine and worship in the Romish church did come in by degrees, and the usurpation of the bishops of Rome was gradual, not all at once; and thus the mystery of iniquity did the more easily, and almost insensibly, prevail. The apostle justly calls it a "mystery of iniquity," because wicked designs and actions were concealed under false shows and pretences; at least they were concealed from the common view and observation. By pretended devotion, superstition and idolatry were advanced; and, by a pretended zeal for God and his glory, idolatry and persecution were promoted. And he tells us this mystery of iniquity did even then begin, or did already work, (while the apostles were yet living, "the enemy came and sowed tares;") there were then the deeds of the Nicolaitans, persons that pretended zeal for Christ, but really opposed him. Pride and ambition, and worldly interest of church pastors and church rulers, as in Diotrophes and others, were the early working of the "mystery of iniquity," which by degrees came to that prodigious height as hath been visible in the church of Rome.

4. The fall or ruin of the antichristian state is declared, ver. 8. The head of this antichristian kingdom is called "that wicked" one, or that lawless person who sets up a human power in competition with, and contradiction to, the Divine dominion and power of the Lord Jesus Christ; but, as he would thus manifest himself to be the man of sin, so the revelation or discovery of this to the world would be the sure presage and the means of his ruin. The apostle doth assure the Thessalonians the Lord would consume and destroy him; the consuming him precedeth his final destruction, and that is by "the Spirit of his mouth," by his word of command. The pure word of God, accompanied with the Spirit of God, will discover this mystery of iniquity, and make the power of Antichrist to consume and waste away; and in due time it shall be totally and finally destroyed, and this will be by the brightness of Christ's coming. Note, The coming of Christ to destroy the wicked will be with peculiar glory, and eminent lustre and brightness.

5. The apostle farther describeth the reign and rule of this man of sin. Where we are to observe, 1st. The manner of his coming or ruling, and working. In the general, that it is after the example of Satan, the grand enemy of souls, the great adversary of God and man. He is the great patron of error and lies; the sworn enemy of "the truth as it is in Jesus," and all the faithful followers of Jesus. More particularly it is with Satanical power and deceit. A Divine power is pretended for the support of this kingdom, but it is only after the working of Satan; signs and wonders, visions and miracles, are pretended. By these the papal kingdom was first set up, and hath all along been kept up, but they have false signs to support false doctrines; and lying wonders, or only pretended miracles that have served their cause, things false in fact, or fraudulently managed, to impose upon the people; and the diabolical deceptions are notorious with which the antichristian state hath been supported.

[It is hardly necessary to remark, that the Papacy has always relied for support on its pretended miracles. Even in our own age the wonders performed by the prince Hohenlohe, and by the pretended seamless garment of the Saviour, have been proclaimed as true miracles, and as furnishing indubitable evidence of the truth of the Roman Catholic system. The dissolving of the blood of St. Januarius, the removal of Pilate's stairs to Rome, and the transportation to Italy of the "house of our lady," (see wood engraving,) are among the miracles to which there is a constant reference in the papal communion. In addition to these and to all similar pretensions, there is the power claimed of performing a miracle at the pleasure of the priest, by the change of bread and wine into the "body and blood, the soul and Divinity," of the Lord Jesus. In 1756, there was published in London a book entitled, The Miraculous Power of the Church of Christ asserted through each successive century, from the apostles down to the present time. The power of working miracles has been one of the standing claims of the Papacy.—Barnes.] It was said that this was the very house which the virgin mother, with the infant Saviour and Joseph inhabited at Nazareth, and that it was transported by angels from Palestine to Italy. (Our wood engraving is copied from a Popish work.) It was placed under the dome of a magnificent church, erected for the purpose; princes and prelates, rich and poor, basted to venerate it, and to implore the protection of the Virgin. Gifts and votive offerings, gold, silver, diamonds, and all sorts of treasures, accumulated, various edifices rose round it, and Loreto became, as it still continues, a large and populous city.—See Eustace's Classical Tour, Vol. i. p. 300.]

The apostle calls it "all deceivableness of unrighteousness," ver. 10. Others may call them pious frauds, but the apostle called them unrighteous and wicked frauds; and indeed, all fraud which is contrary to truth is an impious thing. Many are the subtle artifices the man of sin hath used, and various are the plausible pretences by which he hath beguiled unwary and unstable souls to embrace false doctrine, and submit to his usurped dominion. 2nd. The persons are described who are his willing subjects, or most likely to become such, ver. 10; they are such as love not the truth, that they may be saved. They heard the truth it may be, but they did not like it, or love it; they could not bear sound doctrine, and, therefore, easily imbibed false doctrines. They had some notional knowledge of what was true, but they indulged some powerful prejudices, and so became a prey to seducers. Had they loved the truth they would have persevered in it, and been preserved by it; but no wonder if they easily parted with what they never had any love to. And of these persons it is said, that they perish or are lost; they are in a lost condition, and in danger to be lost for ever. For,

6. We have the sin and ruin of the subjects of Antichrist's kingdom declared, ver. 11, 12. Their sin is this, "They believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." They did not love the truth, and therefore they did not believe it; and because they did not believe the truth, therefore they had pleasure in unrighteousness, or in wicked actions, and were pleased with false notions. Note, An erroneous mind and vicious life do often go together, and help forward one another. 2nd. Their ruin is thus expressed, "God shall send them strong delusions to believe a lie." Thus he will punish men for their unbelief, and for their dislike of the truth, and love to sin, and wickedness. Not that God is the author of sin, but in righteousness he sometimes withdraws his grace from such sinners as are here mentioned. He giveth them over to Satan, or leaveth them to be deluded by his instruments; he giveth them up to their own hearts' lusts, and leaveth them to themselves, and then sin will follow of course; yea, the worst of wickedness, that shall end at last in eternal damnation. And God is just when he inflicts spiritual judgments here, and eternal punishments hereafter, upon such as have no love to the truths of the Gospel, who will not believe them, nor live suitable to them, but indulge false doctrines in their minds, and wicked practices in their lives and conversations.

13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation

Jowett and others, viz., that the apostle is here merely describing his own anticipations of the opposition of good and evil in the future of the Christian Church, cannot be accepted by any who believe that St. Paul wrote under the influence of a spirit higher than his own. The only interpretations remaining that seem worthy of consideration are those which refer the prophecy to some development of Popery or infidelity. And whichever theory we adopt we can scarcely conclude that the final and highest embodiment possible of "lawlessthrough sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth: 14 Whereunto he called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. 15 Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle.

Here observe. First. The consolation the Thessalonians might take against the terrors of this apostasy, ver. 13, 14. For they were "chosen to salvation," and called to the obtaining of glory. Note, When we hear of the apostasy of many, it is matter of great comfort and joy that there is "a remnant according to the election of grace," that do and shall persevere; and especially we should rejoice, if we have reason to hope that we are of that number. The apostle reckoned himself bound in duty to be thankful to God on this account: "We are bound to give thanks always to God for you." He had often given thanks on their behalf, and he is still abounding in thanksgiving for them; and there was good reason, because they were "beloved of the Lord," as appeared in this matter, their security from apostatising. And this preservation of the saints is owing.

1. To the stability of the election of grace, ver. 13. And therefore were they beloved of the Lord, because God had chosen them from the beginning. He had loved them with an eternal and everlasting love. Concerning this election of God we may observe, 1st. The eternal date thereof. It is from the beginning; not the beginning of the Gospel, but the beginning of the world, before the foundation of the world, Eph. i. 4. Then, 2nd. The end to which they were chosen, and that is salvation, complete and eternal salvation from sin and misery, and the full fruition of all good. 3rd. The means in order to obtaining this end; namely, "sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." The decree of election therefore connecteth the end and the means, and these must not be separated. We are not elected of God because we were holy, but that we might be holy. Being chosen of God, we must not live as we list; but if we are chosen to salvation as the end, we must be prepared for it by sanctification, as the necessary means to obtain that end; which sanctification is by the operation of the Holy Spirit as the Author, and by faith on our part. There must be the belief of the truth, without which there can be no true sanctification, nor perseverance in grace, nor obtaining salvation. Faith and holiness must be joined together, as well as holiness and happiness; therefore our Saviour prayed for Peter that his faith might not fail, Lu. xxii. 32; and for his disciples, Jno. xvii. 17, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth."

2. To the efficacy of the gospel call, ver. 14. As they were chosen to salvation, so they were called thereunto by the Gospel; "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called," Rom. viii. 30. The outward call of God is by the Gospel, and this is rendered effectual by the inward operation of the Spirit. Note, Wherever the Gospel comes, it calls and inviteth men to the obtaining of glory; it is a call to honour and happiness, even "the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ;" that is, the glory he hath purchased, and the glory he is possessed of, to be communicated unto them that believe in him, and obey his Gospel. Such shall be with Christ to behold his glory, and they shall be glorified with Christ, and partake of his glory. Hereupon there followeth,

Secondly. An exhortation to stedfastness and perseverance. "Therefore, brethren, stand fast," ver. 15. Observe, he doth not say, Ye are chosen to salvation, and therefore ye may be careless and secure; but, "Therefore stand fast." God's grace in our election vocation is so far from superseding our diligent care and endeavour, that it should quicken and engage us to the greatest resolution and diligence. So the apostle John, having told them he wrote unto that they "had received the anointing which should abide in them," and that they "should abide in him," (in Christ,) subjoineth this exhortation, "Now abide in him," 1 Jno. ii. 27, 28. The Thessalonians are exhorted to stedfastness in their Christian profession, or to "hold fast the traditions which they had been taught;" that is, the doctrine of the Gospel, which had been delivered by the apostle, by word or epistle. As yet the canon of Scripture was not complete, and therefore some things were delivered by the apostles in their preaching under the conduct of the infallible Spirit, which Christians were bound to observe as coming from God. Other things were afterwards by them committed to writing, as the apostle had written a former epistle to these Thessalonians; and these epistles were written as the writers were moved by the Holy Ghost. Note, There is no argument from hence for regarding oral traditions in our days, now the canon of Scripture is complete, as of equal authority with the sacred writings. Such doctrines and duties as were taught by the inspired apostles we must stedfastly adhere to; but we have no certain evidence of any thing delivered by them more than what we find contained in the holy Scriptures.

16 Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work.

In these words we have the apostle's earnest prayer for them; in which observe,

First. To whom he prayeth; namely, to "our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father." We may and should direct our prayers, not only to God the Father through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, but also "unto our Lord Jesus Christ himself;" and should pray in his name unto God, not only as his Father, but as our Father in and through him.

[Note, 1. Precepts and exhortations to duty do not infer a power in man's free-will to obey: for he here prayeth that God would work that in them which he hath presently pressed upon them; "Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself," &c. 2. That Jesus Christ is true God, equal with the Father, appeareth from this, that not only he is one who heareth prayer, the author and bestower of all spiritual blessings which are here sought from him, and said to be already bestowed by him, but also he is named before the Father, which certainly had been blasphemous if he were not also true God. "Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father," &c. 3. That Christ is a distinct person from the Father, though one in substance with him, appears from this, that they are here distinguished by Paul: "Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father." 4. That God the Father is usually named before the Son doth not infer any inequality betwixt them, but only the order of subsistence and working which is among the persons of the blessed Trinity; for here Christ the second person is named first, to shew there is not any such inequality: "Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father."]

Secondly. From what he taketh encouragement in his prayer; namely, from the consideration of what God had already done for him and them; "Which hath loved us, and given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace," ver. 16. Where observe, 1. The love of God is the spring and fountain of all the good we have or hope for; our election, vocation, justification, and salvation is all owing to the love of God in Christ Jesus. 2. From this fountain in particular doth all our consolation flow; and the consolation of the saints is an everlasting consolation. The comforts of the saints are not dying things; they shall not die with them. The spiritual consolations God giveth none can deprive them of; and God will not take them away, because he loveth them with an everlasting love, therefore they shall have everlasting consolations. 3. Their consolation is founded on the hope of eternal life. They rejoice in hope of the glory of God, and are not only patient but joyful in tribulations; and there is good reason for these strong consolations, because the saints have good hope. Their hope is grounded on the love of God, and the promise of God, and the experience they have had of the power, the goodness, and the faithfulness of God. And it is good hope through grace: the free grace and mercy of God is what they hope for, and what their hopes are founded on, and not any worth or merit of their own.

Thirdly. What it is that he asketh of God for them. That he would "comfort their hearts, and establish them in every good word and work," ver. 17. God had given them consolations, and he prayeth that they might have more abundant consolation. There was good hope through grace they should be preserved, and he prayeth they might be established; and it is observable how comfort and establishment are here joined together. Note, therefore, 1. That comfort is a means of establishment; for the more pleasure we take in the word, and work, and ways of God, the more likely we shall be to persevere therein. And, 2. Our establishment in the ways of God is a likely means in order to comfort; whereas if we are wavering in faith, and of a doubtful mind, or if we are halting and faltering in our duty, no wonder if we are strangers to the pleasures and joys of religion. What is it that lieth at the bottom of all our uneasiness, but our unsteadiness in religion? We must be established in "every good word and work," in the word of truth and the work of righteousness; and Christ must be honoured by our good works and good words. And they who are sincere will endeavour to do both, and in so doing they may hope for comfort and establishment, till at length our holiness and our happiness be completed.

CHAPTER III.

In the close of the foregoing chapter the apostle had prayed earnestly for the Thessalonians, and now he desireth their prayers, encouraging them to trust in God, to which he subjoins another petition for them, ver. 1-5. He then proceedeth to give them commands and directions for the correcting some things he was informed were amiss among them, ver. 6-15. And concludeth with benedictions and prayers, ver. 16-18.

FINALLY, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you: 2 And that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men: 3 But the Lord is faithful, who shall stablish you, and keep you from evil. 4 And we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that ye both do and will do the things which we command you. 5 And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ.

In these words observe,

First. The apostle desires the prayers of his friends. "Finally, brethren, pray for us," ver. 1. He always remembered them in his prayers, and would not have them forget him and his fellow-labourers, but bear them on their hearts at the throne of grace. Note, 1. This is one way by which the communion of saints is kept up, not only by their praying together or with one another, but by their praying for one another, when they are absent from one another. And thus they that are at a great distance may meet together at the throne of grace; and thus they that are not capable of doing or receiving any other kindness may yet this way do and receive real and very great kindness. 2. It is the duty of people to pray for their ministers; and not only for their own pastors, but also for all good and faithful ministers. And, 3. Ministers need, and therefore should desire, the prayers of their people. How remarkable is the humility, and how engaging the example, of this great apostle, who was so mighty in prayer himself, and yet despised not the prayers of the meanest Christian, but desired an interest in them. Observe farther, what they are desired and directed to pray for; namely,

1. For the success of the gospel ministry. "That the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified," ver. 1. This was the great thing that blessed Paul was most solicitous about. He was more solicitous that God's name might be sanctified, and his kingdom come, and his will be done, than he was about his own daily bread. He desired the word of the Lord might run, so it is in the original; that is, that it might get ground, that the interest of religion in the world might go forward and not backward, and not only go forward, but go apace. All the forces of hell were then and still are, more or less, raised and mustered to oppose the word of the Lord, to hinder its publication and success; we should pray therefore that oppositions may be removed, that so the Gospel may have free course to the ears, and to the hearts and consciences of men, that it may be glorified in the conviction and conversion of sinners, the confutation of gainsayers, and the holy conversation of the saints. God, who "magnified the law, and made it honourable," will glorify the Gospel and make that honourable and so will glorify his own name. And ness" has yet appeared, though both systems have produced characters which may fairly be claimed as in some degree types of Antichrist. Speaking of this view, Ellicott says, "If asked to name them (types of Antichrist), we shrink not from pointing to this prophecy, and saying that in whomsoever these distinctive features be found, whosoever wields temporal, or temporal and spiritual power, in any degree similar to that in which the man of sin is here described as wielding it, be he the Pope or potentate, is beyond all doubt a distinct type of Antichrist." The power spoken of as restraining or withholding the man of sin may in either case be taken to be well-ordered civil rule, which is alike opposed to the development of superstition and licence.

ii. 4. "As God" is not found in best MSS.

ii. 8. Not "brightness," but "manifestation of his coming." Best MSS. have "Lord Jesus," not merely "Lord."

ii. 11. "God sendeth;" so best MSS. The mystery of iniquity good ministers and good Christians may very well be contented to be little, to be any thing, to be nothing, if Christ be magnified and his Gospel be glorified. Paul was now at Athens, or as some think at Corinth, and would have the Thessalonians pray that he might have as good success there as he had had at Thessalonica, that it might be as well with others even as it was with them. Note, If ministers have been successful in one place, they should desire to be successful in every place where they may preach the Gospel.

2. For the safety of gospel ministers. He doth not ask their prayers for preferment, but for preservation: "That we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men," ver. 2. Note, That they who are enemies to the preaching of the Gospel, and persecutors of the faithful preachers of it, are "unreasonable and wicked men." They act against all the rules and laws of reason and religion, and are guilty of the greatest absurdity and impiety. Not only in the principles of atheism and infidelity, but also in the practice of vice and immorality, and especially in persecution, there is the greatest absurdity in the world, as well as impiety. There is need of the spiritual protection, as well as the assistance of godly and faithful ministers, for these are as the standard-bearers that are most struck at; and therefore all that wish well to the interest of Christ in the world should pray for them, "for all men have not faith," that is, many [even of those who profess it] do not believe the Gospel; they will not embrace it themselves, and no wonder if such are restless and malicious in their endeavours to oppose the Gospel, decry their ministry, and disgrace the ministers of the word; and too many have not common faith or honesty: there is no confidence that we can safely put in them, and we should pray to be delivered from such who have no conscience nor honour, who never regard what they say or do. We may sometimes be in as much or more danger from false and pretended friends as from open and avowed enemies.

Secondly, He encourageth them to trust in God. We should not only pray to God for his grace, but also place our trust and confidence in his grace, and humbly expect what we pray for. Observe,

1. What the good is which we may expect from the grace of God; namely, establishment and preservation from evil, and the best Christians stand in need of these benefits. 1st. That God would establish them. This the apostle had prayed for on their behalf, ch. ii. 17; and now he doth encourage them to expect this favour. And we can stand no longer than God holds us up; unless he "hold up our goings in his paths, our feet will slide," and we shall fall. 2nd. That God will keep them from evil. We have as much need of the grace of God for our perseverance to the end as for the beginning of the good work. The evil of sin is the greatest evil, but there are other evils God will also preserve his saints from,—the evil that is in the world; yea, from all evil to his heavenly kingdom.

2. What encouragement we have to depend upon the grace of God. "The Lord is faithful;" he is faithful to his promises, and is the Lord who cannot lie, who will not alter the thing that is gone out of his mouth. When once the promise therefore is made, performance is sure and certain. He is faithful to his relation, a faithful God, and a faithful friend; we may depend upon his filling up all the relations he stands in to his people. Let it be our care to be true and faithful in our promises, and to the relations we stand in to this faithful God.

[This is an exceedingly interesting declaration, and is a beautiful illustration of the resource which a truly pious mind will feel that it has when disposed to despond, and to ask whether religion can be advanced in the midst of so much indifference and opposition? At such times, how consoling it is to turn, as Paul did, to one who is faithful; who never fails us, and who will certainly accomplish his benevolent purposes. Men may be faithless and false, but God never is. They may refuse to embrace the Gospel, and set themselves against it, but God will not abandon his great purposes. Many who are in the church may forget their solemn and sacred vows, and may shew no fidelity to the cause of their Saviour, but God himself will never abandon that cause. To a pious mind it affords unspeakably more consolation to reflect that a faithful God is the friend of the cause which we love, than it would were all men, in and out of the church, its friends.—Barnes.] He adds,

3. A farther ground of hope that God would do this for them, seeing they did and would do the things they were commanded, ver. 4. The apostle had this confidence in them, and that was founded upon his confidence in God; for there is otherwise no confidence in man. Their obedience is described by doing what he and his fellow labourers had commanded them; which was no other thing than the commandments of the Lord; for the apostles themselves had no farther commission than to teach men to "observe and do what their Lord had commanded them," Mat. xxviii. 20. And as the experience the apostle had of their obedience for the time past was one ground of his confidence that they would do the things commanded them for the time to come, so this is one ground to hope that "whatsoever we ask of God we shall receive of him, because we keep his commandments and do those things that are pleasing in his sight," 1 Jno. iii. 22.

Thirdly, He maketh a short prayer for them, ver. 5: it is a prayer for spiritual blessings. Two things of the greatest importance the apostle prayeth for:—

1. That their hearts might be brought "into the love of God;" that is, to be in love with God as the most excellent and amiable being, the best of all beings; and this is not only most reasonable and necessary in order to our happiness, but is our happiness itself. It is a great part of the happiness of heaven itself, where this love shall be made perfect. And we can never attain to this unless God by his grace direct our hearts aright, for our love is apt to go astray after other things. Note, We sustain a great deal of damage by the misplacing our affections. It is our sin and our misery that we misplace our affections upon wrong objects; and if God direct our love aright upon himself, the rest of the affections will thereby be rectified.

2. That all "patient waiting for Christ" might be joined with this love of God. There is no true love of God without faith in Christ Jesus: we must wait for Christ, which supposeth our faith in him, that we believe he came once in flesh, and will come again in glory; and we must expect this second coming of Christ, and be careful to get ready for it. There must be a patient waiting, enduring with courage and constancy all that we may meet with in the mean time; and we have need of patience, and need of Divine grace to exercise Christian patience, "the patience of Christ," as some read the words, that is, patience for Christ's sake and after Christ's example.

6 Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us. 7 For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you: 9 Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us. 10 For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. 11 For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busybodies. 12 Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread. 13 But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing. 14 And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. 15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

The apostle having commended their obedience for the time past, and mentioned his confidence in their obedience for the time to come, proceedeth to give them commands and directions to some that were faulty, correcting some things that were amiss among them. Observe, That the best society of Christians may have some faulty persons among them, and some things that ought to be reformed. Perfection is not to be found on this side heaven. Evil manners beget good laws. The disorders that Paul was informed of as among the Thessalonians occasioned the good laws we find in these verses, that are of constant use to us, and all others whom they may concern. Observe,

First, That which was amiss among the Thessalonians, which is expressed, 1. More generally. There were some that walked disorderly, not after the tradition they received from the apostle, ver. 6. Some of the brethren were guilty of this disorderly walking; that is, they did not live regularly, nor govern themselves according to the rules of Christianity, nor agreeably to their profession of religion, nor according to the precepts delivered by the apostle, which they had received and pretended to pay a regard unto. Note, It is required of those who have received the Gospel, and profess a subjection to it, that they live according to the Gospel; if they do not they are to be counted disorderly persons.

2. In particular. There were among them some idle persons and busy-bodies, ver. 11. This the apostle was so credibly informed of, that he had sufficient reason to give commands and directions with relation to such persons, how they ought to behave, and how the church should carry it towards them.

1st. There were some among them that were idle, not working at all, or doing nothing. It doth not appear that they were gluttons or drunkards, but idle, and therefore disorderly people. It is not enough for any to say they do no hurt, for it is required of all persons that they do good in the places and relations Providence hath placed them. It is probable these persons had a notion, by misunderstanding some passages in the former epistle, concerning the near approach of the coming of Christ, which served them for a pretence to leave off the work of their callings, and live in idleness. Note, It is a great error or abuse of religion to make it a cloak for idleness or any other sin. If we were sure that the day of judgment were never so near, we must notwithstanding do the work of the day in its day, that when our Lord cometh he may find us so doing. The servant that waiteth for the coming of his lord aright must be working as his lord hath commanded, that all may be ready when he cometh. Or, it may be, these disorderly persons pretended that the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free discharged them from the services and business of their particular callings and employments in the world; whereas they were "to abide in the same calling wherein they were called of God, and therein abide with God," 1 Cor. vii. 20, 24. Industry in our particular calling as men is a duty required of us by our general calling as Christians. Or perhaps the general charity that was then among Christians to their poor brethren encouraged some to live in idleness, as knowing the church would maintain them. Whatever was the cause, they were much to blame.

2nd. There were busy-bodies among them; and it should seem by the connexion that the same persons who were idle were busy-bodies also. This may seem to be a contradiction, but so it is that most commonly such persons as have no business of their own to do, or who neglect that, do busy themselves in other men's matters. If we are idle, the devil and a corrupt heart will soon find us somewhat to do. The mind of man is a busy thing; if it be not employed in doing good, it will be doing evil. Note, Busy-bodies are disorderly walkers; that is, such as are guilty of vain curiosity and impertinent meddling with things that do not concern them, and troubling themselves and others with other men's matters. The apostle warns Timothy, 1 Tim. v. 13, to beware of such "who learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house, and are not only idle but tattlers also, and busy-bodies, speaking things which they ought not."

Secondly, The good laws which were occasioned by these evil manners. Concerning which we may take notice,

1. Whose laws they are. They are the commands of the apostles of our Lord, given in the name of their Lord and ours, that is, the commands of our Lord himself, "We command you, brethren, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 6; again, "We command and exhort you by our Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 12. The apostle useth words of authority and entreaty; and where disorders are to be rectified or prevented, there is need of both. The authority of Christ should awe our minds unto obedience, and his grace and goodness should allure us.

2. What the good laws and rules are. The apostle giveth directions to the whole church, and commands to those disorderly persons, and an exhortation to those in particular who did well among them.

1st. His commands and directions to the whole church regard,

First, Their behaviour towards the disorderly persons that were among them; which is thus expressed, ver. 6, to "withdraw themselves from such," and afterwards to mark "that man and have no company with him, that he may be was already working (verse 7), and bringing down on its persistent adherents judicial blindness.

ii. 15. "Therefore," &c.: Jowett here accuses the apostle of logical inconsistency in appealing to them to do something ("stand fast") when he had just stated the fact of their election by God. His accusation is well answered by Alford: "The apostle was deeply conscious, as ever, of the logical necessity of the only practical inference which man can draw from God's gracious purposes towards him. No human reasoning powers can connect the two—God's sovereignty and man's free will; all we know of them is that the one is as certain a truth as the other. In proportion, then, as we assert the one strongly, we must ever implicate the other as strongly—a course which the great apostle never fails to pursue" (Phil. ii. 12, 13; Heb. iv. 1, &c.). The "traditions" or "instructions" evidently refer to his own instructions to them, as opposed to those mentioned in verse 2, which were not his.

ashamed; yet not to count him as an enemy, but to admonish him as a brother." The directions of the apostle are carefully to be observed in this matter, how we are to carry it to disorderly persons. We must be very cautious in church censures and church discipline. We must, 1st. Note that man who is suspected or charged with not obeying the word of God, or walking contrary thereto; that is, we must have sufficient proof of his fault before we proceed further. We must, 2nd. Admonish him in a friendly manner. We must put him in mind of his sin and of his duty; and this should be done privately, Mat. xviii. 15. Then, if he will not hear, we must, 3rd. Withdraw from him, and not company with him; that is, we must avoid familiar converse and society with such, for two reasons, namely, that we may not learn his evil ways; for he that followeth vain and idle persons, and keepeth company with such, is in danger of becoming like them; and another reason is, for the shaming, and so the reforming, them that offend, that when idle and disorderly persons see how their loose practices are disliked by all wise and good people, they may be ashamed of them, and walk more orderly. Love, therefore, to the persons of our offending brethren, even when we hate their vices, should be the motive even of our withdrawing from them; and even those that are under the censures of the church must not be accounted as enemies, ver. 15, for if they be reclaimed and reformed by these censures they will recover their credit and comfort, and right to church privileges as a brother.

Secondly. Their general conduct and behaviour ought to be according to the good example the apostle and those which were with him had given them; "Yourselves know how ye ought to follow us," ver. 7. Those that planted religion among them had set a good example before them; and the ministers of the Gospel should be ensamples to the flock. And it is the duty of Christians not only to walk according to the traditions of the apostles and the doctrines they preached, but also according to the good example they had set before them; to be followers of them, so far as they were followers of Christ. The particular good example the apostle mentions was their diligence, that was so different from that which was found in those disorderly walkers he takes notice of: "We behaved not ourselves disorderly among you," ver. 7; that is, we did not spend our time idly, in idle visits, idle talk, idle sports. They took pains in their ministry, in preaching the Gospel, and in getting their own living; "Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought," ver. 8; though he might justly have demanded a maintenance, because they that preach the Gospel may of right expect to live by the Gospel. This is a just debt that people owe to their ministers, and the apostle had power or authority to have demanded this, ver. 9, but he waived his right from affection to them, and for the sake of the Gospel, and that he might be an example for them to follow, ver. 9, that they might learn how to fill up time, and always be employed in somewhat that would turn to good account.

2nd. He commands and directs those that lived idle lives to reform and set themselves to their business. He had given commandments to this purpose, as well as a good example of this when he was among them; "Even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any man would not work neither should he eat," ver. 10. It was a proverbial speech among the Jews, "He that doth not labour doth not deserve to eat." The labourer is worthy of his meat, but what is the loiterer worthy of? It is the will of God every man should have a calling, and mind his calling, and make a business of it, and not live like useless drones in the world. Such persons do what in them lieth to defeat the sentence, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread." It was not only the humour of the apostle, who was an active stirring man himself, and therefore would have every body else to be so too, but it was the command of our Lord Jesus Christ, that "with quietness we work, and eat our own bread," ver. 12. Men ought some way or other to earn their own living, otherwise they do not eat their own bread. Observe, There must be work or labour, in opposition to idleness; and there must be quietness, in opposition to being busy-bodies in other men's matters. We must study to be quiet and do our own business. This is an excellent but rare composition, to be of an active yet quiet spirit; active in our own business, and yet quiet as to other people's.

3rd. He exhortheth those that did well not to be "weary in well doing," ver. 13, as if he had said, Go on and prosper. The Lord is with you while you are with him. See that whatever you do that is good you persevere therein. Hold on your way, and hold out to the end. You must never give over, nor tire in your work. It will be time enough to rest when you come to heaven, that "everlasting rest that remains for the people of God."

16 Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means. The Lord be with you all. 17 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write. 18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

In this conclusion of the epistle we have the apostle's benediction and prayers for these Thessalonians. Let us desire them for ourselves and our friends. There are three blessings pronounced upon them, or desired for them.

First. That God would give them peace. Note, 1. Peace is the blessing pronounced or desired, and by peace we may understand all manner of prosperity. Here it may signify, in particular, peace with God; peace in their own minds and consciences; peace among themselves, and peace with all men. 2. This peace is desired for them always, or in every thing; and he desired they might have all good things at all times. 3. Peace by all means. That as they enjoyed the means of grace, they might with success use all the means and methods of peace too; for peace is often difficult, as it is always desirable. 4. That God would give them peace, who is the Lord of peace; and if we have any peace that is desirable, God must give it, who is the "author of peace and lover of concord." We shall neither have peaceable dispositions ourselves nor find men disposed to be at peace with us, unless the God of peace give us both.

Secondly. That the presence of God might be with them; "The Lord be with you all." And we need nothing more to make us safe and happy, nor can we desire anything better for ourselves and our friends, than to have God's gracious presence with us and them. This will be a guide and guard in every way that we may go, and our comfort in every condition we may be in. It is the presence of God that maketh heaven to be heaven, and that will make this earth to be like to heaven. No matter where we are if God be with us, nor who is absent if God be present with us.

Thirdly. That "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" might be with them. So this apostle concluded his first epistle to these Thessalonians. And it is through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ that we may comfortably hope to have peace with God, and enjoy the presence of God, for he hath made "them nigh that were afar off." It is this grace that is all in all to make us happy. That is what the apostle admired and magnified on all occasions, what he delighted and trusted in; and by this salutation or benediction written with his own hand, as the token of every epistle, when the rest was written by an amanuensis, he took care lest the churches he wrote unto should be imposed on by counterfeit epistles, which he knew would be of dangerous consequence.

[Whatever be the eminence of a person or persons, for their inherent graces and gracious qualifications, yet it is only God's free grace and undeserved favour, and not their own merit, which must be relied on for closing their accounts, or for obtaining any spiritual or temporal mercy at the hands of God; for, though he commended them highly for their patience, faith, love, and other graces, ch. i. 3, 4, yet he closeth all by wishing God's free grace and favour to them, as the fountain cause of all things they stood in need of or could expect. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you."]

Let us be thankful that we have the canon of Scripture complete, and by the wonderful and special care of Divine providence preserved pure and uncorrupt, through so many successive ages, and not dare to add to it nor diminish from it. Let us believe the Divine original of the sacred Scriptures, and conform our faith and practice to this our sufficient and only rule, "which is able to make us wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." Amen.

THESSALONICA.

iii. 5. Not "the patient waiting for Christ," but "the patience of Christ"—i.e., which Christ showed. The Greek is υπομονή, which Chrysostom calls "the queen of virtues," and of which Ellicott says it marks "the brave patience with which the Christian contends against the various hindrances, persecutions, and temptations that befall him in his conflict with the inward and the outward world." (See also Trench, "New Testament Synonyms.")

iii. 11. "Working not at all," &c.: there is a play of words in the original not shown in the Authorised Version. "Busybodies who do no business" (Conybeare). "Working nothing but over-working" (Barrow).

iii. 17. "Which is the token in every epistle:" the apostle's reason for this caution is found in chap. ii. 2, and it was used whenever necessary. Thus, Gal. vi. 11; 1 Cor. xvi. 21; Col. iv. 18. Other epistles which were sent by a trusty messenger—as 2 Corinthians by Titus, Philippians by Epaphroditus—did not need the token, nor the epistles to individuals, being most probably autographic (Philemon 19) all through. 1 Thessalonians being written before the rise of spurious epistles, of course is an exception.

iii. 18. The same form of benediction as in 1 Thessalonians, except the addition here of "all;" all were to share his benediction and farewell prayer.

EXPOSITION

OF THE FIRST EPISTLE OF

S T. P A U L T O T I M O T H Y,

WITH

P R A C T I C A L O B S E R V A T I O N S.

HITHERTO Paul's epistles were directed to churches: now follow some to particular persons; two to Timothy, one to Titus, and another to Philemon, all three ministers. Timothy and Titus were evangelists, an inferior order to the apostles, as appears by that, Eph. iv. 11, "Some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists." Their commission and work were much the same with that of the apostles, to plant churches, and water the churches that were planted; and accordingly they were itinerants, as we find Timothy was. Timothy was converted by Paul, and therefore he calls him his own son in the faith; we read of his conversion, Acts xvi. 1-3. The scope of these two epistles is, to direct Timothy how to discharge his office as an evangelist at Ephesus, where he now was, and where Paul ordered him for some time to reside, to perfect the good work which he had begun there. As for the ordinary pastoral charge of that church, he had very solemnly committed it to the presbytery, as appears from Acts xx. 28, where he charges the presbyters "to feed the flock of God, which he had purchased with his own blood." [These two epistles, and that also to Titus, should be diligently studied by ministers of the Gospel, and by candidates for the sacred office. The instructions and admonitions contained in them in relation to it are of permanent use and authority. This epistle seems to have been written shortly after Paul left Ephesus to go into Macedonia, Acts xxi. 1, A.D. 57 or 58. The common subscription, which states it to have been sent from Laodicea, is of no authority.]

A.D. 65.

CHAPTER I.

After the inscription in ver. 1, 2, we have, I. The charge given to Timothy, ver. 3, 4. II. The true end of the law, ver. 5-11; where he shews it is entirely agreeable to the Gospel. III. He mentions his own call to be an apostle; for which he expresses his thankfulness, ver. 12-16. IV. His exhortation, ver. 17. V. A renewal of the charge to Timothy, ver. 18; and of Hymenæus and Alexander, ver. 19-20.

AUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope; 2 Unto Timothy, my own son in the faith: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father and Jesus Christ our Lord. 3 As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine, 4 Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions, rather than godly edifying which is in faith: so do.

Here is, First. The inscription of the epistle, from whom it is sent; "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ," constituted an apostle "by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ." His credentials were unquestionable; he had not only a commission, but a commandment, not only from God our Saviour, but from Jesus Christ. He was a preacher of the Gospel of Christ, and a minister of the kingdom of Christ. Observe, God is our Saviour. [The Father reconciles us to himself by his Son, 2 Cor. v. 18.] "Jesus Christ, which is our hope." Observe, Jesus Christ is a Christian's hope; our hope is in him, all our hope of eternal life is built upon him; Christ is in us the hope of glory, Col. i. 27. He calls Timothy his own son, because he had been an instrument of his conversion, and because he had been a son that served him, served with him in the Gospel, Phil. ii. 22. Timothy had not been wanting in the duty and observance of a son to Paul, and Paul was not wanting in the care and tenderness of a father to him.

Secondly. The benediction is, "Grace, mercy, and peace, from God our Father." Some have observed, that whereas in all the epistles to the churches the apostolical benediction is grace and peace, in these two epistles to Timothy, and that of Titus, it is "grace, mercy, and peace," as if ministers had more need of God's mercy than other men. Ministers need more grace than others, to discharge their duty faithfully; and they need more mercy than others to pardon what is amiss in them; and if Timothy, so eminent a minister, must be indebted to the mercy of God, and needed the increase and continuance of it, how much more do we ministers in these times, who have so little of his excellent spirit. "And Jesus Christ our Lord;" as the Father and the Son are conjoined by him in the exercise of authority, ver. 1, so they are here united as the Fountain of grace and mercy.]

Thirdly. Paul tells Timothy what was the end of his appointing him to this office; "I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus." Timothy had a mind to have gone with Paul, was loth to go from under his wing, but Paul would have it so; it was necessary for the public service. "I besought thee," saith he; though he might assume an authority to command him, yet for love's sake he chose rather to beseech him. Now his business was to take care to fix [by the continuous inculcation of the apostle's doctrine] both the ministers and the people of that church. "Charge them that they teach no other doctrine" than what they have received, that is, that they do not add to the Christian doctrine, under pretence of improving it, or making up the defects of it; that they do not alter it, but stick to it as it was delivered to them. Observe,

1. Ministers must not only be charged to preach the true doctrine of the Gospel, but charged to preach no other doctrine; "If an angel from heaven preached any other doctrine, he was an anathema," Gal. i. 8. Observe,

2. That in the times of the apostles there were attempts made to corrupt Christianity, ("We are not as many that corrupt the word," 2 Cor. ii. 17), otherwise this charge to Timothy might have been spared.

3. He must not only see to it, that he did not preach any other doctrine, but he must charge others that they might not add any thing of their own unto the Gospel, or take any thing from it, but that they preach it pure and uncorrupt. He must also take care to prevent their regarding "fables and endless genealogies" and strifes of words. This is often repeated in these two epistles, as ch. iv. 7; vi. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 23, as well as in the epistle to Titus. As among the Jews there were some that brought Judaism into Christianity, so among the Gentiles there were some that brought Paganism into Christianity. Take heed of those, saith he, watch against them; it will be the corrupting and ruining of religion among you, for "these minister questions rather than edifying." [The parties referred to seem rather to have been of the former class than of the latter; and the "fables and endless genealogies" were not the subtleties of the pagan philosophy, but the fabulous traditions and genealogical tables of the Jews; by the former of which they corrupted, and sometimes superseded, the word of God, while by the latter they sought to establish their lineal descent from some one or other of their famous ancestors.] Observe, That that which ministers questions is not for edifying; that which gives occasion for doubtful disputes pulls down the church rather than builds it up. And I think, by a parity of reason, every thing else that ministers questions rather than godly edifying should be disclaimed and disregarded by us, such as an uninterrupted succession in the ministry, from the apostles down to these times, the absolute necessity of episcopal ordination, and of the intention of the minister to the efficacy and validity of the sacraments he administers, &c. These are as bad as Jewish fables and endless genealogies, for they involve us in inextricable difficulties, and tend only to shake the foundations of a Christian's hope, and to fill his mind with perplexing doubts and fears. Observe here, That godly edifying should be the end ministers should aim at in all their discourses, that Christians may be improving in godliness, and growing up to a greater likeness to the blessed God. Observe farther, That godly edifying must be in faith. The Gospel is the foundation on which we build, and it is by faith that we come to God at first, Heb. xi. 6; and it must be in the same way, and by the same principle of faith, that we must be edified. Again, ministers should avoid as much as may be what will occasion disputes, and would do well to insist on the great and practical points of religion, about which there can be no disputes; for even disputes about great and necessary truths draw off the mind from the main design of Christianity, and eat out the vitals of religion, which consist in practice and obedience, as well as in faith, that we may not hold the truth in unrighteousness, but may keep the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.

5 Now the end of the commandment is charity

Introductory Note.—The Epistles to Timothy and Titus, known as the Pastoral Epistles, are similar in style and subject. They were received by the ancient Church as canonical and Pauline; the Gnostics, against whose errors they inveigh, alone denying their genuineness. German critics have attacked them, but have been convincingly answered by Davidson, Alford, &c. The dates and places of writing of these epistles are fully discussed by Conybeare and Howson ("Life and Times of St. Paul"), and Alford ("Greek Testament"). It appears that the apostle was released from prison in Rome during A.D. 63; that he then visited Crete, where he left Titus, and Colossæ, where he stayed with Philemon; that going into Macedonia, he asked Timothy to remain at Ephesus, and proceeding to Philippi and Corinth, thence wrote his First Epistle to Timothy and his Epistle to Titus. The winter of A.D. 64 the apostle passed at Nicopolis, in Epirus; in the spring of 65 he went through Dalmatia, visited Troas, and soon afterwards was apprehended and sent to

out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned: 6 From which some having swerved have turned aside unto vain jangling; 7 Desiring to be teachers of the law; understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm. 8 But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully; 9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, 10 For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for menstealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine; 11 According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

Here the apostle instructs Timothy how to guard against the Judaizing teachers, or others that mingled fables and endless genealogies with the Gospel. He shews the use of the law, and glory of the Gospel.

First. He shews the end and use of the law. It is intended to promote love; "for love is the fulfilling of the law," Rom. xiii. 10.

1. "The end of the commandment is charity," or love, Rom. xiii. 8. The main scope and drift of the Divine law is to engage us to the love of God and one another; and whatever tends to weaken either our love to God or love to the brethren tends to defeat the end of the commandment. And surely the Gospel that obliges us to love our enemies, to do good to them that hate us, &c., Mat. v. 44. does not design to lay aside or supersede a commandment the end whereof is love; so far from it, that on the other side we are told, that though we had all advantages, and wanted charity, we are but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, 1 Cor. xiii. 1. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another," Jno. xiii. 35. Those therefore who boasted of their knowledge of the law, but used it only as a colour for the disturbance that they gave to the preaching of the Gospel, under pretence of zeal for the law, dividing the church, and distracting it, they defeated that which was the very end of the commandment, and that is love,—love "out of a pure heart," a heart purified by faith, purified from corrupt affections. In order to the keeping up of holy love, our hearts must be cleansed from all sinful love, love out of "a good conscience" kept without offence. Those that are careful to keep a good conscience from a real belief of the truth of the word of God, which doth enjoin it, here called a faith unfeigned, those answer the end of the commandment. Here we have the concomitants of that excellent grace, charity; they are three. 1st. A pure heart; there it must be seated, and from thence it must take its rise. 2nd. A good conscience, in which we must exercise ourselves daily, that we may not only get it, but that we may keep it, Acts xxiv. 16. 3rd. Faith unfeigned must also accompany it; for, as it is love without dissimulation, the faith that works by it must be of the like nature,—genuine and sincere. Now some that set up for teachers of the law swerved from the very end of the commandment; set up for disputers, but their disputers proved "vain jangling;" set up for teachers, but they pretended to teach others what they themselves did not understand. If the church be corrupted by such teachers, we must not think it strange, for we see from the beginning it was so. Observe, First. When persons, especially ministers, swerve from the great law of charity, the end of the commandment, they will turn aside to vain jangling. When a man misses his end and scope it is no wonder every step he takes is out of the way. Secondly. Jangling, especially in religion, is vain; it is unprofitable and useless as to all that is good, and it is very pernicious and hurtful; and yet many people's religion consists of little else but vain jangling. Thirdly. Those who deal much in vain jangling are fond and ambitious to be teachers of others; they desire, that is, they affect, the office of teaching. Fourthly. It is too common for men to intrude into the office of the ministry when they are very ignorant of those things about which they are to speak; they understand neither what they say nor whereof they affirm, and by such learned ignorance, no doubt, they edify their hearers very much!

[Nothing is more necessary to the Christian minister than a clear understanding of the different offices of the law of the Gospel. Let each be taught, but each for its own purposes, and in its true relation to the other:—the law to bring us to the Gospel for salvation, and to prescribe rules of conduct; and the Gospel, while it saves us freely by sovereign grace, through faith, to supply us with motives to obey the law.]

2. The use of the law: ver. 8, "The law is good, if a man use it lawfully." The Jews used it unlawfully, as an engine to divide the church, a cover to the malicious opposition they made to the Gospel of Christ; they set it up for justification, and so used it unlawfully. We must not therefore think to set it aside, but "use it lawfully," that is, for the restraint of sin. The abuse which some have made of the law does not take away the use of it; but when a Divine appointment hath been abused, call it back to its right use, and take away the abuses, for the law is still very useful as a rule of life; though we are not under it as under a covenant of works, yet it is good to teach us what is sin and what is duty. It is "not made for a righteous man," that is, it is not made for those that do observe it, for if we could keep the law righteousness would be by the law, Gal. iii. 21, but it is made for wicked persons, to restrain them, to check them, and to put a stop to vice and profaneness. It is the grace of God that changes men's hearts, but the terrors of the law may be of use to tie their hands and restrain their tongues. A righteous man does not want those restraints which are necessary for the wicked, or at least the law is not made primarily and principally for the righteous, but for sinners of all sorts, whether in a greater or lesser measure, ver. 9, 10. In this black roll of sinners he particularly mentions breaches of the second table duties, which we owe to our neighbour, against the fifth and sixth commandments, murderers of fathers and mothers, and man-slayers; against the seventh, whoremongers, and them that defile themselves with mankind; against the eighth, men-stealers; against the ninth, liars and perjured persons; and then he closes his account with this, "and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine."

Some understand this as an institution of a power in the civil magistrate to make laws against such notorious sinners as are instanced, and to see those laws put in execution.

Secondly. He shews the glory and grace of the Gospel, [and its harmony with the law.] Paul's epithets are expressive, significant, and many times every one is a sentence; as here, ver. 11, "According to the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." Let us learn from hence, 1. To call God "the blessed God," infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself and his own perfections. 2. To call the Gospel "the glorious Gospel," for so it is. Much of the glory of God appears in the works of creation and providence, but much more in the Gospel, where it shines in the face of Jesus Christ. Paul reckoned it a great honour put upon him, and a great favour done him, that this glorious Gospel was committed to his trust, that is, the preaching of it; the framing of it is not committed to any man or company of men in the world. The settling of the terms of salvation in the Gospel of Christ is God's own work, but the publishing of it to the world is committed to the apostles and ministers. Note here, 1st. The ministry is a trust, for the Gospel was committed unto this apostle. It is an office of trust as well as of power, and the former more than the latter; for this reason ministers are called stewards, 1 Cor. iv. 1. 2nd. It is a glorious trust, because the Gospel committed to them is a glorious Gospel; it is a trust of very great importance, God's glory is very much concerned in it. Lord, what a trust is committed to us! How much grace do we want to be found faithful in this great trust!

[The Gospel inculcates morality in all its branches not less than the law. They are not opposed to each other, as some think, nor is the Gospel designed to relax the bonds of moral obligation. On the contrary, to uphold the law in its precepts and sanctions is to preach "according to the Gospel."]

12 And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; 13 Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious: but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief. 14 And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. 15 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief. 16 Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting. 17 Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Here he, First. Returns thanks to Jesus Christ for putting him into the ministry. Observe, 1. It is Christ's work to put men into the ministry, Acts xxvi. 16, 17. God condemned the false prophets among the Jews in these words, "I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied," Jer. xxiii. 21. Ministers, properly speaking, cannot make ministers, much less can persons make themselves ministers; for it is Christ's work, as King and Head, Prophet and Teacher, of his church. 2. Those whom he puts into the ministry he enables for it, whom he calls he qualifies. Those ministers that are no way fit for their work, nor have ability for it, are not of Christ's putting into the ministry, though there are different qualifications as to gifts and graces. 3. Christ gives not only ability, but fidelity, to those whom he puts into the ministry. He "counted me faithful," and none are counted faithful but those whom he makes so. Christ's ministers are trusty servants, and they ought to be so, who have so great a trust committed to them. 4. A call to the ministry is a great favour, for which those that are so called ought to give thanks to Jesus Christ. [No office is in itself more honourable, none more productive of blessed results. In proportion to our view of its dignity, and of our sympathy with its great design, will be the gratitude which we who sustain it shall feel that it has been conferred upon us.] "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord," who hath put me into the ministry. Now, the more to magnify the grace of Christ in putting him into the ministry, he,

Secondly. Gives an account of his conversion.

1. What he was before his conversion; "A blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious." Saul "breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord," Acts ix. 1. He made havoc of the church, Acts viii. 3; a blasphemer of God, a persecutor of the saints, and injurious to both. Many times those that are designed for great and eminent services are left to themselves before their conversion, to fall into great wickedness, that the mercy of God may be the more glorified in their remission, and the grace of God in their regeneration. The greatness of sin is no bar to our acceptance with God; no, nor to our being employed for him if it be truly repented of. Observe here, 1. Blasphemy, persecution, and injuriousness, are very great and heinous sins, and those who are guilty of them are sinners before God exceedingly. To blaspheme God is immediately and directly to strike at God; to persecute his people is to endeavour to wound him through their sides; and to be injurious is to be like Ishmael, whose hand was against every one, and every one was against him. For such invade God's prerogative, and encroach upon the liberties of their fellow-creatures. 2. True penitents, to serve a good purpose, will not be backward to own their former condition before they were brought home to God. This good apostle often confessed what his former life had been, as Acts xxii. 4; xxvi. 9–11.

2. See the great favour of God to him; "But I obtained mercy." This was a blessed, but indeed a great favour, that so notorious a rebel should find mercy with his prince. If Paul had persecuted the Christians wilfully, knowing them to be the people of God, for aught I know he had been guilty of the unpardonable sin; but because he did it ignorantly and in unbelief he obtained mercy. Note, 1st. What we do ignorantly is a less crime than what we do knowingly. A sin of ignorance is a sin, for he that knew not his Master's will, but did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes, Rome, whence he wrote his Second Epistle to Timothy shortly before his martyrdom, which took place in 67 or 68 A.D.

i. 1. "An apostle of Jesus Christ:" see 1 Cor. ix. 1.

i. 4. "Fables" may mean any legends, whether of Jewish or Gnostic origin, which would corrupt Christianity if admitted into it. "Endless genealogies:" "interminable lists of Gnostic emanations introduced by those who mixed up their so-called philosophy with Christianity, pretending to possess a knowledge (gnosis) which penetrated into hidden mysteries, and despising simple faith in revealed truth" (Webster and Wilkinson). Not "godly edifying," but "God's dispensation, which is in faith:" so best MSS. "Has its sphere and development amongst men in faith" (Alford).

i. 5. "The commandment:" in verse 11 "the Gospel." The apostle has in view the law in the Gospel (Rom. x. 4), and the aim of this is not foolish talking and disputings, but love and faith.

i. 7. "Teachers of the law:" "Either Judaizers, who insisted on

Lu. xii. 43. Ignorance in some cases will extenuate a crime, though it do not take it away. 2nd. Unbelief is at the bottom of what sinners do ignorantly; they do not believe God's threatenings, otherwise they could not do as they do. 3rd. For these reasons St. Paul obtained mercy; "But I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief." 4th. Here was mercy for a blasphemer, a persecutor, and for an injurious person; "But I obtained mercy," I a blasphemer, &c. Here he takes notice of the abundant grace of Jesus Christ, ver. 14. The conversion and salvation of great sinners is owing to the grace of Christ, his "exceeding abundant" grace; even that grace of Christ which appears in his glorious Gospel, ver. 15. "With faith and love." These graces were implanted in his heart when he was converted, and were the proofs of his conversion: faith as opposed to his former rejection of Christ, and love, to his former cruel persecution of the followers of Christ. "This is a faithful saying," &c. Here we have the sum of the whole Gospel, "that Jesus Christ came into the world;" the Son of God took upon him our nature, was "made flesh, and dwelt among us," Jo. i. 14. He came into the world "not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," Mat. ix. 13. His errand into the world was to seek and find, and so save them that were lost, Lu. xix. 10. The ratification of this is, that it is "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance." It is good news "worthy of all acceptance," and yet not too good to be true, for it is "a faithful saying," "It is a faithful saying," and therefore worthy to be embraced in the arms of faith. It is "worthy of all acceptance," and therefore to be received with holy love, which refers to the foregoing verse, where the grace of Christ is said to abound in "faith and love." And in the close of the verse Paul applies it to himself; "Of whom I am chief." Paul was a sinner of the first rank; so he acknowledges himself to have been, for he breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, &c., Acts ix. 1, 2. Persecutors are some of the worst of sinners; such a one Paul had been; or, "of whom I am chief," that is, of pardoned sinners I am chief. It is an expression of his great humility; he that elsewhere calls himself the least of saints, Eph. iii. 8. here calls himself the chief of sinners. Observe, First. Christ Jesus is come into the world; the prophecies concerning his coming are now fulfilled. Secondly. He came to save sinners; he came to save those that could not save and help themselves. Thirdly. Blasphemers and persecutors are the chief of sinners; so St. Paul reckoned them. Fourthly. The chief of sinners may become the chief of saints; so this apostle was, for he was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles, 2 Cor. xi. 5: for Christ came to save the chief of sinners. Fifthly. This is a very great truth, it is a faithful saying; these are true and faithful words, which may be depended on. Sixthly. It deserves to be received, to be believed by all of us for our comfort and encouragement.

3. The mercy which Paul found with God, notwithstanding his great wickedness before his conversion. He speaks, 1st. For the encouragement of others to repent and believe; ver. 16. "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe." It was an instance of the long-suffering of Christ that he would bear so much with one that had been so very provoking, and it was designed for a pattern to all others, that the greatest of sinners might not despair of mercy with God. Note here, First. Our apostle was one of the first great sinners converted to Christianity. [The apostle however refers, I conceive, not to priority of time, but, as before, to the pre-eminence of his guilt; not that he was the first, or one of the first, great sinners converted, but that he obtained mercy though so great a sinner as to rank first in point of guilt.] Secondly. He was converted and obtained mercy for the sake of others as well of himself; he was a pattern to others. Thirdly. The Lord Jesus Christ shews great long-suffering in the conversion of great sinners. Fourthly. Those that obtain mercy believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; for without faith it is impossible to please God, Heb. xi. 6. Fifthly. Those that believe on Christ believe on him to life everlasting; they "believe to the saving the soul," Heb. x. 39. 2nd. He mentions it to the glory of God. Having spoken of the mercy he had found with God, he could not go on with his letter without inserting a thankful acknowledgment of God's goodness to him; "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." Observe, First. That grace which we have the comfort of God must have the glory of. Those that are sensible of their obligations to the mercy and grace of God will have their hearts enlarged in his praises. Here is praise ascribed to him as "the King eternal, immortal, invisible." Secondly. When we have found God good, we must not forget to speak him great; and his kind thoughts of us must not at all abate our high thoughts of him, but rather increase them. God had taken particular cognizance of Paul, and shewed him mercy, and taken him into communion with himself, and yet he calls him "the King eternal," &c. God's gracious dealings with us should fill us with admiration of his glorious attributes. He is eternal, without beginning of days, or end of life, or change of time; he is the Ancient of days, Dan. vii. 9. He is immortal, and the original of immortality; he only hath immortality, ch. vi. 16. for he cannot die. Invisible, for he cannot be seen with mortal eyes, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, whom no man hath seen, or can see, ch. vi. 16. The only wise God, Jude 25; he only is infinitely wise, and the fountain of all wisdom. "To him be glory for ever and ever;" that is, let me be for ever employed in giving honour and glory to him, as the thousand thousands do, Rev. v. 12, 13.

18 This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy, according to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare; 19 Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck: 20 Of whom is Hymenæus and Alexander; whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme.

Here is the charge he gives to Timothy to proceed in his work with resolution, ver. 18. Observe here, the Gospel is a charge committed to the ministers of it; it is committed to their trust to see that it be duly applied according to the intent and meaning of it, and the design of its great Author. It seems there had been prophecies before concerning Timothy, that he should be taken into the ministry, and should prove eminent in the work of the ministry; and this encouraged Paul to commit this charge to him. Observe,

First. The ministry is a warfare; it is a good warfare against sin and Satan, and under the banner of the Lord Jesus, who is the Captain of our salvation, Heb. ii. 10; and in his cause, and against his enemies, ministers are in a particular manner engaged.

the permanent obligation of the Mosaic law, or Platonising expounders of the law, like Philo, who professed to teach the true and deep view of the law" (Conybeare and Howson).

i. 8—10. The true use of the law is to deter from sin. "Not made for a righteous man;" see Gal. v. 18. Those who are under the Holy Spirit's guidance do right, not from fear of the penalties of the law, but through the influence of the Spirit. "Men-stealers:" literally, "slave-dealers."

Secondly. Ministers must war this good warfare; that is, must execute their office diligently and courageously, notwithstanding their oppositions and discouragements. Note, The prophecies which went before concerning Timothy are here mentioned as a motive to stir him up to a vigorous and conscientious discharge of his duty; so the good hopes that others have entertained concerning us should excite us to our duty: "That thou by them mightest war a good warfare." "Holding faith and a good conscience," ver. 19. Observe, that we must hold both faith and a good conscience; and those that put away a good conscience will soon make shipwreck of faith. Let us live up to the directions of a renewed, enlightened conscience, and keep "conscience void of offence," Acts xxiv. 16; a conscience not debauched by any vice or sin, and that will be a means of preserving us sound in the faith; and we must look to the one as well as the other, for the mystery of the faith must be held in a pure conscience, ch. iii. 9. As for those that had made shipwreck of the faith, he instances two, Hymenæus and Alexander, that had made a profession of the Christian religion, but had quitted that profession; and Paul had delivered them to Satan, had declared them to belong to the kingdom of Satan, and, as some think, had, by an extraordinary power, delivered them to be terrified or tormented by Satan, "that they might learn not to blaspheme," that is, not to contradict or revile the doctrine of Christ, and the good ways of the Lord. Observe the primary design of the highest censures in the primitive church was to prevent farther sin, and to reclaim the sinner. In this case it was for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, 1 Cor. v. 5. Observe, 1. Those who love the service and work of Satan are justly delivered over to the power of Satan: "Whom I have delivered to Satan." 2. God can, if he pleases, work by contraries. Hymenæus and Alexander are delivered to Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme, when one would rather think they would learn of Satan to blaspheme. [Or, rather, the meaning seems to be that they may be deterred from blaspheming, and reclaimed from it, and so "learn not to blaspheme," by an experience of the dreadful punishment incurred by it.] 3. Those that have put away a good conscience, and made shipwreck of faith, will not stick at any thing, blasphemy not excepted. 4. Therefore let us hold fast and a good conscience, if we would keep clear of blasphemy, for if we once let go our hold of these we do not know where we shall stop.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter St. Paul treats, I. Of prayer, with many reasons for it, ver. 1—8. II. Of women's apparel, ver. 9, 10. III. Of their subjection, with the reasons of it, ver. 11—14. IV. A promise given for their encouragement in child-bearing, ver. 15.

P EXHORT therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; 2 For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. 3 For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; 4 Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. 5 For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; 6 Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time. 7 Whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not;) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity. 8 I will therefore that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.

LIFTING UP HANDS.

Here is, First. A charge given to Christians to pray for all men in general, and particularly for all in authority. Timothy must take care that this was done. Paul doth not send him any prescribed form of prayer, as we have reason to think he would if he had intended that ministers should be tied to that way of praying; but in general that they should make "supplications and prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks;" supplications for the averting of evil, prayers for the obtaining of good, intercessions for others, and thanksgivings for mercies already received. Paul thought it enough to give them general heads; they having the Scripture to direct them in prayer, and the Spirit of prayer poured out upon them, needed not any farther direction. Observe, The design of the Christian religion was to promote prayer; and the disciples of Christ must be praying people: pray "always with all prayer," Eph. vi. 18. Prayers for ourselves in the first place, that is implied here; we must also pray for all men, for the world of mankind in general, for particular persons that need or desire our prayers. See how far the Christian religion was from being a sect, when it taught men this diffusive charity—to pray, not only for those of their own way, but for all men. Pray for kings, ver. 2; though the kings at this time were heathens, enemies to Christianity, and persecutors of Christians, yet they must pray for them, because it is for the public good that there should be civil government, and proper persons intrusted with the administration

i. 11. The Gospel of the glory of the blessed God," not "the glorious Gospel." The Gospel is the glad tidings of the glory of God in forgiving sinners for Christ's sake.

i. 12. "I thank Him who has strengthened my heart, Christ Jesus our Lord, that he accounted me faithful," &c. (Conybeare).

i. 13. "Ignorantly in unbelief;" he did not persecute and blaspheme in spite of knowledge, but through lack of it (2 Cor. iii. 13—16), a lesson to form charitable judgments of even persecutors.

of it, whom therefore we ought to pray for, yea, though we ourselves suffer under them. [This exhortation to pray for kings was the more necessary as many of the Jews at this time maintained the seditious principle that obedience was not due from them to heathen governments; and there was a danger lest converts from among them should bring this notion into the Christian church.] For kings, and all that are in authority, that is, inferior magistrates. We must pray for them, and we must give thanks for them, pray for their welfare, and pray for the welfare of their kingdoms, and therefore must not plot against them, for the peace thereof we may have peace and give thanks for them, and for the benefit we have under their government; "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." Here see what we must desire for kings, that God will so turn their hearts and direct them, and make use of them, that we under them "may lead a quiet and peaceable life." He doth not say, that we may get preferments under them, grow rich, and be in honour and power under them. No, the top of the ambition of a good Christian is to lead a quiet and peaceable life; "to get through the world unmolested in a low, private station. We should desire that we and others may lead a peaceable life: all godliness and honesty;" implying that we cannot expect to be kept quiet and peaceable unless we keep "in all godliness and honesty." Let us mind our duty, and then we may expect to be taken under the protection, both of God and the government. "In all godliness and honesty;" here we have our duty as Christians summed up in two words: godliness, that is, the right worshipping of God; and honesty, that is, a good carriage towards all men. These two must go together: we are not truly honest if we be not godly, and do not render to God his due; and we are not truly godly except we be honest, for "God hates robbery for burnt offering." Here we observe, 1. Christians are to be men much given to prayer; they ought to abound herein, and should use themselves to prayers, supplications, &c. 2. In our prayers we are to have a generous concern for others as well as for ourselves; we are to pray for all men, and to give thanks for all men, and must not confine our prayers or thanksgivings to our own persons or families. 3. Prayer consists of various parts, of supplications, intercessions, and thanksgivings, for we must pray for the mercies we want, as well as be thankful for mercies already received; and we are to deprecate the judgments our own or others sins have deserved. 4. All men, yea, kings themselves, and those that are in authority, are to be prayed for. They want our prayers, for they have many difficulties to encounter, many snares to which their exalted stations expose them. 5. In praying for our governors we take the most likely course to lead a peaceable and quiet life. The Jews at Babylon were commanded to seek the peace of the city, whither the Lord had caused them to be carried captives, and to pray unto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof they should have peace, Jer. xxix. 7. 6. If we would lead a peaceable and quiet life, we must live in all godliness and honesty; we must do our duty to God and man. "He that will love life and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile, let him eschew evil and do good, let him seek peace and ensue it." 1 Pet. iii. 10, 11. Now the reason he gives for this is, "because this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour;" that is, the Gospel of Christ requires this. That which is [good in itself, and] acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, we should do and should abound in.

Secondly. As a reason why we should in our prayers concern ourselves for all men, he shews God's love to mankind in general, ver. 4. [But first he says that it is in itself good; a thing both proper in itself to be done and of excellent use to allay jealousies and persecutions. It would conciliate their enemies and persecutors when they were seen to behave themselves with meekness and patience, to live as good citizens, and to pray for all men, not excepting those who treated them with contempt and malice.]

1. One reason why all men are to be prayed for is, because there is one God, and that God bears a goodwill to all mankind. There is one God, ver. 5. and one only; there is no other, there can be no other, for there can be but one infinite. This one God "will have all men to be saved;" that is, he desires not the death and destruction of any, Eze. xxxiii. 11, but the welfare and salvation of all. Not that he hath decreed the salvation of all, for then all men would be saved; but he hath a goodwill to the salvation of all, and none perish but it is their own fault, Mat. xxiii. 37. He will have all to be saved "and to come unto the knowledge of the truth;" that is, to be saved in the way that he hath appointed, and not otherwise. It concerns us to get the knowledge of the truth, because that is the way to be saved. "Christ is the way and the truth, and so he is the life."

2. There is one Mediator, and that Mediator gave himself a ransom for all. As the mercy of God extends itself to all his works, so the mediation of Christ extends itself thus far to all the children of men, that he paid a price sufficient for the salvation of all mankind. He brought mankind to stand upon new terms with God, so as that they are not now under the law as a covenant of works, but as a rule of life. But under grace; not under the covenant of innocence, but under a new covenant. He "gave himself a ransom." Observe, That the death of Christ was a ransom, a counter-price: we deserved to have died; Christ died for us to save us from death and hell. He gave himself a ransom voluntarily, a ransom for all; so that all mankind are put in a better condition than that of devils. He died to work out a common salvation; in order hereunto he put himself into the office of Mediator between God and man. A mediator supposes a controversy. Sin had made a quarrel between us and God; Jesus Christ is a Mediator that undertakes to make peace, to bring God and man together, in the nature of an umpire or arbitrator, a daysman that lays his hand upon us both, Job ix. 33. He is a ransom that was "to be testified in due time;" that is, in the Old Testament times. His sufferings, and the glory that should follow, were spoken of as things to be revealed in the last times, 1 Pet. i. 10, 11; and they are accordingly revealed by the same token that Paul himself was "ordained a preacher and an apostle," to publish to the Gentiles the glad tidings of redemption and salvation by Jesus Christ. This doctrine of Christ's mediation Paul was intrusted to preach to every creature, Mar. xvi. 15. He was appointed to be a teacher of the Gentiles; besides his general call to the apostleship he was commissioned particularly to preach to the Gentiles in faith and truth, that is, faithfully and truly. Note, 1st. It is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour that we pray for kings and for all men, and also that we lead a peaceable and quiet life, &c.; and this is a very good reason why we should do the one as well as the other. 2nd. God hath a goodwill to the salvation of all; so that it is not so much the want of a will in God to save them as it is a want of will in themselves to be saved in God's way. Here our blessed Lord charges the fault: "Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life," Jno. v. 40; "I would have gathered you, and ye would not." 3rd. Those that are saved must come to the knowledge of the truth, for that is God's appointed way to save sinners. Without knowledge the heart cannot be good; if we do not know the truth we cannot be ruled by it. 4th. It is observable that the unity of God is asserted and joined with the unity of the Mediator, and the church of Rome might as well maintain a plurality of gods as a plurality of mediators. 5th. He that is a Mediator in the New Testament sense gave himself a ransom. Vain, then, is the pretence of the Romanists that there is but one Mediator of satisfaction, but many of intercession; for, according to St. Paul, Christ giving himself a ransom was a necessary part of the Mediator's office; and indeed this lays the foundation for his intercession. 6th. St. Paul was ordained a minister to declare this to the Gentiles, that Christ is the one Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all. This is the substance of that which all ministers are to preach to the end of the world; and St. Paul magnified his office, as he was the apostle of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 13. Lastly, Ministers must preach the truth, what they apprehend to be so, and they must believe it themselves; they are, like our apostle, to preach in faith and verity; and they must also be faithful and trusty.

Thirdly. A direction how to pray, ver. 8. 1. Now, under the Gospel, prayer is not to be confined to any one particular house of prayer, but men must pray everywhere. No place is amiss for prayer; no one place more acceptable to God than another; Jno. iv. 21, "Pray everywhere;" that is, we must pray in our closets, and pray in our families, pray at our meals, pray when we are in journeys, pray in the solemn assemblies, whether more public or more private. 2. It is the will of God that in prayer we should lift up holy hands; "Lifting up holy hands" or pure hands, pure from the pollution of sin, washed in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness; "I will wash my hands in innocence; so will I compass thine altar, O Lord," Ps. xxvi. 6. 3. We must pray in charity; without wrath, or malice, or anger, at any person. 4. We must pray in faith, "without doubting," Jas. i. 6; or, as some read it, "without disputing;" and then it falls under the head of charity.

9 In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; 10 But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works. 11 Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. 12 But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. 13 For Adam was first formed, then Eve. 14 And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression. 15 Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with sobriety.

Here is, First. A charge that women that profess the Christian religion should be modest, and sober, and silent, and submissive, as becomes their place.

1. They must be very modest in their apparel, not affecting gaudiness, or gaiety, or costliness, (you may read the vanity of a person's mind by the gaiety and gaudiness of their habit,) because they have better ornaments with which they should "adorn themselves as becomes women professing godliness, with good works." Note, Good works are the best ornament; these are, in the sight of God, of great price. Those that profess godliness should, in their dress, as well as other things, carry it as becomes their profession; instead of laying out their money on fine clothes, they must lay it out in works of piety and charity, which are properly called good works. 2. Women must learn, learn the principles of their religion, learn Christ, learn the Scriptures; they must not think that their sex excuses them from that learning which is necessary to salvation. 3. They must be silent, and submissive, and subject, and not "usurp authority;" and the reason given is, because "Adam was first formed, then Eve" out of him, to denote her subordination to him, and dependence upon him; and that she was made for him to be a helpmeet for him. And as she was last in the creation, which is one reason for her subjection, so she was first in the transgression, and that is another reason. "Adam was not deceived," that is, not first; the serpent did not immediately set upon him, but the woman was first in the transgression, 2 Cor. xi. 3; and it was part of the sentence, "Thy desire shall be to thine husband, and he shall rule over thee," Gen. iii. 16. [It does not, I think, appear that Adam was deceived at all; nor is there any ground in the language, or reasoning of the apostle in this place, to suppose that he teaches that he was, only not first. On the contrary, he says absolutely, "Adam was not deceived." What he did on that fatal occasion he did knowingly, and because he either could not or would not withstand the solicitations of his wife.] But it is a word of comfort, ver. 15. that they that continue in sobriety shall be "saved in child-bearing" or, with child-bearing. The Messiah, who was born of a woman, should break the serpent's head, Gen. iii. 15. Or, the sentence which they are under for sin shall be no bar to their acceptance with Christ, "if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety."

Secondly. Here we observe, 1. The extensiveness of the rules of Christianity. They not only reach to men, but women; not only to their persons, but also to their dress, which must be modest like their sex; and to their outward deportment and behaviour,—it must be in silence, with all subjection. 2. Women are to profess godliness as well as men, for they are baptized, and thereby stand engaged to exercise themselves to godliness; and, to their honour be it spoken, many of them were eminent professors of Christianity in the days of the apostles, as the book of Acts will inform us. 3. Women being more in danger of exceeding in their apparel, it was more necessary to caution them in this respect. 4. The best ornaments for professors of godliness are good works. 5. According to St. Paul, women must be learners, and are not allowed to be public teachers in the church, for teaching is an office of authority; whereas she must not usurp authority over the man, but is to be in silence. But, notwithstanding this prohibition, good women may, and ought, to teach their children at home the principles of religion. Timothy, from a child, had known the holy Scriptures; and who should teach him but his mother and grandmother, 2 Tim. iii. 15. Aquila and his wife Priscilla expounded unto Apollos the way of God more perfectly; but then they did it privately, for they took him unto them, Acts xviii. 26. 6. Here are two very good reasons given for the man's authority over the woman, and her subjection to the man, ver. 13. 1. Adam was first formed, then Eve; she was created for the man, and not the man for the woman, 1 Cor. xi. 9; then she was deceived, and brought the man into the transgression. 7. Though the difficulties and dangers of child-bearing are many and great, as they are part of the punishment inflicted on the sex for Eve's transgression, yet here is much for her support and encouragement, "Notwithstanding she shall be saved," &c. Though in sorrow, yet she shall bring forth, and be a living mother of living children; with this proviso, that they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety; and women under the circumstance of child-bearing should, by faith, lay hold on this promise for their support in the needful time. [Or rather, she shall be saved

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter our apostle treats of church officers. And, I. He gives us the qualifications of a person to be admitted to the office of a bishop, ver. 1—7. II. Of the qualifications of deacons, ver. 8—10; and of their wives, ver. 11; and again of the deacons, ver. 12, 13. III. Of the reasons of his writing to Timothy, whereupon he speaks of the church and the foundation truth professed therein, ver. 14—16.

THIS is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. 2 A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach; 3 Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; 4 One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; 5 (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) 6 Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil. 7 Moreover he must have a good report of them which are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil.

The two epistles to Timothy, and that to Titus, contain a Scripture plan of church government, or a direction to ministers. Timothy, we suppose, was an evangelist that was left at Ephesus to take care of those whom the Holy Ghost had made bishops there; that is, the presbyters, as appears by Acts xx. 29, where the care of the church was committed to the presbyters, and they were called bishops. It seems they were very loath to part with Paul, especially because he told them they should "see his face no more," Acts xx. 38; for their church was but newly planted. They were afraid of undertaking the care of it, and therefore Paul left Timothy with them to set them in order. And here we have the character of a gospel minister, whose office it is, as a bishop, to preside in a particular congregation of Christians. "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desires a good work," ver. 1.

First. The ministry is a work. However the office of a bishop may be now thought a good preferment, then it was thought a good work. Observe, 1. The office of a Scripture bishop is an office of Divine appointment, and not of human invention; the ministry is not a creature of the state, and it is a pity that the minister should be at any time the tool of the state. The office of the ministry was in the church before the magistrate countenanced Christianity, for this office is one of the great gifts Christ hath bestowed on the church, Eph. iv. 8—11. 2. This office of a Christian bishop is a work which requires diligence and application. The apostle represents it under the notion and character of a work, not of a great honour and advantage; for ministers should always look more to their work than to the honour and advantage of their office. 3. It is a good work, a work of the greatest importance, and designed for the greatest good. The ministry is conversant about no lower concerns than the life and happiness of immortal souls; it is a good work, because designed to illustrate the Divine perfections, in bringing many sons into glory; the ministry is appointed to open men's eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, &c., Acts xxvi. 18. 4. There ought to be an earnest desire of the office in those who would be put into it. If a man desires, he should earnestly desire, for the prospect he hath of bringing greater glory to God, and of doing the greatest good to the souls of men by this means. This is the question proposed to those who offer themselves to the ministry in the church of England, Do you think you are moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon you this office? [For parents or patrons to destine a youth to the Christian ministry irrespectively of any desire to or fitness for, it on his part, is a flagrant profanation of the sacred office, and has done incalculable mischief to the church, and been the ruin of souls, by filling the pulpits with unconverted ministers.]

Secondly. In order to the discharge of this office, the doing of this work, the workman must be duly qualified. 1. A minister must be "blameless;" that is, not lie under any scandal; he must give as little occasion for blame as can be, because that will be a prejudice to his ministry, and will reflect reproach upon his office. 2. He must be "the husband of one wife." Not having given a bill of divorce to one, and then taking another; or, not having many wives at once, as at that time was too common both among Jews and Gentiles, especially among the Gentiles. 3. He must be "vigilant," and watchful against Satan, that subtle enemy; he must watch over himself and the souls of those that are committed to his charge, of whom, having taken the oversight, he must improve all opportunities of doing them good. A minister ought to be vigilant, because our adversary the devil goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. v. 8. 4. He must be "sober;" that is, temperate, moderate in all his actions, and in the use of all creature comforts. Sobriety and watchfulness are often, in Scripture, put together, because they mutually befriended one another; "Be sober, be vigilant." 5. He must be "of good behaviour," composed and solid, and not light, and vain, and frothy. [The gravity of his manners should correspond with the dignity of his office. This word prescribes the proper regulation of the conduct; the preceding, the proper government of the mind.] 6. He must be "given to hospitality;" open-handed to strangers, and ready to entertain them according to his ability, as one that doth not set his heart upon the wealth of the world, and that is a true lover of his brethren. 7. "Apt to teach." Therefore this is a preaching bishop that Paul describes,—one that is both able and willing to communicate to others the knowledge which God hath given him; one that is fit to teach, and ready to take all opportunities of giving instruction; that is himself well instructed in the things of the kingdom of heaven, and is communicative of what he knows to others. [It is of great importance that a minister should possess not only a mind well furnished with Divine truth, but also the ability to set it forth in a perspicuous and persuasive manner. Many are willing to communicate what they know, but for want of a clear method, or a ready utterance, are unable.] 8. No drunkard; "not given to wine." The priests were not to drink wine when they went in to minister, Lev. x. 8, 9, "lest they drink and pervert the law." 9. "No striker;" that is, one that is not quarrelsome, nor apt to use violence to any, but doth every thing with mildness, love, and gentleness. The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle towards all, &c., 2 Tim. ii. 24. 10. One that is "not greedy of filthy lucre;" that is, that doth not make his ministry to trundle to any secular design or interest; that useth no mean, base, sordid ways of getting money; that is dead to the wealth of this world, and lives above it, and makes it appear he is so. 11. He must "be patient," and "not a brawler;" of a mild disposition. Christ, the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, is so. Not apt to be angry or quarrelsome; as not a striker with his hands, so not a brawler with his tongue; for how shall men teach others to govern their tongues who do not make conscience of keeping them under good government themselves? 12. "Not covetous." Covetousness is bad in any, but it is worst in a minister, whose calling leads him to converse so much with another world. 13. He must be one that keeps his family in good order, "that rules well his own house;" that he may set a good example to other masters of families to do so too; and that he may thereby give a proof of his ability to take care of the church of God; "For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God." Observe, The families of ministers ought to be examples of good to all other families. Ministers must have their children in subjection; then it is the duty of ministers' children to submit to the instructions that are given them. "With all gravity." Observe, That the best way to keep inferiors in subjection is to be grave with them. Not having his children in subjection with all austerity, but with all gravity. 14. He must "not be a novice;" that is, not one newly brought to the Christian religion; or, not one that is but meanly instructed in it, that knows no more of religion than the surface of it, for such a one is apt to be "lifted up with pride;" the more ignorant men are the more proud they are. "Lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." The devils feed through pride, which is a good reason why we should take heed of pride, because it is a sin that turned angels into devils. 15. He must be of good reputation among his neighbours, and under no reproach from former conversation; for the devil will make use of that to ensnare others, and work in them an aversion to the doctrine of Christ, preached by those that have not had a good report.

Thirdly. Now upon the whole, having briefly gone through the qualifications of a gospel bishop, we may, 1. With great reason cry out as St. Paul doth, "Who is sufficient for these things?" 2 Cor. ii. 16. Hic labor hoc opus,—this is a work indeed. What piety, what prudence, what zeal, what courage, what faithfulness, what watchfulness over ourselves, our lusts, appetites, and passions, and over those under our charge,—I say, what holy watchfulness,—is necessary in this work! 2. Have not the best qualified, and the most faithful and conscientious, ministers just reason to complain against themselves, that so much is requisite by way of qualification, and so much work is necessary to be done? And, alas! how far short do the best come of what they should be, and what they should do! 3. Yet let those bless God and be thankful whom the Lord hath enabled, and counted faithful, putting them into the ministry. If God is pleased to make any, in some degree, able and faithful, let him have the praise and glory of it. 4. For the encouragement of all faithful ministers we have Christ's gracious word of promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," Mat. xxviii. 20. And if he be with us, he will fit us for our work in some measure, and carry us through the difficulties of it with comfort, and graciously pardon our imperfections, and reward our faithfulness with a crown of glory that fadeth not away, 1 Pet. v. 4. [5. Since the office of the Christian bishop or pastor demands such qualifications, let the churches be careful whom they call to it, or encourage as candidates for it; and let much prayer be offered that God would supply them with a constant succession of holy men whom he has himself called and anointed.]

8 Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; 9 Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. 10 And let these also first be proved; then let them use the office of a deacon, being found blameless. 11 Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things. 12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well. 13 For they that have used the office of a deacon well purchase to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

We have here the character of deacons. These had the care of the temporal concerns of the church; that is, the maintenance of the ministers, and provision for the poor. They served tables, while the ministers or bishops gave themselves only to the ministry of the word and prayer, Acts vi. 2, 4. Of the institution of this office, with that which gave occasion to it, you have an account in Acts vi. 1—6. Now it was requisite the deacons should have a good character, because they were assistants to the ministers, appeared and acted publicly, and had a great trust reposed in them. They must be grave; gravity becomes all Christians, but especially those that are in office in the church. "Not double-tongued;" that will say one thing to one, and another thing to another, according as their interest leads them; a double tongue comes from a double heart,—flatterers, slanderers, are double-tongued. "Not given to much wine;" for that is a great disparagement to any man, especially to a Christian and one in office, discredits men for business, opens the door to many temptations. "Not greedy of filthy lucre." This would especially be bad in the therefore all must come within the range of our prayers. "The man Christ Jesus;" "One between God and man, which is the man Christ Jesus" (Tyndal). The manhood of Christ is insisted on, because it was necessary for his mediatorship.

ii. 8—15. The relative duties of men and women in public worship. Not "men," as Authorised Version, but "the men," as distinguished from the women. Not "doubting," but "disputing;" "strife," Wickliffe; "altercation," Rheims.

ii. 9. "Shame-facedness" is wrong, and conveys a wrong idea; it is a printer's corruption from "shame-fastness," which appears in all the English versions except Rheims, which reads "demureness." "Shame-fastness" is that quality which shrinks from overpassing the limits of womanly reserve and modesty, as well as from the dishonour which would justly attach thereto (French, "New Testament Synonyms"). "Sobriety;" better, "self-restraint," or "habitual inner self-government."

deacons that were intrusted with the church's money, and if they were covetous and greedily of filthy lucre, would be tempted to embezzle it, and convert that to their own use which was intended for the public service. "Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience," ver. 9. Note, The mystery of faith is best held in a pure conscience. The practical love of truth is the most powerful preservative from error and delusion. If we keep a pure conscience, that is, take heed of every thing that debauches conscience and draws us away from God, that will preserve in our souls "the mystery of the faith." [By "the mystery of the faith" is meant not any particular doctrine of the Gospel, which may be more mysterious than the rest, but the Gospel at large, which is called in ver. 16 "the mystery of godliness."] Deacons should be men holding fast the true faith in an enlightened and upright conscience. Let these also first be proved," ver. 10. It is not fit the public trusts should be lodged in the hands of any till they are first proved, and found fit for the business they are to be intrusted with; the soundness of their judgments, their zeal for Christ, and the blamelessness of their conversation, must be proved.

Their wives likewise must have a good character, ver. 11; they must be of a grave behaviour, "not slanderers," tale-bearers, carrying stories to make mischief and sow discord; they must be "sober and faithful in all things;" not given to any excess, but trusty in all that is committed to them. All that are related to ministers must double their care to walk as becomes the Gospel of Christ, lest if they in any thing walk disorderly the ministry be blamed. As he said before of the bishops or ministers, so here of the deacons, they must be "the husband of one wife," such as had not put away their wives upon dislike, and married others; they must "rule their children and their own houses well;" families of ministers should be examples to other families. And the reason why the deacons must be thus qualified is, ver. 13, because, though the office of a deacon be an inferior degree, yet it is a step towards the higher degree; and they that had served tables well, the church might see cause afterwards to discharge them from that service, and prefer them to serve in preaching the word, and in prayer. Or it may be meant of the good reputation that a man would gain by his fidelity in this office; they will purchase to themselves "great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus."

Observe, 1. In the primitive church there were but two orders of ministers or officers, bishops and deacons, Phil. i. 1. After ages have invented the rest. The office of the bishop, presbyter, pastor, or minister, was confined to prayer and to the ministry of the word; and the office of the deacon was confined to, or at least principally conversant about, serving tables. Clemens Romanus, in his epistle to the Christians, cap. 42, 44, speaks very fully and plainly to this purpose, that the apostles foreknowing, by our Lord Jesus Christ, there would arise in the Christian church a controversy about the name episcopacy, appointed the forementioned orders, bishops and deacons. 2. The Scripture deacon's main employment was to serve tables, and not to preach or baptize. It is true, indeed, Philip did preach and baptize many in Samaria, Acts viii.; but you read he was an evangelist, Acts xxi. 8, and he might preach and baptize, and perform any other part of the ministerial office under that character. But still the design of the deacon's office was to mind the temporal concerns of the church, such as the salaries of the ministers and providing for the poor. 3. Several qualifications were very necessary, even for these inferior officers; "The deacons must be grave," &c. 4. Some trial should be made of persons' qualifications before they are admitted into office in the church, or have any trust committed to them; let these also first be proved. 5. Integrity and uprightness in an inferior office is the way to be preferred to a higher station in the church; they "purchase to themselves a good degree." 6. This will also give a man great boldness in the faith, whereas a want of integrity and uprightness will make a man timorous and ready to tremble at his own shadow. "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion," Pr. xxviii. 1.

14 These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly: 15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth. 16 And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

He concludes the chapter with a particular direction to Timothy.

First. He hoped shortly to come to him to give him farther directions and assistance in his work, and to see that Christianity was well planted, and took root well, at Ephesus; he therefore wrote the more briefly to him. But,

Secondly. He wrote lest he should tarry long, that he might know how to behave himself in the house of God; that is, how to carry himself as became an evangelist and a substitute of the apostles. Observe, Those that are employed in the house of God must see to it that they behave themselves well, lest they bring reproach upon the house of God, and that worthy name by which they are called. Ministers ought to behave themselves well, and to look not only to their praying and preaching, but to their behaviour. Their office binds them to their good behaviour, for any behaviour will not do in this case. Timothy must know how to behave himself, not only in that particular church where he was now appointed to reside for some time; but, being an evangelist and substitute of the apostles, he must learn how to behave himself in other churches, where he should in like manner be appointed to reside for some time; and therefore it is not the church of Ephesus, but the catholic church, which is here called "the house of God, which is the church of the living God." Observe here,

1. God is the living God. He is the fountain of life, he is life in himself, and he gives life, breath, and all things to his creatures; in him we live, and move, and have our being, Acts xvii. 25, 28.

2. The church is the house of God; he dwells there. The Lord hath chosen Zion to dwell there: This is my rest, here will I dwell, for I have chosen it; there may we see God's power and glory, Ps. lxxiii. 2. It is the great support of the church that it is the church of the living God, the true God in opposition to false gods, dumb and dead idols; "The pillar and ground of truth;" that is, either,

1st. The church itself, that is the pillar and ground of truth. Not that the authority of the Scriptures depends upon that of the church, as the papists pretend, for truth is the pillar and ground of the church; but the church holds forth the Scripture and the doctrine of Christ, as the pillar to which a proclamation is affixed holds forth the proclamation, "Even to the principalities and powers in heavenly places is made known by the church the manifold wisdom of God," Eph. iii. 10.

ii. 15. Women faithfully performing their part in doing and suffering what God has assigned to them—child-bearing and home duties, their sphere as distinguished from public teaching, which is man's—shall be saved.

iii. 6. "He may not be a young scholar, lest he swell and fall into the judgment of the evil speaker" (Tyndal). "The condemnation of the devil:" i.e., the same condemnation that came upon him through pride.

2nd. Others understand it of Timothy. He, not he himself only, but he as an evangelist, he and other faithful ministers, are the pillars and ground of truth; that is, it is their business to maintain, hold up, and publish the truths of Christ in the church. It is said of the apostles that "they seemed to be pillars," Gal. ii. 9. First. Let us be diligent and impartial in our own inquiries after truth; let us buy the truth at any rate, and not think much of any pains to discover it. Secondly. Let us be careful to keep and preserve it; "Buy the truth and sell it not," Pr. xxiii. 23; do not part with it on any consideration. Thirdly. Let us take care to publish it, and to transmit it safe and uncorrupted unto posterity. Fourthly. When the church ceases to be the pillar and ground of truth we may and ought to forsake her; for our regard to truth should be greater than our regard to the church. We are no longer obliged to continue in the church than she continues to be the pillar and ground of truth.

3. What is the truth which the churches and ministers are the pillars and grounds of? He tells us, ver. 16, that "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness." The learned Camero joins this with what goes before, and then it runs thus, 'The pillar and ground of the truth, and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness.' He supposes this mystery to be the pillar, &c. Observe,

1st. That Christianity is a mystery, a mystery that could not have been found out by reason or the light of nature, and cannot be comprehended by reason, because it is above reason, though not contrary thereunto. It is a mystery, not of philosophy or speculation, but, 2nd. It is a mystery of godliness, designed to promote godliness; and herein it exceeds all the mysteries of the Gentiles. 3rd. It is a revealed mystery, not shut up and sealed; and it does not cease to be a mystery because now in part revealed. Now, what is the mystery of godliness? It is Christ; and here are six things concerning Christ which make up the mystery of godliness. First. That he is God manifest in the flesh. "God was manifest in the flesh." This proves that he is God, the eternal Word that was made flesh, and was manifest in the flesh. When God was to be manifested to man he was pleased to manifest himself in the incarnation of his own Son; "The Word was made flesh," Jno. i. 14. Secondly. He is "justified in the Spirit;" that is, whereas he was reproached as a sinner, and put to death as a malefactor, he was raised again by the Spirit, and so was justified from all calumnies with which he was loaded. "He was made sin for us, and was delivered for our offences;" but being raised again, he was justified in the Spirit; that is, it was made to appear that his sacrifice was accepted, and so "He rose again for our justification," as he was "delivered for our offences," Rom. iv. 25. He was put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit, 1 Pet. iii. 18. [The attestation of Christ by the Spirit must not be restricted to his resurrection. It was given also at his baptism, and in our Lord's miracles, and still farther in his miraculous descent and extraordinary agency on the day of Pentecost.] Thirdly. He was "seen of angels." They worshipped him, Heb. i. 6; they attended his incarnation, his temptation, his agony, his death, his resurrection, his ascension. This is much to his honour, and shews what a mighty interest he hath in the upper world, that angels ministered to him, for he is the Lord of angels. Fourthly. He is "preached unto the Gentiles." This is a great part of the mystery of godliness, that Christ was offered to the Gentiles a Redeemer and Saviour; that whereas, before, salvation was of the Jews, the partition wall was now taken down, and the Gentiles were taken in; "I have set them to be a light of the Gentiles," Acts xiii. 47. Fifthly. That he was "believed on in the world," so that he was not preached in vain. Many of the Gentiles welcomed the Gospel which the Jews rejected. Who would have thought that the world that lay in wickedness would have believed in the Son of God? would take him to be their Saviour who was himself crucified at Jerusalem? But, notwithstanding all the prejudices they laboured under, he was believed on, &c. Sixthly. He was "received up into glory," in his ascension. This indeed was before he was believed on in the world; but it is put last, because it was the crown of his exaltation, and because it is not only his ascension that is meant, but his sitting at the right hand of God, where "he ever lives, making intercession," and hath all power both in heaven and earth; and because in the apostasy, of which he treats in the following chapter, his remaining in heaven would be denied by those who pretend to bring him down on their altars in the consecrated wafers. Observe, 1st. He who was manifest in flesh was God, really and truly God, God by nature, and not only so by office, for this makes it to be a mystery. 2nd. God was manifest in flesh, real flesh; forasmuch as children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, Heb. ii. 14. And, what is more amazing, he was manifest in the flesh, after all flesh had corrupted his way, though he himself was holy from the womb. 3rd. Godliness is a mystery in all its parts and branches, from the beginning to the end, from Christ's incarnation to his ascension. 4th. It being a great mystery, we should rather humbly adore it, and piously believe it, than curiously pry into it, or be too positive in our explications of it, and determinations about it, farther than the holy Scriptures have revealed it to us. 5th. It betrays either great ignorance or great prejudice to reject Christianity because it contains mysteries. If they abound in nature and providence, much more may they be expected in revelation. "A religion without mysteries is a temple without its god." 6th. It is both unphilosophical and impious, under pretence of simplifying the word of God, to endeavour to explain away every thing in it that is mysterious. Instead of a system of revealed doctrine worthy of the blessed of God, it would thus become a scheme of mere human rationality and moral virtue.]

CHAPTER IV.

St. Paul here foretels, I. A dreadful apostasy, ver. 1—3. II. He treats of Christian liberty, ver. 4, 5. III. He gives Timothy divers directions which respect himself, his doctrine, and the people under his care, ver. 6—16.

OW the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; 2 Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; 3 Forbidding to marry, and commanding to

iii. 9. "The mystery of the faith:" mystery, since man did not know it till God revealed it, and even yet in parts mysterious (verse 16).

iii. 11. "The women," not "wives" as Authorised Version. These are, according to Chrysostom and most ancient writers, "deaconesses" (Rom. xvi. 1—3; so also De Wette, Wiesinger, Alford, &c.).

iii. 13. "A good degree:" i.e., a good position through the right performance of his duties, and hence influence and weight which abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. 4 For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: 5 For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

We have here a prophecy of the apostasy of the latter times, which he had spoken of as a thing expected and taken for granted among Christians, 2 Thes. ii. In the close of the foregoing chapter we had the mystery of godliness summed up, and therefore very fitly in the beginning of this chapter we have the mystery of iniquity summed up. "The Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith." Whether he means the Spirit in the Old Testament, or the Spirit in the prophets of the New Testament, or both, the prophecies concerning Antichrist, as well as the prophecies concerning Christ, come from the Spirit. The Spirit in both spake expressly of a general apostasy from the faith of Christ, and the pure worship of God. This should come in "the latter times," that is, during the Christian dispensation, for those are called the latter days; in the following ages of the church, for the mystery of iniquity now began to work. "Some shall depart from the faith," or there shall be an apostasy from the faith; "some," not all; for in the worst of times "God will have a remnant, according to the election of grace." They "shall depart from the faith," the faith delivered to the saints, Jude 3; and it was delivered at once, that is, the sound doctrine of the Gospel. "Giving heed to seducing spirits;" that is, men that pretended to the Spirit, but were not really guided by the Spirit. "Beloved, believe not every spirit," 1st Jno. iv. 1; that is, every one that pretends to the Spirit. Now observe,

First. One of the greatest instances of that apostasy, namely, giving heed to doctrines of demons, or concerning demons; that is, those doctrines which teach the worship of saints and angels as a middle sort of deities, between the immortal God and mortal men, such as the heathen called demons, and worshipped under that notion. Now this plainly agrees to the church of Rome, and it was one of the first steps towards that great apostasy, the enshrining of the relics of martyrs, paying Divine honours to them, erecting altars, burning incense, consecrating images and temples, and making prayers and praises to the honour of saints departed. This demon worship is paganism revived, the image of the first beast.

Secondly. The instruments of promoting and propagating this apostasy and delusion. It will be done by hypocrisy of those that speak lies; ver. 2. "Speaking lies in hypocrisy;" that is, the agents and emissaries of Satan that promote these delusions by lies and forgeries, and pretended miracles. It is done by their hypocrisy, professing honour to Christ, and yet at the same time fighting against all his anointed offices, and corrupting or profaning all his ordinances. The hypocrisy likewise of those that have "their consciences seared with a hot iron;" that is, that are perfectly lost to the very first principles of virtue and moral honesty. If men had not their consciences seared as with a hot iron, they could never maintain a power to dispense with oaths for the good of the Catholic cause, could never maintain that no faith is to be kept with heretics, could never divest themselves of all remains of humanity and compassion, and clothe themselves with the most barbarous cruelty, under pretence of promoting the interest of the church. Another part of their character is, that they "forbid to marry," forbid their clergy to marry, and speak very reproachfully of marriage, though an ordinance of God; and that they command "to abstain from meats," and place religion in that at certain times and seasons, only to exercise a tyranny over the consciences of men.

Now, 1. The apostasy of the latter times should not surprise us, because it was expressly foretold by the Spirit. 2. The Spirit is God, otherwise he could not certainly foresee such distant events, which as to us are uncertain and contingent, depending on the tempers, humours, and lusts of men. 3. The difference between the predictions of the Spirit and the oracles of the heathen. The Spirit speaketh expressly, but the oracles of the heathen were always doubtful and uncertain. 4. It is comfortable to think that in such general apostasies all are not carried away, but only some. 5. It is common for seducers and deceivers to pretend to the Spirit, which is a strong presumption that all are convinced that this is the most likely to work in us an approbation of what pretends to come from the Spirit. 6. Men must be hardened, and their consciences seared, before they can depart from the faith, and draw in others to side with them. 7. It is a sign men have departed from the faith, when they will command what God hath forbidden, such as saint and angel, or demon, worship, and forbid what God hath allowed or commanded, such as marriage and meats.

Thirdly. Upon occasion of the mentioning of their hypocritical fastings, the apostle lays down the doctrine of Christian liberty, which we enjoy under the Gospel, of using God's good creatures; that whereas under the law there was a distinction of meats between clean and unclean, such sort of flesh they might eat, and such they might not eat, all that is now taken away; and we are to "call nothing common or unclean," Acts x. 15. 1. We are to look upon our food as that "which God hath created;" we have it from him, and therefore must use it for him. 2. God in making those things had a special regard to "them which believe and know the truth;" that is, good Christians, which have a covenant right to the creatures, whereas others have only a common right. 3. What God hath created is to be "received with thanksgiving." We must not refuse the gifts of God's bounty, nor be scrupulous in making differences where God hath made none; but take it and be thankful, acknowledging the power of God the maker of them, and the bounty of God the giver of them. 4. "Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused," ver. 4. This plainly sets us at liberty from all the distinctions of meats appointed by the ceremonial law, as particularly that of swine's flesh, which the Jews were forbidden to eat, but is allowed to us Christians by this rule, "Every creature of God is good," &c. Observe, that God's good creatures are good, and doubly sweet to us when they are received with thanksgiving. 5. "For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer," ver. 5. It is a desirable thing to have a sanctified use of our creature comforts. Now they are sanctified to us, 1st. By the word of God; not only his permission, allowing us the liberty of the use of these things, but his promise to feed us with food convenient for us. This gives us a sanctified use of creature comforts. 2nd. By prayer, which blesses our meat to us. The word of God and prayer must be brought to our common actions and affairs, and then we do all in faith. Observe, First. Every creature is God's, for he made them; "Every beast in the forest is mine," says God, "and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountains, and the wild beasts of the field are mine," Ps. l. 10, 11. Secondly. Every creature of God is good. When the blessed God took a survey of all his works, God saw all that was made, "and behold it was very good," Gen. i. 31. Thirdly. The blessing of God makes every creature nourishing to us; Man lives not by bread alone, "but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God," Mat. iv. 4; and therefore nothing ought to be refused. Fourthly. We ought therefore to ask his blessing by prayer, and so to sanctify the creatures we receive by prayer. [It is an ungrateful and ungodly practice, in which those allow themselves who sit down from day to day at a table covered with the gifts of God's bounty, and neither give him thanks for his mercies nor ask his blessing on their use.]

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained. 7 But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness. 8 For bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. 9 This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation. 10 For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe. 11 These things command and teach. 12 Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity. 13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. 14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. 15

ORDINATION.

Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all. 16 Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee.

"If thou put the brethren in remembrance," &c. He would have Timothy to instil such notions as these into the minds of Christians, which might prevent their being seduced by the Judaizing teachers. Observe, Those are good ministers of Jesus Christ that are diligent in their work, not that study to advance new notions, but that "put the brethren in remembrance of those things that they have received and heard." Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though you know them," 2nd Pet. i. 12; and elsewhere, "I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance," 2nd Pet. iii. 1; and says the apostle Jude, "I will therefore put you in remembrance," Jude 5. You see the apostles and apostolical men reckoned it a main part of their work to put their hearers in remembrance, for we are apt to forget, and slow to learn and remember, the things of God. "Nourished up in the words of faith and good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained." Observe, 1. That even ministers themselves have need to be growing and increasing in the knowledge of Christ and his doctrine; they must be nourished up in the words of faith. 2.

would be advantageous to him and to the church, if he became a presbyter.

iii. 15. Some suppose that Timothy is referred to in the words "pillar and ground of the truth;" others that the Church of God is meant, which view is supported by Chrysostom, Calvin, Beza, and many others. "The house of God, which is the congregation of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth" (Tyndal).

iii. 16. Sinaitic and Alexandrine MSS. read "who" for "God."

Alford strongly supports this reading; Conybeare is content with Authorised Version. Those who read "who" of course refer it to Christ.

iv. 1. Not "latter times" in the sense of future ages, but merely times after those in which the apostle is writing, as in Acts xx. 29. "Doctrines of devils;" "Doctrines taught by, suggested by devils" (Alford, Conybeare, &c.).

iv. 6. "Of the faith and the good doctrine:" &c., the faith and Observe, The best way for ministers to grow in knowledge and faith is to put the brethren in remembrance; while we teach others we teach ourselves. 3. They whom ministers teach are brethren, and are to be treated like brethren; for ministers are not lords of God's heritage.

First. Godliness is here pressed upon him and others; "Refuse profane and old wives' sayings," ver. 7, 8. The Jewish traditions which some people fill their heads with have nothing to do with them; "But exercise thyself rather unto godliness;" that is, mind practical religion. Those that would be godly must exercise themselves unto godliness; it requires a constant exercise. The reason is taken from the gain of godliness: "Bodily exercise profiteth little," or for a little time. Abstinence from meats, and marriage, and the like, though they pass for acts of mortification and self-denial, yet they profit little, they turn to little account. What will it avail us to mortify the body, if we do not mortify sin? Observe that there is a great deal to be got by godliness; it will be of use to us in the conduct of our whole conversation; "For it hath the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Observe, that the gain of godliness lies much in the promise; and the promises made to godly people relate to the life that now is, but especially they relate to the life which is to come. Under the Old Testament, the promises were mostly of temporal blessings; but under the New Testament, of spiritual and eternal blessings. [Though there is no promise in the New Testament by which the good things of this life, such as health and prosperity, are secured to the godly, yet it is obvious to all, that the natural tendency of a virtuous and godly course of conduct is to promote our temporal welfare, and to preserve us from all those calamities, diseases, and afflictions which are the immediate effects of vice. Besides which the very trials of the godly are blessings in disguise.] If godly people have but little of the good things of the life that now is, yet it shall be made up to them in the good things of the life that is to come. Observe farther, there were profane and old wives' fables in the days of the apostles; and Timothy, though an excellent man, was not above such a word of advice, "refuse profane," &c. Again, it is not enough that we refuse profane and old wives' fables, but we must exercise ourselves to godliness; we must not only cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well, 1st i. 16, 17; and we must make a practice of exercising ourselves to godliness. And, lastly, those that are truly godly shall not be losers at last, whatever becomes of those who content themselves with bodily exercise, for godliness "hath the promise," &c.

Secondly. The encouragement which we have to proceed in the ways of godliness, and to exercise ourselves to it, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragement that we meet with in it. He had said, ver. 8, that "it is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life which now is." But the question is, whether the profit will balance the loss? for if it will not it is not profit. Yes, we are sure it will. Here is another of Paul's "faithful sayings" worthy of all acceptance, that all our labours and losses in the service of God and work of religion will be abundantly recompensed. So that, though we lose for Christ, we shall not lose by him; therefore we labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God," ver. 10. Observe, 1. That godly people must labour and expect reproach; they must do well, and yet expect at the same time to suffer ill. Toil and trouble are to be expected by us, not only as men, but as saints in this world. 2. Those that labour and suffer reproach in the service of God, and the work of religion, may depend upon the living God that they shall not lose by it. Let this encourage them, "We trust in the living God." The consideration of this, that that God who hath undertaken to be our paymaster is the living God, who doth himself live for ever, and is the fountain of life to all that serve him, should encourage us in all our services, and in all our sufferings for him, especially considering that he is "the Saviour of all men;" that is, 1st. By his providence he protects the persons and prolongs the lives, of the children of men. 2nd. He hath a general goodwill to the eternal salvation of all men thus far, that he is not willing that any should perish, but all should come to repentance; he desires not the death of sinners. He is thus far the Saviour of all men, that none are left in the same desperate condition that fallen angels are in. Now, if he be thus the Saviour of all men, we may from hence infer that much more he will be the rewarder of those that seek and serve him; if he have such a goodwill for all his creatures, much more will he provide well for those that are his new creatures, that are born again. He is the Saviour of all men, but "especially of those that believe," and the salvation he hath in store for those that believe is sufficient to recompense them for all their services and sufferings. [3rd. He has provided a sacrifice sufficient to atone for the sins of all men. "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 Jno ii. 1, 2. The blood that atones for one is so precious that it needs no more and no other to atone for all. But its saving benefit is appropriated by faith; "Specially of those that believe." "He that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God." Jno iii. 18.]

Here we see, First. The life of a Christian is a life of labour and suffering, we labour and suffer. Secondly. The best we can expect to suffer in the present life is reproach for our well-doing, for our work of faith, and labour of love. Thirdly. True Christians trust in the living God, for cursed is the man that trusteth in man, or in any but the living God, and they that trust in him shall never be ashamed; trust in him at all times. Fourthly. God is the general Saviour of all men, as he hath put them into a salvable state; but he is in a peculiar manner the Saviour of true believers. There is then a general and a special redemption.

Thirdly. He concludes the chapter with an exhortation to Timothy, 1. To "command and teach these things" that he had now been teaching him. Command them to exercise themselves unto godliness; teach them the profit of it, and that if they serve God they serve one who will be sure to bear them out.

2. He charges him to carry himself with that gravity and prudence as might gain him respect notwithstanding his youth. "Let no man despise thy youth," that is, give no man an occasion to despise thy youth. Men's youth will not be despised if they do not by youthful vanities and follies make themselves despicable; and that men may do who are old, and may thank themselves if they be despised.

3. He charges him to confirm his doctrine by a good example; "Be thou an example of the believers," &c. Observe, Those that teach by their doctrine must teach by their life, else they pull down with one hand what they build up with the other; they must be examples both "in word and conversation." Their discourse must be edifying, and that will be a good example; their conversation must be strict, and that will be a good example. They must be examples in charity, or love to God and all good men; examples in spirit, that is, in spiritual-mindedness, in spiritual worship; in faith, that is, in the profession of Christian faith; and in purity, or chastity.

4. He charges him to study hard; "Till I come give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine, to meditation upon these things," ver. 13. Though Timothy had extraordinary gifts, yet he must use ordinary means. Or, it may be meant of the public reading of the Scriptures; he must read and exhort, that is, read and expound, read and press what he read upon them. He must expound it both by way of exhortation and by way of doctrine; that is, he must teach them both what to do and what to believe. Observe, 1st. Ministers must teach and command the things that they are taught, and commanded themselves to do; they must teach people to observe all things whatsoever Christ hath commanded, Mat xxviii. 20. 2nd. The best way for ministers to prevent being despised is to teach and practise the things that are given them in charge. No wonder if ministers are despised who do not teach these things, or, instead of being examples of good to believers, act directly contrary to the doctrines they preach; for ministers are to be examples of their flock. 3rd. Those ministers who are the best accomplished for their work must yet mind their studies, that they may be improving in knowledge; and they must mind also their work; they are to give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. "Neglect not the gift that is in thee," ver. 14. The gifts of God will wither if they be neglected; it may be understood either of the office to which he was advanced or of his qualifications for that office: if of the former, it was ordination in an ordinary way; if of the latter, it was extraordinary. It seems to be the former, for it was by "laying on of hands," &c. Here see the Scripture way of ordination; it was by laying on of hands, and laying on the hands of the presbytery. Observe, Timothy was ordained by men in office. It was an extraordinary gift that we read elsewhere was conferred on him, by the laying on of Paul's hands, but he was invested in the office of the ministry by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. First. We may note the office of the ministry. It is the gift of Christ; when he ascended up on high he received gifts for men, and he gave some apostles, &c., and some pastors and teachers, Eph iv. 8, 11; and this was a very kind gift to his church. Secondly. Ministers ought not to neglect whatever gift is bestowed upon them. Whether by gift we are here to understand the office of the ministry, or qualifications for that office, neither the one nor the other must be neglected. Thirdly. Though there was prophecy in the case of Timothy, (the gift was given by prophecy,) yet it was accompanied with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery; that is, a number of presbyters. The office was conveyed to him this way; and I should think here is a sufficient warrant for ordination by presbyters, since it doth not appear St. Paul was concerned in Timothy's ordination. It is true, extraordinary gifts were conferred on him by the laying on of the apostle's hands, 2 Tim i. 6; but if he was concerned in his ordination, the presbytery was not excluded, for that is particularly mentioned, from whence it seems pretty evident that the presbytery have the inherent power of ordination.

Having this work committed to him, he must give himself wholly to it; Be wholly in those things, "that thy profiting may appear." He was a wise, knowing man, and yet he must still be profiting, and make it appear that he improved in knowledge. 1st. Ministers are to be much in meditation. They are to consider beforehand how and what they must speak; they are to meditate on the great trust committed to them, of the worth and value of immortal souls, and of the account they must give at the last. 2nd. Ministers must be wholly in these things. They must mind these things as their principal work and business; "Give thyself wholly to them." 3rd. By this means their profiting will appear in all things, as well as to all persons. This is the way for them to profit in knowledge and grace, and also to profit others.

5. He presses it upon him to be very cautious. "Take heed to thyself and to the doctrine;" consider what thou preachest. "Continue in them," that is, in the truths that thou hast received; and this will be the way to "save thyself and those that hear thee." Observe, 1st. Ministers are engaged in saving work, which makes it a good work. 2nd. The care of ministers should be, in the first place, to save themselves; Save thyself in the first place, so shalt thou be instrumental to save them that hear thee. 3rd. Ministers, in preaching, should aim at the salvation of those that hear them, next to the salvation of their own souls. 4th. The best way to answer both these ends is to take heed to ourselves, &c.

CHAPTER V.

Here the apostle directs Timothy, I. How to reprove, ver. 1, 2. II. Of widows, both elder and younger, ver. 3—16. III. Of elders, ver. 17—19. IV. Of public reproof, ver. 20. V. A solemn charge of ordination, ver. 21, 22. VI. Of his health, ver. 23; and of men's sins being very different in their effects, ver. 24, 25.

REBUKE not an elder, but intreat him as a father; and the younger men as brethren; 2 The elder women as mothers; the younger as sisters, with all purity.

Here the apostle gives rules to Timothy, and in him to other ministers, in reproof. Ministers are reprovers by office. Now the rule is,

First. To be very tender in rebuking elders, elders in age, elders by office. Respect must be had to the dignity of their years and place, and therefore they must not be rebuked sharply nor magistratically; but Timothy himself, though an evangelist, must intreat them as fathers, for that would be the likeliest way to work upon them and to win upon them.

Secondly. The younger must be rebuked as brethren with love and tenderness, not as desirous to spy faults or pick quarrels, but as those that are willing to make the best of them. There is need of a great deal of meekness in reproofing those that deserve reproof.

Thirdly. The elder women must be reproofed, when there is occasion. They must be reproofed as mothers; Hos ii. 2, "Plead with your mother, plead."

Fourthly. The younger women must be reproofed, but reproofed "as sisters, with all purity." If Timothy, so mortified a man to this world, and to the flesh, and the lusts of it, had need of such a caution as this, much more have we. Observe, 1. Ministers are reprovers by office; it is a part, though the least pleasing part, of their office. They are to preach the word, &c.; to reprove and rebuke, 2 Tim iv. 2. 2. A great difference is to be made in our reproofs, according to the age, quality, and other circumstances of the persons rebuked; thus an elder in age or office must be intreated as a father. "Of some have compassion, making a difference," Jude 22.

3 Honour widows that are widows indeed. 4 But if any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to shew piety at home, and to requite their parents: for that is good and acceptable before God.

teaching of the Gospel. "Whereunto thou hast attained:" rather, "which thou hast followed." Tyndal, Cranmer, and Geneva read "continually followed."

iv. 8. "Bodily exercise profiteth to a small extent:" "It has its uses, but those uses only partial" (Alford, Bengel, &c.).

iv. 10. "Who is the Saviour of all men:" God is a Saviour of all, but all will not be saved; it is man's sin, not God's will, that destroys some for whom Christ died (John v. 40). "The prominence given to the universality of salvation seems to imply that it was denied by the Ephesian false teachers. So the Gnostics considered salvation as belonging only to the enlightened few, who in their system constituted a kind of spiritual aristocracy" (Conybeare and Howson).

iv. 14. See Note on 2 Tim i. 6.

iv. 16. "In doing this;" the pastor best forwards his own salvation by faithfully working for that of others.

v. 3. Here the apostle seems to speak of widows generally, who

5 Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day. 6 But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth. 7 And these things give in charge, that they may be blameless. 8 But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. 9 Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, 10 Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work. 11 But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry; 12 Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. 13 And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not. 14 I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully. 15 For some are already turned aside after Satan. 16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

WIDOW DESOLATE.—ver. 5.

Directions are here given concerning the taking of widows into the number of those that were employed by the church, and had maintenance from the church; "Honour widows that are widows indeed." Honour them, that is, maintain them, admit them into office. There was in those times an office in the church in which widows were employed, and that was to tend the sick and the aged, to look to them by the direction of the deacons. [They seem to have been employed also in teaching and watching over the younger members and catechumens of their own sex.] We read of the care taken of widows immediately upon the first forming of the Christian church, Acts vi. 1, where the Grecians "thought their widows were neglected in the daily ministration" and provision that was made for poor widows. The general rule is to "honour widows that are widows indeed," that is, to maintain them, relieve them with respect and tenderness.

First, It is appointed that those widows only should be relieved by the charity of the church that were pious and devout, and not wanton widows, that "lived in pleasure," ver. 5, 6. She is to be reckoned a widow indeed, and fit to be maintained at the church's charge, that being "desolate, trusteth in God." Observe, That it is the duty and comfort of those that are desolate to trust in God. Therefore God sometimes brings his people into such straits that they have nothing else to trust to, that they may with more confidence trust in him. Widowhood is a desolate estate; but "let the widows trust in me," Jer. xlix. 11, and rejoice that they have a God to trust to. Again, They that trust in God must "continue in prayer." If by faith we confide in God, by prayer we must give glory to God, and commit ourselves to his conduct. Anna was a widow indeed, that "departed not from the temple," Lu. ii. 37, "but served God with fasting and prayer night and day;" but she is not a widow indeed that "liveth in pleasure," ver. 6, or that liveth licentiously. A jovial widow is not a widow indeed, not fit to be taken under the care of the church. "She that lives in pleasure is dead while she lives," is no living member of the church, out as a carcass in it, or a mortified member. We may apply it more generally; those that live in pleasure are dead while they live, spiritually dead, dead in trespasses and sins; they are in the world to no purpose, buried alive as to the great ends of living.

Secondly, Another rule he gives is, that the church should not be charged with the maintenance of those widows that had relations of their own that were able to maintain them. This is mentioned several times; ver. 4, "If any widow have children or nephews," that is, grandchildren or near relations, let them maintain them, and let not the church be burthened; so ver. 16. This is called shewing "piety at home," ver. 4, or shewing piety towards their own families. Observe, That the respect of children to their parents, and their care of them, is fitly called piety. This is requiting their parents. Children can never sufficiently requite their parents for the care they have taken of them, and the pains they have taken with them; but, however, they must endeavour to do it. It is the indispensable duty of children, if their parents be in necessity, and they are in ability to relieve them, to do it to the utmost of their power, "for that is good and acceptable before God." The Pharisees taught that a gift to the altar was more acceptable to God than relieving a poor parent, Mat. xv. 5; but here we are told that this "is better than all burnt offerings and sacrifices; this is good and acceptable," &c. He speaks of this again, ver. 8, "If any provide not for his own," &c., that is, if any man or woman do not maintain their own poor relations that belong to them, they do in effect "deny the faith;" for the design of Christ was to confirm the law of Moses, and particularly the law of the fifth commandment, which is, "Honour thy father and mother," so that they deny the faith that disobey that law, much more if they provide not for their wives and children, and those that are parts of themselves. If they spend that upon their lusts that should maintain their families, they have denied the faith, "and are worse than infidels." One reason why this care must be taken that those that were rich should maintain their poor relations, and not burthen the church with them is, ver. 16, "That it may relieve them that are widows indeed." Observe, That charity misplaced is a great hindrance to true charity; therefore there should be prudence in the choice of the objects of charity, that it may not be thrown away upon those that are not properly so, that there may be the more for those that are real objects of charity.

Thirdly, He gives directions concerning the characters of the widows that were to be taken into the number to receive the church's charity: not under sixty years old.

[It can scarcely be imagined that the apostle meant to preclude the church from affording relief to any widow unless she were of this age, since the necessities of younger widows might be very urgent, and render them proper objects of compassion. We must suppose, therefore, that these aged widows formed a particular class or order, who were employed, as mentioned above, by the church, and, in consideration of their services, were either wholly or in great part maintained by it. Into the number of those thus employed a widow might not be taken, unless she were sixty. Some of the continental Protestant churches have an order of deaconesses, but it is rarely, if ever, to be met with in our British churches. The office is clearly not of permanent obligation, like those of pastor and deacons, but is left to be used or not, as the requirements and discretion of particular churches may determine. Its revival, under judicious pastoral oversight and guidance, might, in many cases, prove a valuable auxiliary to the church.]

Nor any that have divorced their husbands, or been divorced from them, and have married again; she must have been "the wife of one man," such as had been a housekeeper, had a good name for hospitality and charity, "well reported of for good works." Observe, That particular care ought to be taken to relieve those when they fall into decay who, when they had wherewithal, were ready to every good work. Here are instances of such good works as are proper to be done by good wives: "If she have brought up children," he doth not say, If she have borne children, (children are a heritage of the Lord, that depend on the will of God,) but if she had not children of her own, yet she brought up children; "If she have lodged strangers," and "washed the saints' feet," that is, if she have been ready to give entertainment to good Christians and good ministers, when they were in their travels for the spreading of the Gospel, (washing of the feet of their friends was a part of their entertainment;) "If she have relieved the afflicted," when she had ability,—let her be relieved now. Observe, That those that would find mercy when they are in distress, must shew mercy when they are in prosperity.

Fourthly, He cautions them to take heed of admitting into the number those that are likely to be no credit to them; ver. 11, "The younger widows refuse," &c. They will be weary of their employments in the church, and of living by rule, as they must do; so they will marry and cast off their first faith. You read of a first love, Rev. ii. 4, and here of a first faith; that is, the engagements they gave to the church to behave themselves well, and as became the trust reposed in them. It does not appear that by their first faith is meant their vow not to marry, for the Scripture is very silent on that head; besides the apostle here adviseth the younger widows to marry, ver. 14, which he would not if hereby they must have broken their vows. Dr. Whitby well observes, "If this faith referred to a promise made to the church not to marry, it could not be called their first faith;" ver. 13, "Withal they learn to be idle—and not only idle, but tattlers," &c. Observe, That it is seldom that those that are idle are only idle, they learn to be "tattlers and busybodies," and to make mischief among neighbours, and sow discord among brethren. Those that had not attained to such a gravity of mind as was fit for the deaconesses, or the widows that were taken among the church's poor, let them "marry, bear children," &c., ver. 14. Observe, If housekeepers do not mind their business, but are tattlers, they give occasion to the adversaries of Christianity to reproach the Christian name, which it seems there were some instances of, ver. 15.

We learn hence, 1. In the primitive church there was care taken of poor widows, and provision made for them, and the churches of Christ in these days should follow so good an example as far as they are able. 2. In the distribution of the church's charity or alms, great care is to be taken that those share in the public bounty who most want it and best deserve it. A widow was not to be taken into the primitive church that had relations who were able to maintain her, or who was not well reported of for good works, but lived in pleasure; "But the younger widows refuse; for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry." 3. The credit of religion, and the reputation of Christian churches, is very much concerned in the character and behaviour of those that are taken into any employment in the church, though of a lower nature, such as the business of deaconesses, or that receive alms of the church; if they do not behave well, but are tattlers, busy-bodies, &c., they will give occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully. 4. Christianity obliges its professors to relieve their indigent friends, particularly poor widows, that the church may not be charged with them,—that it may relieve them that are widows indeed. Rich people should be ashamed to burthen the church with their poor relations, when it is with difficulty that those are supplied who have no children or nephews, that is, grandchildren, that are in a capacity to relieve them.

17 Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy were from the first (if they needed) supported by the church. "Widows indeed:" in contrast to those who had relatives to support them.

v. 4. "Good and:" omitted in best MSS.

v. 8. "Faith does not set aside natural duties, but perfects and strengthens them" (Bengel).

v. 9, 10. A special band of widows apparently are referred to here, who had dedicated themselves to the service of God, and were officially recognised and supported by the church (Acts ix. 41). "Of one man:" i.e., clearly married but once. (See Additional Note on chap. iii. 2.) "Brought up children:" if not her own, possibly orphans under the care of the church. "Washed the saints' feet:" see John xiii. 14; possibly metaphorical for showing a spirit of Christ-like humility.

v. 12. "Condemnation," or "judgment," rather than "damnation."

v. 14. "The adversary:" "The adversary is eager to exaggerate of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. 18 For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward. 19 Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. 20 Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear. 21 I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality. 22 Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure. 23 Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities. 24 Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after. 25 Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.

Here are directions concerning ministers:

First. Care must be taken that they be honourably maintained; ver. 17, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour," that is, of double maintenance, double to what they have had, or to what others have. [Or, rather, the apostle uses a definite for an indefinite term; his meaning is, that they should have a liberal maintenance.] "Especially they who labour in the word and doctrine," that is, those that are more laborious than others.

Observe. The presbytery ruled, and the same that ruled were those that laboured in the word and doctrine; they had not one to preach to them and another to rule them, but the work was done by one and the same person. Some have imagined by "the elders that rule well" the apostle means lay elders, who were employed in ruling, but not in teaching; they were concerned in church government, but did not meddle with the administration of the word and sacraments, and I confess this is the plainest text of Scripture that can be found to countenance such an opinion; but it seems a little strange that mere ruling elders should be accounted worthy of double honour—when the apostle preferred preaching to baptizing, and much more would he prefer it to ruling the church; and it is more strange the apostle should take no notice of them when he treats of church officers; but, as it is hinted before, they had not in the primitive church one to preach to them and another to rule them, but ruling and teaching were performed by the same persons, only some might labour more in the word and doctrine than others. Here we have,

1. The work of ministers. It consists principally in two things, ruling well, and labouring in the word and doctrine. This was the main business of elders, or presbyters, in the days of the apostles.

2. The honour due to them who were not idle but laborious in this work; they were worthy of double honour, esteem, and maintenance. He quotes a Scripture to confirm this command concerning the maintenance of ministers that we should think foreign, but it intimates what a significance there was in many of the laws of Moses, and particularly in that, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn," Deut. xxv. 4. The beasts that were employed in treading out the corn (for that way they took instead of threshing it) were allowed to feed while they did work, so that the more work they did the more food they had; therefore let the elders that labour in the word and doctrine be well provided for, for the labourer is worthy of his reward, Mat. x. 10, and there is all the reason in the world he should have it. We hence learn, 1st. God, both under the law and now under the Gospel, hath taken care that his ministers be well provided for. Doth God take care for oxen, and will he not take care of his own servants? The ox only treadeth out the corn of which they make the bread that perisheth, but ministers break the bread of life which endureth for ever. 2nd. The comfortable subsistence of ministers. As it is God's appointment that they who preach the Gospel should live by the Gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14, so it is their just due, as much as the reward of the labourer; and those who would have ministers starved, or not comfortably provided for, God will require it of them another day.

Secondly. Concerning the accusation of ministers; ver. 19, "Against an elder receive not an accusation but before two or three witnesses." Here is the Scripture method of proceeding against an elder when accused of any crime. Observe,

1. There must be an accusation. It must not be a flying, uncertain report, but an accusation, containing a certain charge, must be drawn up. Farther, He is not to be proceeded against by way of inquiry, that is, according to the modern practice of the inquisition, which draws up articles for men to purge themselves of such crimes, or else to accuse themselves, but, according to the advice of St. Paul, there must be an accusation brought against an elder.

2. This accusation is not to be received unless supported by two or three credible witnesses, and the accusation must be received before them; that is, the accused must have the accusers face to face, because the reputation of a minister is in a particular manner a tender thing; and therefore, before any thing be done in the least to blemish that reputation, great care must be taken that the thing alleged against him be well proved, that he be not reproached upon an uncertain surmise; but, ver. 20, "Them that sin, rebuke before all;" that is, thou needest not be so tender of other people, but rebuke them publicly. Or, them that sin before all, rebuke before all, that the plaster may be as wide as the wound, and that those who are in danger of sinning by the example of their fall may take warning by the rebuke given them for it, that others also may fear. 1st. Public scandalous sinners must be rebuked publicly. As their sin hath been public, and committed before many, or at last come to the hearing of all, so their reproof must be public and before all. 2nd. Public rebuke is designed for the good of others, that they may fear, as well as for the good of the party rebuked; as it was ordered under the law, that public offenders should receive public punishment, and all Israel shall hear and fear, and do no more wickedly.

Thirdly. Concerning the ordination of ministers; ver. 22, "Lay hands suddenly on no man." It seems to be meant of the ordaining of men to the office of the ministry, which ought not to be done rashly and inconsiderately, and before due trial made of their gifts and graces, their abilities and qualifications for it. Some understand it of absolution. Be not too hasty in laying hands on any; remit not the censure of the church to any till first time be taken for the proof of their sincerity in their repentance; "Neither be partaker of other men's sins;" implying that those that are too easy in remitting the censures of the church encourage others in the sins which are thus connived at, and make themselves thereby guilty. Observe, We have great need to watch over ourselves at all times that we do not make ourselves partakers of other men's sins. Keep thyself pure, not only from doing the like thyself, but from countenancing it, or being any way accessory to it in others. Here is, 1. A caution against rash ordinations of ministers, or absolution of those that have been under church censures: lay hands suddenly on no man. 2. Those that are rash, either in the one case or the other, will make themselves partakers in other men's sins. 3. We must keep ourselves pure if we would be pure. The grace of God makes and keeps us pure, but it is by our own endeavours.

This (ver. 24, 25) seems to refer to absolution; "Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment, and some follow after," &c. Observe, Ministers have need of a great deal of wisdom to know how to accommodate themselves to the variety of offences and offenders that they have occasion to deal with. 1st. Some men's sins are so plain and obvious, and not found by secret search, that there is no dispute concerning the bringing of them under the censures of the church; they go before to judgment to lead them to censure. 2nd. Others they follow after; that is, their wickedness doth not presently appear, nor till after a due search hath been made concerning it. Or, as some understand it, some men's sins continue after they are censured; they are not reformed by the censure, and in that case there must be no absolution. 3rd. As to the evidences of repentance, "the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise," that is, whose good works do not appear, their wickedness "cannot be hid," and so it will be easy to discern who are to be absolved and who are not. First. There are secret and there are open sins. Some men's sins are open beforehand, and going before unto judgment, and some they follow after. Secondly. Sinners must be differently dealt with by the church. Thirdly. The effects of church censures are very different. Some are thereby humbled and brought to repentance, so that their good works are manifest beforehand, while it is quite otherwise with others. Fourthly. The incorrigible cannot be hid; for God will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts.

Fourthly. As to Timothy himself.

1. Here is a charge to him to be careful of his office, and a solemn charge it is. "I charge thee before God," as thou wilt answer it to God before holy and elect angels, "observe these things without partiality," ver. 21. Observe, It will become ministers to be partial, and to have respect of persons, and to prefer one before another upon any secular account. [As in civil transactions, so also in church affairs, it is of the utmost importance that every thing should be done on the principle of rectitude, and not from partiality or any spirit of favouritism. Great responsibility rests on those who rule, and ordain, and appoint to offices in the church; and they should be especially careful in these matters so to acquit themselves as that none shall be able to accuse, or even to suspect them of being influenced by any sinister motive, or by a desire to put forward their own personal friends or relatives into posts of honour and emolument, especially if this be done to the disparagement of others who may have superior or even equal claims.] He charges him by all that is dear "before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels," to guard against partiality.

2. Ministers must give an account to God and the Lord Jesus Christ whether and how they have observed all things given them in charge; and woe to them if they have been partial in their ministrations out of any worldly politic view.

3. He charges him to take care of his health. "Drink no longer water," &c. It seems Timothy was a mortified man to the pleasures of sense; he drank water, and he was a man of no strong constitution of body, and for that reason Paul advises him to use wine for the helping of his stomach, and the recruiting of his nature. Observe, It is a little wine, for ministers must not be given to much wine, so much as may be for the health of the body, not so as to distemper it; for God hath made wine to rejoice man's heart. 1st. It is the will of God that people should take all due care of their bodies. As we are not to make them our masters, so neither our slaves, but to use them so as they may be most fit and helpful to us in the service of God. Observe, 2nd. Wine is most proper for sickly and weakly people, whose stomachs are often out of order, and who labour under infirmities. "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts," Pr. xxxi. 6. 3rd. Wine should be used as a help, and not a hindrance, to our work and usefulness.

CHAPTER VI.

I. He treats of the duty of servants, ver. 1, 2. II. Of false teachers, ver. 3—5. III. Of godliness and covetousness, ver. 6—10. IV. What Timothy was to flee, and what to follow, ver. 11, 12. V. A solemn charge, ver. 13—16. And, VI. A charge for the rich, ver. 17—19; and lastly, a charge to Timothy, ver. 20, 21.

ET as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. 2 And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort. 3 If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness;

v. 17. "Especially they who," &c.: hence it is evident that all presbyters did not publicly teach (Conybeare, Alford, &c.).

v. 21. Best MSS. read "before God and Christ Jesus." "Elect angels:" the angels who are God's chosen ministers (Heb. i. 14; Psa. xci. 11).

v. 22. "The reference is primarily to presbyters, of course extending also in its spirit to all other church officers" (Alford). The second clause depends on the first; if Timothy carelessly ordained the faults of a few, and to lay the blame on the whole church and its doctrines" (Bengel). "Not Satan, but any adversary, Jew or Gentile, who may be on the watch to get occasion, by the lax conduct of the believers, to slander the church" (Alford).

v. 16. Best MSS. omit "man or;" the sense therefore would be, "If any believing woman have widows belonging to her requiring support, let her care for them, thus easing the church and guarding herself from the evils of idleness."

4 He is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, 5 Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: from such withdraw thyself.

Here is, First. The duty of servants. He had spoken before of church relations, here of family relations. Servants are here said to be "under the yoke," which notes both subjection and labour; they are yoked to work, not to be idle. If Christianity finds servants under the yoke, it continues them under it, for the Gospel does not cancel the obligations any lie under, either by the law of nature or by mutual consent. They must respect their masters, "count them worthy of all honour," because they are their masters; that is, of all the respect, and observance, and compliance, and obedience that is justly expected from servants to their masters. Not that they were to think that of them which they were not; but, as their masters, they must count them worthy of all that honour which was fit for them to receive, "that the name of God be not blasphemed." If servants that embraced the Christian religion should grow insolent and disobedient to their masters, the doctrine of Christ would be reflected on for their sakes, as if it had made men worse masters than they had been before they had received the Gospel. Observe, If the professors of religion misbehave themselves, "the name of God and his doctrine" is in danger of being blasphemed by those that seek occasion to speak evil of that worthy name by which we are called. And this is a good reason why we should all carry ourselves well, that we may prevent the occasion which many seek, and will be very apt to lay hold of, to speak ill of religion for our sakes. Or, suppose the master were a Christian and a believer, and the servant a believer too, would not that excuse him, because "in Christ there is neither bond nor free?" No, by no means, for Jesus Christ did not come to dissolve the bond of civil relation, but to strengthen it. "They that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren;" for that brotherhood relates only to spiritual privileges, not to any outward dignity or advantage. Those misunderstand and abuse their religion who make it a pretence for denying the duties that they owe to their relations; nay, "rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved." They must think themselves the more obliged to serve them, because the faith and love that bespeaks men Christians obliges them to do good, and that is all wherein their service consists. Observe, That it is a great encouragement to us in doing our duty to our relations, if we have reason to think they are faithful and beloved, and "partakers of the benefit," that is, of the benefit of Christianity. Observe, Believing masters and servants are brethren, and partakers of the benefit, for in Christ Jesus there is neither bond nor free, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 28; Timothy is appointed to "teach and exhort these things." Observe, That ministers must preach not only the general duties of all, but the duties of particular relations.

[The persons to whom Timothy was to give these instructions were not servants in our sense of the word, but slaves; and if, notwithstanding the injustice done them, as involved in the very condition of slavery, they were to treat their masters with the obedience and respect here enjoined, how much more incumbent is similar conduct upon Christian servants! Perhaps, taken as a class, few persons have greater opportunities of exhibiting the influence of Christianity upon the daily life and temper than they have, and few, if any, are under greater obligations to it for the improvement of their social condition. It is Christianity that has abolished slavery and established the mutual respect, good-will, and kindness which obtain in all well-regulated families between masters and servants. Are you a servant? then think how much you may promote the happiness of the family in which you live by your respectful and quiet deportment, and by your cheerful obedience in all things to the commands of your employers. Let conscientiousness, integrity, and an assiduous attention to your duties be apparent in every part of your conduct, and they will be constrained to pay a just tribute of respect to you personally; and what is more, and will give you greater satisfaction, they will acknowledge the excellence of your religion, though they may have none themselves. If it is your happiness to live in a godly family, then remember that, while faith in Christ makes you partakers together of religious privileges, it does not confound social distinctions. The various ranks and subordinations in society are not the result of human contrivance, but of Divine appointment. You were as much made a servant by providence as you were made a Christian by grace. That servant therefore will act in a manner unworthy of his Christian profession who, because he is employed by a pious master, presumes to treat him with rudeness and impertinent familiarity, or allows himself to disobey or neglect his orders. And let me add, that masters who have pious and faithful servants should be sensible of the advantage, and treat them with respect and kindness. When it is remembered how much we must of necessity depend upon them, confide in them, and commit the interests of our families to their hands, it seems but a reasonable return, if they serve us with fidelity, that we should in every considerate way promote their welfare.]

Secondly. Paul here warns Timothy to withdraw from those that corrupted the doctrine of Christ, and made it the subject of strife, and debate, and controversy. "If any man teach otherwise," ver. 3-5; that is, do not preach practically, do not teach and exhort that which is for the promoting of serious godliness; if he will not consent to wholesome words, words that have a direct tendency to heal the soul, if he will not consent to these, even "the words of our Lord Jesus Christ." Observe, We are not required to consent to any words as wholesome words but only the words of our Lord Jesus Christ; but those we must give our unfeigned assent and consent to; [Observe, What the apostles wrote by inspiration are "the words of our Lord Jesus Christ." They speak his meaning, and are clothed with his authority. "We have the mind of Christ," 1 Cor. ii. 16;] and "to the doctrine which is according to godliness." Observe, The doctrine of our Lord Jesus is a doctrine according to godliness; it hath a direct tendency to make people godly; but he that doth not do so is proud, ver. 4, and contentious, ignorant, and doth a great deal of mischief to the church, knowing nothing. Observe, Commonly those are most proud that know least, for with all their knowledge they do not know themselves. "But doting about questions." Those who fall off from the plain practical doctrines of Christianity fall into controversies which eat out the life and power of religion; they dote about questions and strifes of words, which do a great deal of mischief in the church, are the occasion of "envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings." When men are not content with the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine which is according to godliness, but will frame notions of their own, and impose them and that too in their own words, which man's wisdom teacheth, and not in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13, they sow the seeds of all mischief in the church. Hence come "perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds," ver. 5, disputes that are all subtlety and no solidity. Observe, Men of corrupt minds are destitute of the truth. The reason why men's minds are corrupt is, because they do not stick to "the truth as it is in Jesus." "Supposing that gain is godliness;" that is, the making religion truckle to their secular interests: from such as these Timothy is warned to withdraw himself. We observe, 1. The words of our Lord Jesus Christ are wholesome words, they are the fittest to prevent or heal the church's wounds, as well as to heal a wounded conscience; for Christ hath "the tongue of the learned to speak a word in season to him that is weary," Isa. l. 4. The words of Christ are the best to prevent ruptures in the church; for none that profess faith in him will dispute the aptness or authority of his words, who is their Lord and teacher. And it hath never gone well with the church since the words of men have claimed a regard equal to his words, and in some cases a much greater. 2. Whoever doth teach otherwise, and doth not consent to these wholesome words, "He is proud, knowing nothing," for pride and ignorance commonly go together. 3. St. Paul sets a brand only on those that consent not to the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine which is according to godliness; they are "proud, knowing nothing," &c.; other words more wholesome he knew not. 4. We learn the sad effects of "doting about questions and strifes of words." Of such doting about questions "cometh envy, strife, evil surmisings, and perverse disputings." When men leave the wholesome words of our Lord Jesus Christ, they will never agree in other words, either of their own or other men's inventions, but will perpetually wrangle and quarrel about them; and this will produce envy, when they see the words of others preferred to those they have adopted for their own; and this will be attended with jealousies and suspicions of one another, called here "evil surmisings;" then they will proceed to "perverse disputings." 5. Such persons who are given to perverse disputings appear to be men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, and who act in this manner for the sake of gain, which is all their godliness, "supposing gain to be godliness," contrary to the apostle's judgment, who reckoned godliness great gain. 6. Good ministers and Christians will withdraw themselves from such. "Come out from among them, my people, and be ye separate," says the Lord; from such withdraw thyself.

[Christians are to contend, and to contend earnestly, for the faith; to contend against infidelity which would subvert it, against superstition which would corrupt it, against false doctrine which would distort it; but they must beware that controversy does not degenerate into perverse disputings and a mere strife of words. Alas! how many of the controversies which have torn and rent the church, and divided Christians into sects, have been little better. How unseemly are such strifes among brethren, and how detrimental to the very truth they all love, and all seek to promote.]

6 But godliness with contentment is great gain. 7 For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. 8 And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. 9 But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. 10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. 11 But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. 12 Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses.

INTERIOR OF COLOSSEUM.—VER. 12.

unfit men, he would not be free from blame if they created mischief or scandal in the church. Ellicott, Wiesinger, and others understand "lay hands suddenly" of the restoring to church fellowship those who had fallen into sin.

v. 24, 25. Of some the sins are notorious, so that they are known to the judge before the man appears before him; of others the sins are concealed, and only to be discovered by careful examination. So also with good deeds—some are manifest, others require searching out, being done secretly. Hence, as Alford remarks, "The tendency of this verse (25) is to warn Timothy against hasty condemnation, as the former had done against hasty approval."

vi. 1, 2. Christian slaves under the yoke (i.e., slaves of unbelieving masters) are not to bring reproach on the God whom they serve by insubordinate conduct, thinking themselves superior to their masters because of their religion. Also Christian slaves having Christian masters must not think this a reason for neglecting their duty, but

First. The excellency of contentment for this world, though in the sense they meant it is false, yet it is undoubtedly true that, though Christianity is the worst trade, it is the best calling for this world, will be disappointed, and find it it merely to serve their turn for as their calling, and make a business of it, will find it a gainful calling, for it hath the promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come. The truth he lays down is, that "godliness with contentment is great gain." Some read it, godliness with a competency, that is, if a man have but a little in this world, yet, if he have but enough to carry him through it, he needs desire no more, his godliness with that will be his great gain; "for a little which a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." Ps. xxxvii. 16. We read it, "godliness with contentment;" godliness is itself great gain, it is profitable to all things, and wherever there is true godliness there will be contentment; but those that are arrived to the highest pitch of contentment with their godliness are certainly the easiest, and happiest people in this world. "Godliness with contentment," that is, Christian contentment, (content must come from principles of godliness,) that is great gain, it is all the wealth in the world. He that is godly is sure to be happy in another world, and if withal he do by contentment accommodate himself to his condition in this world, he hath enough. Here we have, 1. A Christian's gain; it is godliness with contentment, this is the true way to gain, yea, it is gain itself. 2. A Christian's gain is great; it is not like the little gain of worldlings, who are so fond of a little worldly advantage. 3. Godliness is ever accompanied with contentment, in a greater or lesser degree. All truly godly people have learned with St. Paul in whatever state they are to be therewith content, Phil. iv. 11; they are content with what God allots for them, well knowing that is best for them. Let us all then endeavour after godliness with contentment. The reason he gives for it is, "For we brought nothing with us into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out," ver. 7. This is a reason why we should be content with a little.

1st. Because we can challenge nothing as a debt that is due to us, for we came naked into the world. Whatever we have had since, we are obliged to the providence of God for it; but he that gave may take what and when he pleases. We had our beings, our bodies, our lives, which are more than meat, which are more than raiment, when we came into the world, though we came naked and brought nothing with us; may we not then be content while our beings and lives are continued to us, though we have not everything we would have? We brought nothing with us into this world, and yet God provided for us, care was taken of us, we have been fed all our lives long unto this day, and therefore, when we are reduced to the greatest straits, we cannot be poorer than when we came into this world, and yet then we were provided for; therefore let us trust in God for the remaining part of our pilgrimage.

2nd. We shall carry nothing with us out of this world. A shroud, a coffin, and a grave, are all that the richest man in the world can have from his thousands. Therefore why should we covet much? Why should we not be content with a little, because how much soever we have we must leave it behind us? Ecc. vi. 15, 16.

From hence he infers, ver. 8, "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." Food and a covering, including habitation as well as raiment. Observe, If God give us the necessary supports of life, we ought to be content therewith, though we have not the ornaments and delights of it. If nature should be content with a little, grace should be content with less; though we have not dainty food, though we have not costly raiment, if we have but food and raiment convenient for us, we ought to be content. This was Agur's prayer, "Give me neither poverty nor riches, feed me with food convenient for me," Pr. xxx. 8. Here we see, First. The folly of placing our happiness in these things, when we did not bring anything into this world with us, and we can carry nothing out. What will these do when death shall strip them of their happiness and portion, and they must take an everlasting farewell of all these things on which they have so much doted? They may say with poor Micah, "Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more?" Jud. xviii. 24. Secondly. The necessities of life are the bounds of a true Christian's desire, and with these he will endeavour to be content; his desires are not insatiable; no, a little, a few of the comforts of this life will serve him, and these he may hope to enjoy "having food and raiment."

Secondly. The evil of covetousness; ver. 9, "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare;" that is, that set their hearts upon the wealth of this world, and are resolved, right or wrong, they will have it. It is not said, they that are rich, but they that will be rich, that is, that place their happiness in worldly wealth, that covet it inordinately, and are eager and violent in the pursuit of it. They that are such "fall into temptation and a snare," unavoidably, for when the devil sees which way their lusts carry them, he will soon bait his hook accordingly. He knew how fond Achan would be of a wedge of gold, and therefore laid that before him. They fall into many foolish and hurtful lusts. The apostle supposes, 1. Some will be rich, that is, they are resolved upon it, nothing short of a great abundance will satisfy. 2. Such will not be safe or innocent, for they will be in danger of ruining themselves for ever; they "fall into temptation and a snare," &c. 3. Worldly lusts are foolish and hurtful, for they "drown men in destruction and perdition." 4. It is good for us to consider the mischievousness of worldly fleshly lusts. They are foolish, and therefore we should be ashamed of them, hurtful, and therefore we should be afraid of them, especially considering to what degree they are hurtful, for they "drown men in destruction and perdition." "The love of money is the root of all evil," ver. 10. What sins will not men be drawn into by the love of money! Particularly this was at the bottom of the apostasy of many from the faith of Christ; while they coveted money they "erred from the faith," they quitted their Christianity, and "pierced themselves through with many sorrows." 1st. Observe what is the root of all evil. The love of money. People may have money, and yet not love it; but if they love it inordinately it will push them on to all evil. 2nd. Covetous persons will quit the faith, if that be the way to get money; "Which while some coveted after they have erred from the faith;" Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world," 2 Tim. iv. 10; for the world was dearer to him than Christianity. Observe, Those that err from the faith pierce themselves with many sorrows; they that depart from God do but treasure up sorrows for themselves.

Thirdly. Hence he takes occasion, both to caution Timothy against their lusts, and to counsel him to keep in the way of God and his duty, and particularly to fulfil the trust reposed in him as a minister. He addresses himself to him as a "man of God." Ministers are men of God, and ought to carry themselves accordingly in everything; men employed for God, devoted to his honour more immediately. The prophets under the Old Testament were called men of God.

1. He charges Timothy to take heed of the love of money, which had been so pernicious to many: "Flee these things." It is ill becoming any men, but especially men of God, to set their hearts upon the things of this world; men of God should be taken up with the things of God.

rather for better service, since "those who receive the benefit (of their service) are faithful and beloved." The Authorised Version here is incorrect grammatically (Alford, Conybeare).

vi. 5. The Authorised Version here inverts the true order; it should read, "supposing that godliness is gain." Best MSS. omit "from such withdraw thyself."

vi. 6. "But godliness," &c.: "The gain is in the very fact of possessing piety joined with contentment, and thus being able to

2. To arm him against the love of the world, he directs him to follow that which is good: "Follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness." Righteousness in his conversation towards men, godliness towards God, faith and love as living principles to support him and carry him on in the practice both of righteousness and godliness. They that follow after righteousness and godliness from a principle of faith and love have need to put on patience and meekness; patience to bear both the rebukes of providence and the reproaches of men; and meekness wherewith to instruct gainsayers, and pass by the injuries and affronts that are done us. Observe, It is not enough that men of God flee these things, but they must follow after what is directly contrary thereto; farther, what excellent persons men of God are, who follow after righteousness, &c. They are the excellent of the earth, and being acceptable to God they should be approved of men.

3. He exhorts him to do the part of a soldier: "Fight the good fight of faith." Note, Those that will get to heaven must fight their way thither. There must be a conflict with corruption and temptations, and the opposition of the powers of darkness. Again, it is a good fight, it is a good cause, and it will have a good issue; farther, it is the fight of faith: "We do not war after the flesh; for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal," 2 Cor. x. 3, 4.

4. He exhorts him to "lay hold on eternal life." Observe, 1st. Eternal life is the crown proposed to us for our encouragement to war, and to fight the good fight of faith, the good warfare. 2nd. This we must lay hold on as those that are afraid of coming short of it, and losing it. Lay hold, and take heed of losing our hold. Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy crown, Rev. iii. 11. 3rd. We are called to the fight, and to lay hold on eternal life. 4th. The profession Timothy and all faithful ministers make before many witnesses is a good profession, for they profess and engage to fight the good fight of faith, and to lay hold on eternal life; their calling and their own profession oblige them unto this.

[This is one of those exhortations in which the apostle borrows his metaphor from the Grecian games. Sometimes he compares the Christian course to the races in which the competitors engaged. "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize. So run that ye may obtain," 1 Cor. ix. 24. But in this he alludes to the combats in which they fought for the victory. So he says of himself, "I have fought a good fight," 2 Tim. iv. 7. Eternal life is represented as a prize for which the Christian is to contend; he is to "lay hold on it," to seize it, and hold it fast, as having won the victory. In order to this, 1. Let everything else be pursued in subordination to it. 2. Oppose a determined resistance to all sin. 3. Diligently cultivate all that is in harmony with it, and that conduces to its ultimate attainment. 4. Fix a steady faith on the cross and righteousness of Christ.]

13 I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession; 14 That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ: 15 Which in his times he shall shew, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; 16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen. 17 Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; 18 That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; 19 Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. 20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called: 21 Which some professing have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

He charges him to "keep this commandment without spot;" that is, the whole work of his ministry, all the trust reposed in him, all the service expected from him, he must keep it without spot, unrebukeable, that is, he must carry himself so in his ministry as that he might not lay himself open to any blame, nor incur any blemish. What are the motives to move him to this?

First. He gives him a solemn charge; "I give thee a charge in the sight of God, that thou do this." He charges him as he will answer it at the great day, to that God whose eye is upon us all, who sees what we are, and what we do. "God who quickeneth all things," that is, who hath life in himself, and is the fountain of life. This should quicken us to the service of God, that we serve a God who quickens all things. He charges him before Christ Jesus, to whom in a peculiar manner he stood related as a minister of his Gospel, "who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession." Observe, Christ died not only as a sacrifice, but as a martyr, and he witnessed a good confession, when he was arraigned before Pilate, saying, (Jno. xviii. 36, 37) "My kingdom is not of this world; I am come to bear witness unto the truth." That good confession of his before Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world," should be effectual to draw off all his followers, both ministers and people, from the love of this world.

Secondly. He minds him of the confession that he himself had made. "Thou hast professed a good profession before many witnesses," ver. 12, when he was ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. The obligation of dispense with those things which we cannot carry away with us" (Alford).

vi. 13. "Who before Pontius Pilate," &c.: the fact that our Lord made his confession when in danger is used to confirm Timothy in firm adherence to his confession.

vi. 16. "Who only hath immortality." God only is intrinsically immortal, not by the will of another, but of himself. Some heathen philosophers attributed indestructibility to the soul in itself.

that was still upon him, and he must live up to that, and be quickened by that, to do the work of his ministry.

Thirdly. He minds him of Christ's second coming. "Keep this commandment, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ," that is, keep it as long as thou livest, till Christ come at death to give thee a discharge. Keep it with an eye to his second coming, when we must all give an account of the talents we have been intrusted with, Lu. xvi. 2. 1st. The Lord Jesus Christ will appear, and it will be a glorious appearing, not like his first appearing in the days of his humiliation. 2nd. Ministers should have an eye to this appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ in all their ministrations. 3rd. Till his appearing they are to keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable. Mentioning the appearance of Christ as one that loved it, Paul loves to speak of it, and loves to speak of him who shall then appear. The appearing of Christ is certain, "He shall shew" it; but it is not for us to know the time and season of it, for the Father hath kept that in his own power. Let this suffice us, that in time he shall shew it, in the time that he thinks fit for it.

1. Concerning Christ, and God the Father, he here speaks great things. 1st. That God is the "only Potentate;" the powers of earthly princes are all derived from him, and depend upon him; the powers that be are ordained of God, Rom. xiii. 1. He is the only Potentate that is absolute, and sovereign, and perfectly independent. 2nd. He is the blessed and only Potentate, infinitely happy, and nothing can in the least impair his happiness. 3rd. He is "King of kings, and Lord of lords." All the kings of the earth derive their power from him, he gave them their crowns, and they hold them under him, and he hath a sovereign dominion over them. This is Christ's title, Rev. xix. 16, "upon his vesture and his thigh," for he hath a name higher than the kings of the earth. 4th. He only hath immortality. He only is immortal in himself, and hath immortality as he is the fountain of it, for the immortality of angels and spirits is derived from him. 5th. He dwells in inaccessible light; "Light which no man can approach unto;" that is, no man can get to heaven but those whom he is pleased to bring thither, and admit into his kingdom. 6th. He is invisible. "Whom no man hath seen, nor can see." It is impossible that mortal eyes should bear the brightness of the Divine glory. No man can see God and live.

2. Having mentioned these glorious attributes, he concludes with a doxology; "To him be honour and power everlasting, Amen." God having all power and honour to himself, it is our duty to ascribe all power and honour to him. Note, 1st. What an evil is sin when committed against such a God, the blessed and only Potentate. The evil of it rises in proportion to the dignity of him against whom it is committed. 2nd. Great is his condescension to take notice of such mean and vile creatures as we are. What are we then that the blessed God, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, should seek after us? 3rd. Blessed are they who are admitted to dwell with this great and blessed Potentate. "Happy are thy men," says the queen of Sheba to king Solomon; "happy are these thy servants, who stand continually before thee," 1 Kiz. x. 8. Much more happy are they who are allowed to stand before the King of kings. 4th. Let us love, adore, and praise the great God; for who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? For thou only art holy, Rev. xv. 4.

Fourthly. The apostle adds by way of postscript, 1. A lesson for rich people, ver. 17—19. Timothy must charge them that are rich to take care of the temptations, and improve the opportunities, of their prosperous estate. 1st. Caution them to take heed of pride. That is a sin that easily besets rich people whom the world smiles upon. "Charge them that they be not high-minded," nor think of themselves above what is meet, nor beuffed up with their wealth. 2nd. Caution them against vain confidence in their wealth. Charge them that they "trust not in uncertain riches." Nothing more uncertain than the wealth of this world; many have had much of it one day, and been stripped of all the next. Riches make themselves wings, and fly away as an eagle, &c., Pr. xxiii. 5. 3rd. He must charge them to trust in God, the living God, to make him their hope "who giveth us richly all things to enjoy." Thou that art rich must see God giving them their riches, and giving to enjoy them richly, for many have riches, but enjoy them poorly, not having a heart to use them. 4th. He must charge them to do good with what they have, for what is the best estate worth, any more than as it gives a man an opportunity of doing so much the more good? "That they be rich in good works." Those are truly rich that are rich in good works. That they be "ready to distribute, willing to communicate." Not only do it, but do it willingly, for "God loveth a cheerful giver." 5th. He must charge them to think of another world, and prepare for that, which is done by works of charity, "laying up in store a good foundation against the time to come, that they may take hold on eternal life." Note, 1st. Ministers must not be afraid of the rich; be they ever so rich, they must speak to them, and charge them. 2nd. They must caution them against pride and vain confidence in their riches, "that they be not high-minded, nor trust," &c. Stir them up to works of piety and charity, "that they do good," &c. 3rd. This is the way for the rich to lay up in store for themselves for the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. In the way of well doing we are to seek for glory, honour, and immortality, "and eternal life will be the end of all," Rom. ii. 7.

2. Here is a lesson for ministers in the charge given to Timothy, "Keep that which is committed to thy trust." Every minister is a trustee, and it is a treasure committed to his trust, which he hath to keep. The truths of God, the ordinances of God, keep these, "avoiding profane and vain babbling." Not affecting human eloquence, which the apostle calls vain babbling, or human learning, which many times opposes the truths of God; but keep close to the written word, for that is committed to our trust. [By the "vain babblings" the apostle refers to the empty discourses of those who wished to impose on Christian converts the foolish traditions of the Jewish scribes, and the now obsolete rites of the Mosaic law; and by "the oppositions of science," the metaphysical speculations of the Grecian philosophy; which were not true science, but were "falsely so called."] Some that have been very proud of their learning, their "science which is falsely so called," have by that been debauched in their principles, and been drawn away from the faith of Christ, which is a good reason why we should keep to the plain word of the Gospel, and resolve to live and die by that. Observe, 1st. Ministers cannot be too earnestly exhorted to keep what is committed to their trust, because it is a great trust lodged with them. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust," as if he had said, I cannot conclude without charging thee again—whatever thou dost, be sure keep this trust, for it is too great a trust to be betrayed. 2nd. Ministers are to avoid babblings, if they would keep what is committed to them, because they are vain and profane. 3rd. That science that opposes the truth of the Gospel is falsely so called; it is not true science, for if it was it would approve of the Gospel and consent to it. 4th. Those who are so fond of such science are in the great danger of erring concerning the faith; they who are for advancing reason above faith are in danger of leaving faith.

Fifthly. Our apostle concludes with a solemn prayer and benediction; "Grace be with thee, Amen." Observe, this is a short, yet comprehensive prayer for our friends. Grace be with them, for grace comprehends in it all that is good; and grace is an earnest, yea, a beginning of glory, for wherever God gives grace he will give glory, and will not withhold any good thing from him that walketh uprightly. Grace be with you all. Amen.

vi. 17. Not "uncertain riches," but "uncertainty of riches." (So Wickliffe, Rheims, and Alford.) Best MSS. omit "the living."

vi. 19. Best MSS. read "that which is really life," or "the true life," not "eternal life."

vi. 20, 21. "That which is committed to thy trust:" the care of the church and the truth. "Keep, says he, the deposit. What is the 'deposit'?"—that which was entrusted to thee, not found out by thee; that which you have received, not thought out. . . . Guard, he says, the deposit; preserve intact and unimpaired the talent of the catholic faith. That which was entrusted to you, let that remain with you, let that be handed down by you. You have received gold, give back gold" (Vincentius Lirinensis). "Science falsely so called:" "The antitheses of the falsely-named knowledge" (Conybeare). The Gnostics took their name from gnosis, "knowledge."

Additional Notes.—Chap. iii. 1—7. The qualifications for an overseer of the church. The identity of "overseers" and "elders" in apostolic times is evident from Phil. i. 1, where the apostle addresses presbyters as overseers, and from Titus i. 5—7, where the same persons are spoken of as overseers and elders; "elder" intimated the rank, "overseer" the office filled. Unfortunately, the Authorised Version sometimes translates the original word "overseer," sometimes "bishop." "The husband of one wife;" this precept has been variously understood. The Church of Rome holds the "one wife" to be the Church. Some have thought it a prohibition of polygamy, but this was not allowed to any Christians, so would scarcely need mention in the case of an overseer of the church. The views which are supported most strongly by commentators, and for which much may be said, are two: (1) that the apostle forbids a second marriage when (as was often the case amongst the heathen) the first, on either side, had been dissolved by divorce; (2) that he advises that an episkopos should marry but once.

iv. Prediction of coming false teachers. Exhortations to Timothy concerning them, and as to his general life.

v. 11. "Refuse:" i.e., to place in the number of special widows.

OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF

S. T. PAUL TO TIMOTHY,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

This second epistle Paul wrote to Timothy from Rome, when he was a prisoner there, and in danger of his life, by these words, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," ch. iv. 6. It appears that his removal out of this world, in his own apprehension, was not far off, especially considering the rage and malice of his persecutors, and that he had been brought before the emperor Nero, which he calls his first answer, when no man stood with him, but all men forsook him, ch. iv. 16. And interpreters agree that this was the last epistle he wrote. Where Timothy now was is not certain. The scope of this epistle somewhat differs from that of the former, not so much relating to his office as an evangelist as to his personal conduct and behaviour. [Though it is a question much debated among learned men, whether the apostle was twice imprisoned at Rome, the weight of evidence seems to favour the opinion that he was. The epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, were written during his first imprisonment, and this epistle to Timothy in his second. From his first imprisonment he was liberated, and resumed his apostolic labours; but this second was terminated by martyrdom. Foreseeing that this was likely to be its issue, he was desirous once more to see Timothy, whom he loved as a son, and that he might at such a time be solaced with his company. And this he desired all the more, as most of his personal friends had left him,—Crescens had gone to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, Tychicus he had sent to Ephesus, and Demas had forsaken him. He writes this epistle therefore to urge Timothy to come to him with as little delay as possible, and to bring Mark with him, ch. i. 3, 4; iv. 10—12. As already intimated, this was the last epistle the apostle Paul wrote. Such a circumstance must be felt to give it a solemn and peculiar interest. They are the dying words of "the chiefest of the apostles," the last counsels of "such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ." To young ministers especially they are a legacy of inestimable value.]

CHAPTER I.

After the introduction, ver. 1, 2, we have, I. Paul's sincere love to Timothy, ver. 3—5. II. Divers exhortations given to him, ver. 6—14. III. He speaks of Phygellus and Hermogenes, with others, and closes with Onesiphorus, ver. 15—18.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, 2 To Timothy, my dearly beloved son: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord. 3 I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day; 4 Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy; 5 When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also.

Here is, First. The inscription of the epistle. Paul calls himself "an apostle by the will of God," merely by the good pleasure of God, and by his grace, which he professes himself unworthy of, "according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus," that is, according to the Gospel. [His meaning probably is, that he was made an apostle in order that by his ministry the promise of life in Christ Jesus might be declared. It was part of the design of the blessed God that the gospel message of pardon and life in Christ should be proclaimed by ministers appointed for that purpose, and in accordance with this design Paul was called to be an apostle.] The Gospel is the promise of life in Christ Jesus; life the end, and Christ the way, Jno. xiv. 6. The life is put into the promise, and both are sure in Christ Jesus, the faithful witness, for all the promises of God in Christ Jesus are yea, and all Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20. He calls Timothy his "beloved son;" Paul had a dear love for him, both because he had been an instrument of his conversion and because as a son with his father he had served with him in the Gospel. We here learn, 1. St. Paul was an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God. As he did not receive the Gospel of man, nor was taught it, but had it by the revelation of Jesus Christ, Gal. i. 12, so his commission to be an apostle was not by the will of man, but of God. In the former epistle he says it was by the commandment of God our Saviour, and here by the will of God; God called him to be an apostle. 2. We have the promise of life, blessed be God for it: "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began," Tit. i. 2. It is a promise to discover the freeness and the certainty of it. 3. This as well as all other promises are in and through Christ Jesus; they all take their rise from the mercy of God in Christ, and they are sure, and we may safely depend on them. 4. The grace, mercy, and peace, which even St. Paul's dearly beloved son Timothy wanted, comes from God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord; and therefore the one as well as the other is the giver of these blessings, and ought to be applied to for them. 5. The best want these blessings, and they are the best we can ask for our dearly beloved friends, that they may have grace to help them in the time of need, and mercy to pardon what is amiss, and so may have peace with God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord.

Secondly. Paul's thanksgiving to God for Timothy's faith and holiness. He thanks God that he remembered Timothy in his prayers. Observe that, whatever good we do, and whatever good office we perform for our friends, God must have the glory of it, and we must give him thanks. It is he that puts it into our hearts to remember such and such in our prayers. Paul was much in prayer, he prayed night and day; in all his prayers he was mindful of his friends, he particularly prayed for good ministers, he prayed for Timothy, and had "remembrance of him in his prayers night and day." He did this "without ceasing." Prayer was his constant business, and he never forgot his friends in his prayers, as we often do. Paul served God from his forefathers with a pure conscience. It was a comfort to him that he was born in God's house, and was of the seed of those that served God; as likewise that he had served him with a pure conscience, according to the best of his light: he had kept conscience void of offence, and made it his daily exercise to do so, Acts xxiv. 16. He greatly desired to see Timothy, out of the affection he had for him, that he might have some conversation with him, being mindful of his tears at their last parting. Timothy was sorry to part with Paul, he wept at parting; and therefore Paul desired to see him again, because he had perceived by that what a true affection he had for him. He thanks God that Timothy kept up the religion of his ancestors, ver. 5. Observe the entail of religion descended upon Timothy by the mother's side; he had a good mother, and a good grandmother. They believed, though his father did not, Acts xvi. 1. It is a comfortable thing when children imitate the faith and holiness of their godly parents, and tread in their steps, 3 Jno. 4; Dwelt in thy grandmother and thy mother, and "I am persuaded that in thee also." Paul had a very charitable opinion of his friends, was very willing to hope the best concerning them; indeed, he had a great deal of reason to believe well of Timothy, for he had "no man like-minded," Phil. ii. 20. Observe, 1. We are, according to St. Paul, to serve God with a pure conscience, so did his and our pious forefathers; this is to draw near "with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience," Heb. x. 22. 2. In our prayers we are to remember without ceasing our friends, especially the faithful ministers of Christ; St. Paul had remembrance of his dearly beloved son Timothy in his prayers night and day. 3. The faith that dwells in real believers is unfeigned, it is without hypocrisy; it is a faith that will stand the trial, and it dwells in them as a living principle. It was the matter of St. Paul's thanksgiving that Timothy inherited the faith of his mother Eunice, and his grandmother Lois, and ought to be ours whenever we see the

* The Author of the Exposition of 1 and II Timothy was the Rev. B. A. Atkinson, and the Exposition on both Epistles has been revised for this edition by the Rev. Dr. Steane, of Camberwell.

Introductory Note.—"This epistle is the last testament and swan-like death-song of Paul" (Bengel). "No summary of its contents can give any notion of the pathetic tenderness and deep solemnity of this epistle" (Conybeare and Howson). The apostle urges on Timothy boldness in his ministry, having possibly noticed some signs of timidity or nervous hesitation in his conduct.

i. 1—5. "From my forefathers," &c.: St. Paul's assertion is "that the worship of God had been handed down to him by his forefathers, and that as a Christian he was in truth following his hereditary faith" (Acts xxiii. 1; Gal. iii. 24). An Israelite, unbiassed by sectarian prejudices, would receive Christianity when instructed in its facts and doctrines (Acts xvii. 11, 12).

i. 6—14. "The gift of God," &c.: the grace received either at his ordination or his special setting apart for the work at Ephesus. In 1 Tim. iv. 14 we find "with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery," here "by the putting on of my hands." The apostle like; we should rejoice whosoever we see the grace of God, so did Barnabas, Acts xi. 23, 24. "I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in the truth," 2 Jno. 4.

[The church of God in all ages has been under great obligation to pious mothers. Many of the most eminent and useful ministers have been indebted for their early knowledge and love of the word of God to the instructions communicated by them. What the future man will be is much more determined, in most cases, by the mother's influence upon the character of the boy, than by the father's. This fact should deepen in the minds of Christian mothers a sense of their responsibility; while the example of Timothy's early conversion and subsequent usefulness, and many such examples beside, may greatly encourage their efforts and their prayers.]

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands. 7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. 8 Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God; 9 Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, 10 But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel: 11 Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles. 12 For the which cause I also suffer these things: nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. 13 Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. 14 That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.

Here is an exhortation and excitation of Timothy to his duty: ver. 6, "I put thee in remembrance." The best men need remembrancers. What we know we should be minded of; 2 Pet. iii. 1, "I write this to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance."

First. He exhorts him to "stir up the gift of God" that was in him; stir it up as fire under the embers. It is meant of all the gifts and graces that God had given him to qualify him for the work of an evangelist, the gifts of the Holy Ghost, the extraordinary gifts that were conferred by the imposition of the apostle's hands. These he must "stir up," that is, he must exercise them, and so increase them. Use gifts and have gifts; "To him that hath shall be given," Mat. xxv. 29. He must take all opportunities to use these gifts, and so stir them up, for that is the best way of increasing them. Whether the gift of God in Timothy was ordinary or extraordinary, though I incline to the latter, yet he must stir it up, otherwise it would decay. Farther, you see that gift was in him by the putting on of the apostle's hand, which I take to be distinct from his ordination, which was performed by the hands of the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14. And it is likely Timothy had the Holy Ghost in his extraordinary gifts and graces conferred on him by the laying on of the apostle's hands, (for I reckon none but the apostles had the power of giving the Holy Ghost,) and afterwards being thus richly furnished for the work of the ministry, was ordained by the presbytery.

1. The great hindrance of usefulness in the increase of our gifts is, slavish fear; therefore he warns him against this; "God hath not given us the spirit of fear," ver. 7. It was through base fear that the evil servant buried his talent, and did not trade with it, Mat. xxv. 25. Now God hath therefore armed us against the spirit of fear, by often bidding us fear not. Fear not the face of man; fear not the dangers you may meet with in the way of your duty. God hath delivered us from the spirit of fear, and hath given us "the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." The spirit of power, that is, of courage and resolution, to encounter difficulties and dangers;—the spirit of love to God, which will carry us through the opposition we may meet with, as Jacob made nothing of the hard service he was to endure for Rachel; the spirit of love to God will set us above the fear of man, and all the hurt that man can do us;—and the spirit of "a sound mind," or quietness of mind, a peaceable enjoyment of ourselves, for we are oftentimes discouraged in our way and work by the creatures of our own fancy and imagination, which a sober, solid, thinking mind would obviate, and should easily answer.

2. The spirit God gives to his ministers is not a fearful, but a courageous spirit. It is a spirit of power, for they speak in his name who hath all power, both in heaven and earth; and it is a spirit of love, for love to God and the souls of men must inflame ministers in all their service; and it is a spirit of a sound mind, for they speak the words of truth and soberness.

Secondly. He exhorts him to count upon afflictions, and get ready for them; "Be not thou, therefore, ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner." Be not thou ashamed of the Gospel, of the testimony thou hast borne to it.

1. The Gospel of Christ is what we have none of us reason to be ashamed of.

was the chief in the ordination, the instrument in conveying to Timothy the gift of God; the presbytery were assistants. Not "God hath not given," but "did not give us the spirit of fear," when separated for his work, "but of power." Fear is the result of the spirit of bondage (Rom. viii. 15), "power" is the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts i. 8). "Of a sound mind:" rather, "of bringing others to a sound mind." "Before the world began:" rather, "before the periods of ages." "The grace which believers receive in time

We must not be ashamed of those that are suffering for the Gospel of Christ. Timothy must not be ashamed of good old Paul, though he was now in bonds. As he must not be afraid of suffering himself, so he must not be afraid of owning those that were sufferers for the cause of Christ. 1st. The Gospel is a testimony of our Lord. In and by that he bears testimony of himself to us; and by professing our adherence to it we bear testimony of him and for him. 2nd. St. Paul was the Lord's prisoner, his prisoner, for his sake he was bound with a chain, Eph. iv. 1. We have no reason to be ashamed either of the testimony of our Lord or of his prisoners; if we are ashamed of either now, Christ will be ashamed of us hereafter. But "be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel according to the power of God;" that is, expect afflictions for the Gospel's sake, prepare for them, count upon them, be willing to take thy lot with the suffering saints in this world. "Be partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel," or, as it may be read, 'Do thou suffer with the Gospel.' Not only sympathize with those that do suffer for it, but be ready to suffer with them, and suffer like them. If at any time the Gospel be in distress, he that hopes for life and salvation by it will be content to suffer with it. Observe, First. Then we are likely to bear afflictions well when we fetch strength and power from God to enable us to bear them. Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel, according to the power of God. Secondly. All Christians, but especially ministers, must expect afflictions and persecutions for the sake of the Gospel. Thirdly. These shall be proportioned according to the power of God (1 Cor. x. 13) resting upon us.

2. Mentioning God and the Gospel, he takes notice what great things God hath done for us by the Gospel, ver. 9, 10. To encourage him to suffer, he urges two considerations:—

1st. He shews him the nature of that Gospel which he was called to suffer for, and the glorious and gracious designs and purposes of it. It is usual with Paul, when he mentions Christ, and the Gospel of Christ, to digress from his subject, and enlarge upon them, so full was he of that which is all our salvation, and ought to be all our desire. Observe, First. The Gospel aims at our salvation; he "hath saved us;" and we must not think much to suffer for that which we hope to be saved by. He hath begun to save us, and will complete it in due time, for God calls those things that be not, that is, that are not yet completed, as though they were, Rom. iv. 17; therefore he says, who hath saved us. Secondly. It is designed for our sanctification; "And called us with a holy calling," that is, called us to holiness. Christianity is a calling, a holy calling; it is the calling wherewith we are called, that is, it is the calling to which we are called to labour in it. Observe, All that shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now. Wherever the call of the Gospel is an effectual call, it is found to be a holy call, making those holy who are effectually called. Thirdly. The rise of it is the free grace and eternal purpose of God in Jesus Christ. If we had merited it, it had been hard to suffer for it; but our salvation by it is of free grace, and not according to our works, and therefore we must not think much to suffer for it. This grace is said to be given us "before the world began," that is, in the purpose and design of God from all eternity, "in Christ Jesus;" for all the gifts that come from God to sinful man come in and through Christ Jesus. Fourthly. The Gospel is the manifestation of this purpose and grace, "by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ," who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was perfectly apprized of all his gracious purposes; and by his appearing that gracious purpose was made manifest to us. Did Jesus Christ suffer for it, and shall we think much to suffer for it? Fifthly. By the Gospel of Christ death is abolished; He "hath abolished death;" not only weakened it, but taken it out of the way, hath broken the power of death on us. By taking away sin he hath abolished death, for "the sting of death is sin," 1 Cor. xv. 56, in altering the property of it, and breaking the power of it. Death now of an enemy has become a friend, and is the gate by which we pass out of a troublesome, vexatious, sinful world, into a world of perfect peace and purity; and the power thereof is broken, for death doth not triumph over those who believe the Gospel, but they triumph over it. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" 1 Cor. xv. 55. Sixthly. He hath "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel;" that is, he hath shewed us another world more clearly than it was before discovered under any former dispensation, and the happiness of that world, the certain recompense of our obedience by faith,—we all with open face, as in a glass, behold the glory of God. He hath brought it to light; not only set it before us, but offered it to us by the Gospel. Let us value the Gospel more than ever, as it is that whereby life and immortality are brought to light, for herein it hath the pre-eminence above all former discoveries; so that it is the Gospel of life and immortality, as it discovers them to us, and directs us in the ready way that leads thereto, as well as proposes the most weighty motives to excite our endeavours in seeking after glory, honour, and immortality.

2nd. Consider the example of blessed Paul, ver. 11, 12. He was appointed to preach the Gospel, and particularly appointed to teach the Gentiles. He thought it a cause worth suffering for, and why should not Timothy think so too? No man need to be afraid or ashamed to suffer for the cause of the Gospel. "I am not ashamed," saith Paul, "for I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." Observe, First. Good men often suffer many things for the best cause in the world; "For the which cause I suffer these things," that is, for my preaching and adhering to the Gospel. Secondly. They need not be ashamed, the cause will bear them out; but those that oppose it shall be clothed with shame. Thirdly. Those that trust in Christ know whom they have trusted. He speaks with a holy triumph and exultation, as much as to say, I stand on firm ground; I know I have lodged the great trust in the hands of the best trustee, "and am persuaded," &c.

[This is the language of holy confidence in the prospect of death and eternity. It is a practical illustration of "the full assurance of faith." Paul was now in the immediate prospect of martyrdom, and he avows his conviction that the principles on which he had acted since the memorable day of his conversion would support him in the last extremity. It did not shake his fortitude that the death he had in prospect might be sudden and sanguinary. Bonds and imprisonment were nothing to him, and nothing to him was the executioner's sword. He was ready to repeat his memorable words, "None of these things move me." He was neither ashamed to suffer nor afraid to die. Nor does he leave us in doubt what it was that afforded him this solid comfort. It arose from his having committed himself to the care of Christ, whom he loved, and served, and believed in, and of whom he had the firm persuasion that he was able to perform the part of a Saviour. This was the ground of his confidence. It rested on a rational and sure basis, which long experience has shewn can never be moved.]

What must we commit to Christ? Why, the salvation of our souls, and their preservation to the heavenly kingdom; and what we so commit to him he will keep. There is a day coming when our souls will be inquired after: "Man! woman! thou hadst a soul committed to thee, what hast thou done with it?" To whom was it offered, to God or Satan? How was it employed; in the service of sin, or in the service of Christ? There is a day coming, and it will be a very solemn and awful day, when we must give an account of our stewardship, Lu. xvi. 2, give an account of our souls. Now if, by an active, obedient is spoken of as imparted to them from eternity, since that which God determined in eternity is as good as already accomplished in time" (Alford). Conybeare and Howson render "before the times of old," and say, "The grace of Christ was virtually bestowed on mankind in the Mosaic covenant, though only made manifest in the Gospel." "That which I have committed unto him:" the figure is that of one depositing a pledge with a trusted depositary. St. Paul had entrusted himself to God, and was confident of his preserving care.

faith, we commit it to Jesus Christ, we may be sure he is able to keep it, and it shall be forthcoming to our comfort in that day.

Thirdly, He exhorts him to "hold fast the form of sound words," ver. 13.

1. "Have a form of sound words," so it may be read. A short form, a catechism, an abstract of the first principles of religion, according to the Scriptures; a scheme of sound words, a brief summary of the Christian faith, in a proper method, drawn out by thyself from the holy Scriptures for thy own use; or rather, by the form of sound words, I understand the holy Scriptures themselves.

[This form of sound words which Timothy is exhorted to hold fast he had received from the apostle; "Which thou hast received of me." Was it a written compendium of Christian doctrine? If so, what has become of it? There is no trace of any such document ever having existed. What is called the apostle's creed has no pretension to an apostolic origin. Had there been such a summary, it is very improbable that it would have been lost; much more probable that it would have been regarded as inspired, and have been kept with great care among the other writings of the apostles. May not the expression refer to oral instruction which Timothy had received from Paul, in which the apostle had, no doubt, given him a general outline and summary of Christian truth?]

2. Having it, "hold it fast," remember it, retain it, stick to it. Adhere to that in opposition to all heresies and false doctrine, which corrupt the Christian faith. Hold that fast "which thou hast heard of me," Paul was Divinely inspired. It is good sticking to those forms of sound words which we have in the Scriptures, for those we are sure were Divinely inspired. That is sound speech which cannot be condemned, Ti. ii. 8. But how must it be held fast? "In faith and love;" that is, assent to it as "a faithful saying," and bid it welcome as "worthy of all acceptance." Hold it fast in a good heart, that is the ark of the covenant, in which the tables both of law and Gospel are most safely and profitably deposited, Ps. cxix. 11. Faith and love must go together. It is not enough to believe the sound words, and to give an assent to them; but we must love them, believe their truth, and love their goodness, and we must propagate the form of sound words in love, "speaking the truth in love," Eph. iv. 15. "Faith and love which is in Christ Jesus;" that is, it must be Christian faith and love, faith and love fastening upon Jesus Christ, in and by whom God speaks to us and we to him. Timothy, as a minister, must "hold fast the form of sound words" for the benefit of others. "Of healing words," so it may be read. There is a healing virtue in the word of God. "He sent his word and healed them." To the same purpose is that, ver. 14, "That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep by the Holy Ghost, which dwelleth in us." That good thing was the form of sound words, the Christian doctrine which was committed to Timothy in his baptism and education as he was a Christian, and in his ordination as he was a minister. The Christian doctrine is a trust committed to us; it is committed to Christians in general, but to ministers in particular; it is a good thing, of unspeakable value in itself, and that will be of unspeakable advantage to us. It is a good thing indeed, it is an inestimable jewel, for it discovers to us the unsearchable riches of Christ, Eph. iii. 8. It is committed to us to be preserved pure and entire, and to be transmitted to those that shall come after us, and we must keep it, and not contribute any thing to the corrupting of its purity, the weakening of its power, or the diminishing of its perfection. "Keep it by the Holy Ghost that dwelleth in us." Observe, Even those that are never so well taught cannot keep what they have learned, any more than they could at first learn it, without the assistance of the Holy Spirit. We must not think to keep it by our own strength, but "keep it by the Holy Ghost." The Holy Ghost dwells in all good ministers and Christians. They are his temples, and he enables them to keep the Gospel pure and uncorrupt; and yet they must use their best endeavours to keep this good thing, for the assistance and indwelling of the Holy Ghost doth not exclude men's endeavours, but they very well consist together.

15 This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes. 16 The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain: 17 But, when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me. 18 The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day: and in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

Having exhorted Timothy to "hold fast," &c., ver. 13, 14, the apostle mentions, First. The apostasy of divers from the doctrine of Christ, ver. 15. It seems in the best and purest ages of the church there were those that had embraced the Christian faith, and yet afterwards revolted from it; nay, there were many such. He doth not say that they were turned away from the doctrine of Christ, though it should seem they were, but they were turned away from him, turned their backs upon him, and disowned him in the time of his distress. And should we wonder at it, when many turned their backs on a much better than St. Paul? I mean the Lord Jesus Christ, Jno. vi. 66.

Secondly, He mentions the constancy of one that adhered to him, that was "Onesiphorus; for he often refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain," ver. 16. Observe,

1. What kindness Onesiphorus had shewed to Paul. He refreshed him; he often refreshed him with his letters, and counsels, and comforts, "and he was not ashamed of my chain;" was not ashamed of him, notwithstanding the disgrace he was now under. He was kind to him not once or twice, but often; not only when he was at Ephesus among his own friends, but when Onesiphorus was at Rome, he took care to seek Paul out very diligently, and found him, ver. 17. Observe, That a good man will seek opportunities of doing good, and will not shun any that offer. At Ephesus he had ministered to him, and been very kind to him; Timothy knew it.

2. How Paul returns his kindness, ver. 16—18. He that receives a prophet shall have a prophet's reward. He repays him with his prayers; The Lord give mercy unto Onesiphorus. It is like Onesiphorus was now absent, it is probable he was now with Paul, and he prays that his house might be kept during his absence; though the papists will have it he was now dead, and, from his praying for him that he might find mercy, they conclude the warrantableness of praying for the dead; but who told them that Onesiphorus was dead? And can it be safe to ground a doctrine and practice of such importance on a mere supposition, and very great uncertainty. He prays for Onesiphorus himself,

i. 16—18. The assumption that Onesiphorus was dead is quite gratuitous; the passage would equally agree with his absence from home (Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," Webster and Wilkinson; Fausset, "Portable Commentary").

ii. 2. "To faithful men;" Mack, the Romish commentator, adduces this passage as in favour of the reception of oral tradition; but it in truth rather shows how precarious such a method of preserving revealed truth would be, since the unfaithfulness of one individual as well as for his house, "that he might find mercy in that day," in the day of death and of judgment, when Christ will recount all the good offices done to his poor members as done to himself. Observe, 1st. The day of death and judgment is an awful day, that may be emphatically called "that day." 2nd. We need desire no more to make us happy than to find mercy of the Lord in that day, when those that have shewed no mercy will have judgment without mercy. 3rd. The best Christians will want mercy in that day, "looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ," Jude 21. 4th. If you would have mercy then you must seek for it now of the Lord. 5th. It is of and from the Lord we must have mercy, for unless the Lord hath mercy on us in vain will be the pity and compassion of men or angels. 6th. We are to seek and ask for mercy of the Lord, who is the giver and bestower of it, for the Lord Christ hath satisfied justice, that mercy might be displayed. We are come to a throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in the time of need. Finally, The best thing we can ask, either for ourselves or our friends, is, that the Lord will grant to them that they may find mercy of the Lord in that day, when they must pass out of time into eternity, and exchange this world for the other, and appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. The Lord then grant unto all of us that we may find mercy of the Lord in that day.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter our apostle gives Timothy many exhortations and directions, which may be of great use to others, both ministers and Christians, for whom they were designed as well as for him. 1. He encourages him in his work, shewing him from whence he must fetch help, ver. 1. II. He must take care of a succession in the ministry, that the office might not die with him, ver. 2. III. He exhorts him to constancy and perseverance in his work, as a soldier, and as a husbandman, considering what would be the end of all his sufferings, &c., ver. 3—15. IV. He must shun profane and vain babblings, for they will be pernicious and mischievous, ver. 16—18. V. He speaketh of the foundation of God, which standeth sure, ver. 19—21. VI. What he is to avoid—youthful lusts, and foolish and unlearned questions; and what to do, ver. 22—26.

THOU therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. 2 And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also. 3 Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. 4 No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier. 5 And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully. 6 The husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits. 7 Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

Here, First. Paul encourages Timothy to constancy and perseverance in his work; ver. 1, "Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Those that have work to do for God must stir up themselves to do it, and strengthen themselves for it. Being "strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus" may be understood, 1. In opposition to the weakness of grace. Where there is the truth of grace there must be a labouring after the strength of grace. As our trials increase we had need to grow stronger and stronger in that which is good; our faith stronger, our resolution stronger, our love to God and Christ stronger. 2. In opposition to our being strong in our own strength, be strong, not confiding in thy own sufficiency, but in the grace that is in Jesus Christ: compare Eph. vi. 10, "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." When Peter promised rather to die for Christ than to deny him, he was strong in his own strength; had he been strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, he had kept his standing better. [This exhortation to constancy is given to Timothy, all the rather because of the defection of others, (ct. i. 15; ii. 17, 18); "Thou therefore, my son, be strong." The falls of professors should be used as occasions by faithful ministers to exhort and encourage those who stand, to put them upon their guard, and to direct them to that grace which alone is able to uphold them.] 1st. There is grace in Christ Jesus, for the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ, Jno. i. 17. There is grace enough in him for all of us. 2nd. We must be strong in this grace, not in ourselves, in our own strength, or in the grace we have already received, but in the grace that is in him, and that is the way to be strong in grace. 3rd. As a father exhorts his son, so doth St. Paul exhort Timothy, with great tenderness and affection: "Thou therefore, my son," &c.

Secondly, Timothy must count upon sufferings, even unto blood. And, therefore,

1. He must train up others to succeed him in the ministry of the Gospel, ver. 2. 1st. He must instruct others, and train them up for the ministry, and so commit to them the things which he had heard. 2nd. He must ordain them to the ministry, lodge the Gospel as a trust in their hands, and so commit to them the things which he had heard. Two things he must have an eye to in ordaining ministers. First. Their fidelity and integrity; Commit them to "faithful men," that will sincerely aim at the glory of God, the honour of Christ, the welfare of souls, and the advancement of the kingdom of the redeemer among men. Secondly. Their ministerial ability. They must not only be knowing themselves, but be able to teach others also, and be apt to teach. [The things which Timothy was to commit to faithful men was, what he had heard from the apostle "among many witnesses." There is probably an allusion here to some occasion, perhaps when he was ordained, on which Paul publicly, might fatally affect its accuracy, and therefore we cannot be too thankful to God for his written word.

ii. 3. "Endure hardness;" rather, "take thy share in suffering" (Conybeare).

ii. 4. "Affairs of this life;" all occupations save those that are religious are not here forbidden, but the becoming "entangled" or overmuch taken up with them. St. Paul himself was a tent-maker.

ii. 5. "If any one contend in the games," or, as Conybeare, "the in the presence of the presbyters and the assembled church, gave the Gospel in charge to Timothy, expounding its doctrines to him before them, who were consequently witnesses of the trust reposed in him, and would know if he transmitted that trust with fidelity to others. Here we have, 1st. The things Timothy was to commit to others. What he had heard of the apostle among many witnesses; he must not deliver any thing besides, and what St. Paul delivered to him and others he had received of the Lord Jesus Christ. 2nd. He was to commit them as a trust, as a sacred depositum, which they are to keep, and to transmit pure and uncorrupt to others. 3rd. Those to whom he was to commit these things must be faithful; that is, trusty men, and who were skilful to teach others. 4th. Though men were both faithful and able to teach others, yet these things must be committed to them by Timothy, a minister, a man in office; for none must intrude themselves into the ministry, but must have these things committed to them by those already in that office.

2. He must "endure hardness;" ver. 3, "Thou therefore," &c. 1st. All Christians, but especially ministers, are soldiers of Jesus Christ; they fight under his banner, in his cause, and against his enemies, for he is the Captain of our salvation, Heb. ii. 10. 2nd. The soldiers of Jesus Christ must approve themselves good soldiers, faithful to their captain, resolute in his cause, and must not give over fighting till "they are made more than conquerors, through him that loved them," Rom. viii. 37. 3rd. Those that would approve themselves good soldiers of Jesus Christ must "endure hardness;" that is, we must expect it, and count upon it in this world, must endure and accustom ourselves to it, and bear it patiently when it comes, and not be moved by it from our integrity.

3. He must not entangle himself in the affairs of this world, ver. 4. A soldier, when he is listed, leaves his calling, and all the business of it, that he may attend his captain's orders. If we have given up ourselves to be Christ's soldiers, we must sit loose to this world, and though there is no remedy but we must employ ourselves in the affairs of this life, (while we are here we have something to do here,) yet we must not entangle ourselves with those affairs, so as by them to be diverted, and drawn aside, from our duty to God, and the great concerns of our Christianity. They that will war the good warfare must sit loose to this world, that we may please him who hath chosen us to be soldiers. Observe, The great care of a soldier should be to please his general; so the great care of a Christian should be to please Christ, to approve ourselves to him. Observe farther, The way to please him who hath chosen us to be soldiers is not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of this life, but to be free from such entanglements as would hinder us in our holy warfare.

4. We must see to it that in warring our spiritual warfare we go by rule, we observe the laws of war; ver. 5, "If a man strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully." We are striving for mastery, to get the mastery of our lusts and corruptions, to excel in that which is good, but we cannot expect the prize unless we observe the laws. In doing that which is good we must take care that we do it in a right manner, that our good may not be evil spoken of. We observe here, 1st. A Christian is to strive for masteries; he must aim at mastering his own lusts and corruptions. 2nd. Yet he must strive according to the laws given to him; he must strive lawfully. 3rd. Those that do so shall be crowned at last, after a complete victory is obtained.

5. We must be willing to wait for a recompence; ver. 6, "The husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits." Or, as it should be read, the husbandmen labouring first must partake of the fruits, as appears by comparing it with Jas. v. 7. If we would be partakers of the fruits we must labour; if we would gain the prize we must run the race. And, farther, we must first labour as the husbandman doth, with diligence and patience, before we are partakers of the fruit; we must do the will of God before we receive the promises, for which reason we have need of patience, Heb. x. 36.

Thirdly, Paul commands Timothy to consider these things that he admonished him about; ver. 7, "Consider what I say, and the Lord give thee understanding in all things." Timothy must be minded to use his considering faculties about the things of God. Consideration is as necessary to a good conversation as to a sound conversion. He prays for him; "The Lord give thee understanding in all things." Observe, 1. That it is God that gives understanding. The most intelligent men need more and more of this gift. If he that gave the revelation in the word doth not give the understanding in the heart, we are nothing. 2. Together with our prayers for others, that the Lord would give them understanding in all things, we must exhort and stir them up to consider what we say; for consideration is the way to understand, remember, and practise what we hear or read.

8 Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel: 9 Wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound. 10 Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory. 11 It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him: 12 If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny him, he also will deny us: 13 If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself.

First. To encourage Timothy in suffering, the apostle puts him in mind of the resurrection of Christ; ver. 8, "Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead according to my Gospel." This is the great proof of his Divine mission, and therefore a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian religion; and the consideration of it should make us faithful to our Christian profession, and should particularly encourage us in suffering for it. Let suffering saints remember this. Observe, 1. We are to look to "Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God," Heb. xii. 2. 2. The incarnation and resurrection of Jesus Christ, heartily believed, and rightly considered, will support a Christian under all sufferings in the present life.

This exhortation to remember the resurrection of Christ implies a tendency to forget it. Without great care to fix and retain it in the mind, it will slide, or be pushed out, by other things. But the habitual recollection of it will have the happiest effect in counteracting our latent unbelief and the secularising influence of worldly things. It will give stability to our faith in the Divine origin of Christianity, and in the Divine nature of our Lord; it will inspire confidence in him as a Saviour; it will produce heavenly-mindedness; and it will fix in our thoughts the certainty of the universal resurrection and the last judgment.]

Secondly. Another thing to encourage him in sufferings was, that he had Paul for an example; ver. 9, "Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer;" and let not Timothy the son expect any better treatment than Paul the father. Paul was a man that did good, and yet suffered as an evil-doer; we must not think it strange if those that do well fare ill in this world, and if the best of men meet with the worst of treatment; but this was his comfort, that the word of God is not bound. Persecuting powers may silence ministers, and restrain them, but they cannot hinder the operation of the word of God upon men's hearts and consciences; that cannot be bound by any human force. This might encourage Timothy not to be afraid of bonds for the testimony of Jesus; for the word of Christ, which ought to be dearer to him than liberty, or life itself, should in the issue suffer nothing by those bonds. Here we see, 1. The good apostle's treatment in the world; "I suffer trouble," to this he was called and appointed. 2. The pretence and colour under which he suffered; "I suffer as an evil-doer." So the Jews said to Pilate, concerning Christ, "If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up to thee," Jno. xviii. 30. 3. The real and true cause of his suffering trouble as an evil-doer; "Wherein," that is, in or for the sake of the Gospel. 4. The apostle suffered trouble unto bonds, and afterwards he "resisted unto blood, striving against sin," Heb. xii. 4. Though the preachers of the word are often bound, yet the word is never bound. "I endure all things for the elect's sakes," ver. 10. Observe, 1st. That good ministers may and should encourage themselves in the hardest services and the hardest sufferings with this, that God will certainly bring good to his church, and benefit to his elect, out of them, "that they may obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus." Next to the salvation of our own souls we should be willing to do and suffer any thing to promote the salvation of the souls of others. Observe, 2nd. The elect are designed to obtain salvation; "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation," 1 Thes. v. 9. Again, this salvation is in Christ Jesus, in him as the fountain, the purchaser, and giver of it, and it is accompanied with eternal glory; there is no salvation in Christ Jesus without it. 3rd. The sufferings of our apostle were for the elect's sake, for their confirmation and encouragement.

Thirdly. Another thing with which he encourages Timothy is, the prospect of a future state.

1. Those that faithfully adhere to Christ and to his truths and ways, whatever it costs them, will certainly have the advantage of it in another world; "If we be dead with him, we shall live with him," ver. 11; if in conformity to Christ we be dead to this world, and the pleasures, profits, and honours of it, we shall go to live with him in a better world, to be for ever with him. Nay, though we be called out to suffer for him, we shall not lose by that. They that suffer for Christ on earth shall reign with Christ in heaven, ver. 12. They that suffered with David in his humiliation were preferred with him in his exaltation; so it will be with the Son of David.

2. It is at our peril if we prove unfaithful to him; "If we deny him, he also will deny us." If we deny him before man, he will deny us before his Father, Mat. x. 33; and that man must needs be for ever miserable whom Christ disowns at last. This will certainly be the issue, whether we believe it or no; ver. 13, "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful; he cannot deny himself." Faithful to his threatenings, faithful to his promises; neither one nor the other shall fall to the ground, no, not the least jot or tittle of them. If we be faithful to Christ he will certainly be faithful to us; if we be false to him he will be faithful to his threatenings; "He cannot deny himself," cannot recede from any word that he hath spoken, for he is Yea and Amen, the faithful witness.

Observe, 1st. Our being dead with Christ precedes our living with him, and is connected with it, and the one is in order to the other; so our suffering for him is the way to reign with him. "You that have followed me," in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, "ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Mat. xix. 28. 2nd. This is a faithful saying, and may be depended on, and ought to be believed. But, 3rd. If we deny him out of fear or shame, or for the sake of some temporal advantage, he will deny and disown us, and will not deny himself, but will continue faithful to his word when he threatens as well as when he promises.

14 Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers. 15 Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. 16 But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness. 17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymenæus and Philletus; 18 Who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.

Having thus encouraged Timothy to suffer, he comes in the next place to direct him in his work.

First. He must make it his business to edify those that were under his charge, for "put them in remembrance" of those things which they did already know, for that is the work of ministers; not to tell people that which they never knew before, but to put them in mind of that which they do know, "charging them that they strive not about words." Observe, Those that are disposed to strive commonly strive about matters of very small moment. Strifes of words are very destructive to the things of God. That they strive not about words "to no profit." If people did but consider of what little use most of the controversies in religion are, they would not be so zealous in their strifes of words, "to the subverting of the hearers," to the drawing them away from the great things of God, and occasioning unchristian heats and animosities, by which truth is often in danger of being lost.

[Men of a contentious and wrangling spirit are a great bane in the church; they contribute little or nothing to its edification, and often disturb its peace, ii. 10. The meaning is, "For this reason (which follows) I bear up against sufferings, with a view to forwarding the faith of God's elect, that they as well as myself," &c.

ii. 11-13. "Faithful is the saying;" the phrase with which St. Paul often introduces current Christian sayings (1 Tim. i. 15, iii. 1, iv. 9; Titus iii. 8). "Probably the utterances originally of the Spirit by those who spoke 'prophecies' in the church" (Alford). This "saying," like 1 Tim. iii. 16, appears from its rhythmical form to be part of wrestler does not win the crown unless he wrestles lawfully." The rules laid down must be observed, or the competitor is disqualified (John x. 1).

ii. 7. "The Lord will give thee understanding;" not a prayer, but an assertion. Timothy was not left to his own unaided efforts after wisdom; Divine help was promised to Christ's disciples.

ii. 8, 9. "My Gospel, wherein;" i.e., the Gospel entrusted to me to preach, in doing which I suffer," &c.

hinder its usefulness, and bring about its decay and dissolution. They mistake a bigoted attachment to their own modes of stating truth for zeal for the truth itself; and, while they are earnest in contending for what they call purity of doctrine, may often neglect and depreciate holiness of life, and shew little love for spiritual discourse, or social devotion. Again, there may be much talk about religion which tends to no profit; vain babbling, when it is not profane babbling. A few words spoken in love and sincerity are better than all the disputations and fluent discourse in which babbling and wrangling professors indulge.]

Observe, People are very prone to strive about words, and such strife never answers any other ends but to shake some and subvert others; they are not only useless, but they are very hurtful, and therefore ministers are to charge them that they do not strive about words, and then they are most likely to be regarded when they charge them before the Lord, that is, in his name and from his word, when they produce their warrant for what they say. "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, and to be accepted of him, and to shew that they are so approved unto God. In order thereto there must be constant care and industry; study to shew thyself such a one, 'a workman that needs not be ashamed.'" Ministers must be workmen, they have work to do, and they must take pains in it; workmen that are either unskilful, or unfaithful, or lazy, have need to be ashamed, but those that mind their business, and keep to their work, are workmen that need not be ashamed. And what is their work? It is rightly to divide the word of truth. Not to invent a new gospel, but rightly to divide the Gospel that is committed to their trust: to speak terror to those to whom terror belongs, comfort to whom comfort; to "give to every one their portion in due season," Mat. xxiv. 45. Observe here. 1. The word which ministers preach is the word of truth, for the author of it is the God of truth. 2. It requires great wisdom, study, and care, to divide this word of truth rightly. Timothy must study in order to do this well.

Secondly. He must take heed of that which would be a hindrance to him in his work, ver. 16. He must take heed of error; "Shun profane and vain babblings." The heretics, that boasted of their notions and their arguments, thought their performances such as might recommend themselves, but the apostle calls them "profane and vain babblings." And when once men take to be fond of such, they will increase unto more ungodliness. The way of error is down-hill; one absurdity being granted or contended for, a thousand follow. "Their word will eat as doth a canker," or gangrene; that is, when errors or heresies come into the church, the infecting of one often proves the infecting of many, or the infecting of the same person with one error often proves the infecting of him with many errors. Upon this occasion the apostle instances some that had lately advanced erroneous doctrines—Hymeneus and Philetus. He names these corrupt teachers, by which he sets a brand upon them, to their perpetual infamy, and warns all people against hearkening to them; they have erred concerning the truth, that is, concerning one of the fundamental articles of the Christian religion, which is truth. The resurrection of the dead is one of the great doctrines of Christ. Now see the subtlety of the serpent, and the serpent's seed. They did not deny the resurrection, for that had been boldly and avowedly to confront the word of Christ, but they put a corrupt interpretation upon that true doctrine, saying, that the resurrection is past already, that is, that what Christ spoke concerning the resurrection is to be understood mystically, and by way of allegory, that it must be meant of a spiritual resurrection only. It is true there is a spiritual resurrection, but from thence to infer that there will not be a true and real resurrection of the body at the last day is to dash one truth of Christ in pieces against another. By this they "overthrew the faith of some," that is, took them off from the belief of the resurrection of the dead; and if there be no resurrection of the dead, no future state, no recompence of our services and sufferings in another world, we are of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. xv. 19. What takes away the doctrine of a future state overthrows the faith of Christians. The apostle had largely disproved this error, 1 Cor. xv., and therefore doth not here enter into the arguments against it. 1st. The babblings Timothy was to shun were profane and vain, they were empty shadows, and led to profaneness, "for they will increase unto more ungodliness." 2nd. Error is very fruitful and productive, and on that account the more dangerous; it will eat like a gangrene. 3rd. When men err concerning the truth, they always endeavour to have some plausible pretence for it; Hymeneus and Philetus did not deny a resurrection, but pretended it was already past. 4th. Error, especially that affects the foundation, will overthrow the faith of some.

19 Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that a hymn. "The Greek may be easily sung to the music of one of the ancient ecclesiastical chants" (Conybeare). "If we died with him:" a past event spoken of (Rom. vi. 3, 4, 8; Col. ii. 12.) "The death which takes place at baptism in all those who are his" (Alford). "He cannot deny himself;" "Three things are impossible to God—to die, to lie, and to be deceived" (Augustine).

ii. 19. "Nevertheless the firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal" (Alford, Ellicott); not as the Authorised Ver-are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity. 20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour. 21 If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work.

Here we see what we may comfort ourselves with in reference to this, and the like errors and heresies, that both infect and infest the church, and do mischief.

First. It may be a great comfort to us that the unbelief of men cannot make the promise of God of none effect. Though the faith of some particular persons be overthrown, yet "the foundation of God standeth sure," ver. 19; it is not possible they should deceive the elect. Or it may be meant of the truth itself which they do impugn. All the attacks which the powers of darkness have made upon the doctrine of Christ cannot shake it; it stands firm, and weathers all the storms which have been raised against it. The prophets and apostles, that is, the doctrine of the Old and New Testament, is still firm, and this hath a seal with two mottoes upon it, one on the one side and the other on the other, as is usual in a broad seal. 1. One speaks our comfort, that "the Lord knoweth them that are his," and them that are not; knows them, that is, he owns them, so knows them that he will never lose them. Though the faith of some be overthrown—yet the Lord is said to "know the ways of the righteous," Ps. i. 6—yet not the faith of any whom God hath chosen. 2. Another speaks our duty, that every one that names the name of Christ must depart from iniquity. Those that would have the comfort of the privilege must make conscience of the duty. If the name of Christ be called upon by us, we must depart from iniquity, else he will not own us; he will tell us in the great day, Mat. vii. 23, "Depart from me, I never knew you, ye workers of iniquity." Observe, 1st. Whatever errors are introduced into the church, the foundation of God standeth sure, his purpose can never be defeated. 2nd. God hath some in the church which are his, and which he knows to be his. 3rd. Professing Christians name the name of Christ, are called by his name, and therefore are bound to depart from iniquity, for Christ gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, Tit. ii. 14.

Secondly. Another thing that may comfort us is that, though there be some whose faith is overthrown, yet there are others who keep their integrity, and hold it fast; ver. 20. "In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver." &c. The church of Christ is a great house, a well furnished house; now the furniture of this house is some of it of great value, as the plate in a house; some of small value, and put to mean uses, as the vessels of wood and earth; so it is in the church of God. There are some professors of religion that are like the vessels of wood and earth, they are vessels of dishonour; but at the same time all are not vessels of dishonour, there are "vessels of gold and silver" that are vessels of honour, "that are sanctified and meet for the master's use." When we are discouraged by the badness of some, we must encourage ourselves by the consideration of the goodness of others. Now we should see to it that we be vessels of honour: we must "purge ourselves from these corrupt opinions," that we may be sanctified for our Master's use.

[Would you attain to honour and usefulness in the church? Then be careful what doctrines you hold, what spirit you indulge, what company you keep. Reject all heretical perversions of the truth. Suppress every disposition for mere verbal strife, and unprofitable debate about forms of phraseology, and eschew the company of empty talkers and contentious wranglers. These are things from which a man must purge himself who would be a vessel unto honour.]

Observe, 1. In the church there are some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour; there are some vessels of mercy, and other vessels of wrath, Rom. ix. 22, 23. Some dishonour the church by their corrupt opinions and wicked lives, and others honour and credit it by their exemplary conversation. 2. A man must purge himself from these before he can be a vessel of honour, or meet for his Master's use. 3. Every vessel must be fit for his Master's use; every one in the church, whom God approves, must be devoted to his Master's service, and meet for his use. 4. Sanctification in the heart is our preparation for every good work. The tree must be made good, and then the fruit will be good.

22 Flee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart. 23 But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes. 24 And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, 25 In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth; 26 And that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

First. Timothy must take care of youthful lusts, ver. 22. Though he was a holy, good man, very much mortified to the world, yet Paul thought it necessary to caution him against youthful lusts: Flee them, take all possible care and pains to keep thyself pure from them. The lusts of the flesh are youthful lusts, which young people must carefully watch against, and the best must not be secure. He prescribes an excellent remedy against youthful lusts: "Follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace," &c. Observe, 1. Youthful lusts are very dangerous, for which reason even hopeful young people should be warned of them, for they war against the soul, 1 Pet. ii. 11. 2. That the exciting of our sion. The foundation signifies, according to some, the doctrine of the resurrection; others, the promises of God; others, "the congregation of the faithful considered as the foundation of a building laid by God, the house spoken of in the next verse" (Alford); if so, the words "having this seal" would refer to the practice of engraving inscriptions over doors or on foundation-stones.

ii. 22. There should be no comma after "peace." "Out of a pure heart:" a distinction thus made between single-minded worshippers graces will be the extinguishing of our corruptions; the more we follow that which is good, the faster and the farther we shall flee from that which is evil. Righteousness, and faith, and love, will be excellent antidotes against youthful lusts. Holy love will cure impure lust. Follow peace with them that call on the Lord. The keeping up of the communion of saints will take us off from all fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness. See the character of Christians; they are such as "call on the Lord Jesus Christ, out of a pure heart." Observe, Christ is to be prayed to. It is the character of all Christians that they call upon him; but our prayers to God and Christ are not acceptable or successful except they come out of a pure heart.

Secondly. He cautions him against contention; and to prevent that, ver. 23, cautions him against "foolish and unlearned questions," that tend to no benefit, strifes of words. They that advanced them and doted upon them thought themselves wise and learned, but Paul calls them foolish and unlearned. The mischief of these is that they do "gender strifes," that is, that they breed debates and quarrels among Christians and ministers. It is very remarkable how often, and with what seriousness, the apostle cautions Timothy against the disputes in religion, which surely was not without some such design as this, to shew us that religion consisteth more in believing and practising what God requires than in subtle disputes. Now "the servant of the Lord must not strive," ver. 24. Nothing worse becomes the servant of the Lord Jesus, (who did not strive nor cry, Mat. xii. 19, but was himself a pattern of meekness and mildness, and gentleness to all,) than strife and contention. The servant of the Lord must be "gentle unto all men," and thereby shew that he is himself subject to the commanding power of that holy religion which he is employed in preaching and propagating; apt to teach. Those are unapt to teach that are apt to strive, and are fierce and froward. Ministers must be patient, bearing with evil, and "in meekness instructing," ver. 25, not only those that subject themselves, but those that oppose themselves. Observe, 1. Those that oppose themselves to the truth are to be instructed, for instruction is the Scripture method of dealing with the erroneous,—that is more likely to convince them of their errors than fire and faggot; he does not bid us kill their bodies under pretence of saving their souls. 2. Such who oppose themselves are to be instructed in meekness; for our Lord is meek and lowly, Mat. xi. 29; and this agrees well with the character of the servant of the Lord, ver. 24, "He must not strive, but be gentle to all men, apt to teach, patient." This is the way to convey truth in its light and power, and to overcome evil with good, Rom. xii. 21. And that which ministers must have in their eye, in instructing those that oppose themselves, must be their recovery. "If God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth." Observe, 1st. That repentance is God's gift. 2nd. It is a gift with a peradventure, in the case of those that oppose themselves; and therefore, though we are not to despair of the grace of God, yet we must take heed of presuming upon it. "To the acknowledging of the truth." 3rd. The same God who gives us the discovery of the truth doth, by his grace, bring us to the acknowledging of it, otherwise our hearts would continue in rebellion against it, for we are to confess with our mouths, as well as to believe with our hearts, Rom. x. 9, 10. And thus sinners recover themselves out of the snare of the devil; see here, ver. 26. First. The misery of sinners. They are in the "snare of the devil," and are led "captive by him at his will;" they are slaves to the worst of taskmasters, he is the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2. They are taken in a snare, and in the worst snare, because it is the devil; they are as fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare. Farther, they are under Ham's curse, "a servant of servants shall he be," Gen. ix. 25; they are slaves to him who is but a slave and vassal. Secondly. The happiness of those that repent. They recover themselves out of this snare, as a bird out of the snare of the fowler; the snare is broken, and they have escaped, and the greater the danger the greater the deliverance. When sinners repent, they who before were led captive by the devil at his will, come to be led into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and have their wills melted into the will of the Lord Jesus. The good Lord recover us all out of the snare.

CHAPTER III.

I. He foretells Timothy what the last days would be, with the reasons thereof, ver. 1—9. II. Prescribes various remedies against them, ver. 10—17, particularly his own example, "But thou hast fully known my doctrine," &c., and the knowledge of the holy Scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation, and will be the best antidote against the corruptions of the times we live in. In this chapter Paul tells Timothy how bad others would be, and therefore how good he should be; and this use we should make of the badness of others, thereby to engage us to hold our own integrity so much the faster.

THIS know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. 2 For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, 3 Without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, 4 Traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; 5 Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away.

Timothy must not think it strange if there were in the church bad men, for the net of the Gospel was to inclose both good fish and bad, Mat. xiii. 47, 49. Jesus Christ had foretold, Mat. xxiv. 24, that there would come seducers, and therefore we must not be offended at it, nor think the worse of religion, or the church, for it. Even in gold ore there will be dross, and a great deal of chaff among the wheat when it lies on the floor.

of Christ and those who pretended godliness for gain or other interested motives. With such we cannot be at peace, in its highest sense of perfect agreement and communion; we may love them, but must oppose their aims and teachings (Rom. xii. 18).

ii. 26. "At his will:" or, "so as to follow his will."

iii. 1. "The last days:" the days of the Gospel dispensation, as distinguished from the Mosaic (Acts ii. 17; Heb. i. 2; 1 Peter i. 20).

First. Timothy must know that in "the last days," ver. 1, that is, in gospel times, there would come "perilous times." Though gospel times were times of reformation in many respects, let him know that even in gospel times there would be perilous times, not so much on the account of persecutions from without as on the account of corruptions within. These would be difficult times, wherein it would be difficult for a man to keep a good conscience. He doth not say, perilous times shall come, for both Jews and Gentiles shall be combined to root out Christianity; but, perilous times shall come for such who have "the form of godliness," ver. 5, shall be corrupt and wicked, and do a great deal of damage to the church. Two traitors within the garrison may do more hurt to it than two thousand besiegers without. "Perilous times shall come," for men shall be wicked. Note, 1. Sin makes the times perilous. When there is a general corruption of manners, and of the tempers of men, that makes the times dangerous to live in, for it is hard to keep our integrity in the midst of general corruption. 2. The coming of perilous times is an evidence of the truth of Scripture predictions. If the event in this respect did not answer the prophecy, we might be tempted to question the divinity of the Bible. 3. We are all concerned to know this, to believe and consider it, that we may not be surprised when we see the times perilous: "This know also."

Secondly. Then he tells Timothy what would be the occasion of making these times perilous, or what shall be the marks and signs whereby these times may be known, ver. 2, and following verses.

1. Self-love will make the times perilous. Who is there that doth not love himself? but this is meant of an irregular, sinful, self-love. Men love their carnal selves better than their spiritual selves. Men love to gratify their own lusts, and make provision for them, more than to please God and do their duty. Instead of Christian charity, that takes care for the good of others, they will mind themselves only, and prefer their own gratification before the church's edification.

2. Covetousness. Observe, Self-love brings in a long train of sins and mischiefs. When men are lovers of themselves no good can be expected from them, as all good may be expected from those that love God with all their hearts. When covetousness generally prevails, and every man is for what he can get, and keeping what he hath, this makes men dangerous to one another, and obliges every man to stand on his guard against his neighbour.

3. Pride and vainglory make the times perilous. When men, being proud of themselves, are boasters and blasphemers,—boasters before men whom they despise and look upon with scorn, and blasphemers of God, and of his name; when men do not fear God they will not regard man, and so vice versa.

4. When children are disobedient to their parents, and break through the obligations which they lie under to them both in duty and gratitude, and frequently in interest, having their dependence upon them, and their expectation from them, that makes the times perilous; for what wickedness will they stick at that will be abusive to their own parents, and rebel against them?

5. Unthankfulness and unholiness make the times perilous, and those two commonly go together. What is the reason that men are unholy and without the fear of God, but that they are unthankful for the mercies of God? Ingratitude and impiety go together; for, call a man ungrateful, and you can call him by no worse name. Unthankful and impure, defiled with fleshly lusts, which is an instance of great ingratitude to that God who hath provided so well for the support of the body; but we abuse his gifts if we make them the food and fuel of our lusts.

6. The times are perilous when men will not be held by the bonds either of nature or common honesty; when they are "without natural affection, and truce-breakers," ver. 3. There is a natural affection due to all. Wherever there is the human nature there should be humanity towards those of the same nature, but especially between relations. Times are perilous when children are disobedient to their parents, ver. 2, and when parents are without natural affection to their children, ver. 3. See what a corruption of nature sin is, how it deprives men even of that which nature hath implanted in them for the support of their own kind; for the natural affection of parents to their children is that which contributes very much to the keeping of mankind upon the earth. And those that will not be bound by natural affection, no marvel they will not be bound by the most solemn leagues and covenants. They are truce-breakers, that make no conscience of the engagements they have laid themselves under. Again, the times are perilous when men are false accusers one of another, διδόκοι,—"devils" one to another, no regard had to the good name of others, nor to the religious obligations of an oath, but think themselves at liberty to say and do what they please, Ps. xii. 4.

7. When men have no government of themselves and their own appetites. Not of their own appetites, for they are incontinent; not of their own passions, for they are fierce. Have no rule over their own spirits, and therefore are like a city that is broken down and hath no walls; they are soon fired upon the least provocation.

8. When that which is good and ought to be honoured is generally despised and looked upon with contempt. It is the pride of persecutors that they look with contempt upon good people, though they are more excellent than their neighbours.

9. When men are generally treacherous, wilful, and haughty, the times are perilous; ver. 4, when men are "traitors, heady, highminded." Our Saviour hath foretold that the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son, Mat. x. 21; and those are the worst sort of traitors. Those that delivered up their Bibles to persecutors were called traditores, for they betrayed the trust committed to them. When men are petulant and puffed up, carrying it scornfully to all about them, and when this temper generally prevails, then the times are perilous.

10. When men are generally "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God," when there are more epicures than true Christians, then the times are bad indeed. God is to be loved above all; that is a carnal mind, and is full of enmity against him, which prefers any thing before him, especially such a sordid thing as carnal pleasure is.

11. All this notwithstanding, all these have the "form of godliness," ver. 5; that is, are called by the Christian name, baptized into the Christian faith, make a show of religion; but, how plausible soever their form of godliness is, they deny the power of it. When they take upon them the form, which should and would bring along with it the power thereof, they will put asunder what God hath joined together. They will assume the form of godliness to take away their reproach, but they will not submit to the power of it to take away their sin. Observe here, 1st. Men may be very bad and wicked under a profession of religion; they may be lovers of themselves, &c., yet have a form of godliness. 2nd. A form of godliness is a very different thing from the power of it; men may have the one, and be wholly destitute of the other; yea, they deny it, at least practically, in their lives. 3rd. From such good Christians must withdraw themselves.

6 For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, iii. 2. Not "covetous" in a general sense, but "lovers of money."

iii. 6. "Laden with sins:" this is the reason they fall a prey so easily to those false teachers who promise them ease of conscience if they will obey them. "Divers lusts:" not only those leading to a vicious life, but the passion for change in doctrine and ritual; the love of novelty; "the running after fashionable men and fashionable tenets, which draw them in flocks in the most opposite and inconsistent directions" (Alford).

led away with divers lusts, 7 Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. 8 Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith. 9 But they shall proceed no further: for their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as their's also was.

Here Paul warns Timothy to take heed of certain seducers, not only that he might not be drawn away by them himself, but that he might arm those that were under his charge against their seduction.

First. He shews how industrious they were to make proselytes; ver. 6, they applied themselves to particular persons, visited them in their houses, not daring to appear openly, for they that do evil hate the light, Jno. iii. 20. They were not forced into houses, as good Christians often were by persecution, but they of choice crept into houses to insinuate themselves into the affections and good opinion of people, and so to draw them over to their party. And see what sort of people they were that they gained and made proselytes of; they were such as were weak, "silly women;" and such as were wicked, "laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts:" a foolish head, and a filthy heart, make persons, especially women, an easy prey to seducers.

Secondly. He shews how far they were from coming "to the knowledge of the truth," though they pretend to be "ever learning," ver. 7. In one sense we must all be ever learning, that is, growing in knowledge, following on to know the Lord, pressing forwards; but these were sceptics, giddy and unstable, that were forward to inhale every new notion, under pretence of advancement in knowledge, but never came to a right understanding of the truth as it is in Jesus.

Thirdly. He foretells the certain stop that should be put to their progress, ver. 8, 9. Comparing them to the Egyptian magicians that withstood Moses, they are here named Jannes and Jambres; though the names are not to be met with in the story of the Old Testament, yet they are found in some old Jewish writers. Moses came with a Divine commission to fetch Israel out of Egypt, these magicians opposed him, and thus those heretics resisted the truth, and, like them, were "men of corrupt minds;" men that had their understandings perverted, biassed, and prejudiced against the truth, and reprobate concerning the faith, that is, very far from being true Christians; but they shall proceed no farther, or not much farther, as some read it.

Observe, 1. Seducers seek for corners, and love obscurity; for they are afraid to appear in public, and therefore creep into houses. Farther, they attack those that are the least able to defend themselves; they are silly and wicked women. 2. Seducers in all ages are much alike, their characters are the same, "men of corrupt minds;" &c., and their conduct much the same; they resist the truth, as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, and they will be alike in their disappointment. 3. Those that resist the truth are guilty of folly, yea, of egregious folly, for magna est veritas, et praevalabit—"great is the truth, and shall prevail." 4. Though the spirit of error may be let loose for a time, God hath it in a chain. Satan can deceive the nation and the churches no farther, nor any longer, than God will permit him. "Their folly shall be manifest:" that is, it shall appear that they are impostors, and every man shall abandon them.

[In these verses there can, I think, be no question that the apostle refers to the great apostasy of which he had spoken in his former epistle to Timothy, ch. iv., as well as in other parts of his writings, especially in 2 Thess. ii. A correspondence may, perhaps, be traced between some particular parts of his prophetic description and individual corrupt teachers, who, at all times, have arisen among the churches, and propagated doctrines subversive alike of religion and morality; but no impartial person can fail to see that in its entireness it suits exclusively the Romish priesthood, while to their principles, practices, and pretensions, it suits exactly. For it is with truth alleged against the system of popery, that, while it introduced new and impious doctrines, it subverted at the same time the foundation of morals, and openly inculcated and defended many of the worst vices by which human nature is disgraced. And this it did under the guise of an extraordinary sanctity, pleading the obligations of fidelity, chastity, and spirituality, to cover the perpetration of the foulest crimes. Its hypocrisy is consummate, and most determined and fierce has ever been its opposition to the truth. But it is doomed. The apostle, while he predicts its rise, and draws its character, foretells also its downfall. And these predictions may assure us that, since this great and terrible apostasy was permitted to take place, its whole course and developments have been, and still are, controlled, and shall issue in the ruin of its deluded votaries, and be the occasion of the more glorious manifestation and triumph of the true church of God.]

10 But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, longsuffering, charity, patience, 11 Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured: but out of them all the Lord delivered me. 12 Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. 13 But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

Here the apostle, to confirm Timothy in that way wherein he walked,

First. Sets before him his own example, which Timothy had been an eyewitness of, having long attended Paul; ver. 10, "Thou hast fully known my doctrine." The more fully we know the doctrine of Christ and the apostles, the more closely we shall cleave to it; and the reason why many sit loose to it is, because they do not fully know it. Christ's apostles had no enemies but those that did not know them, or not know them fully; those that knew them best loved and honoured them the most. Now, what is it that Timothy had so fully known in Paul?

1. The doctrine that he preached. Paul kept back nothing from his hearers, but declared to them "the whole counsel of God," Acts xx. 27; so that, if it were iii. 7. "Ever learning," &c.: from curiosity, having no real trust in anything, possessing a character of feverish instability, which prevents true spiritual progress.

iii. 8. "Men of corrupt minds, reprobate," &c.: see Rom. i. 28.

iii. 9. "No further;" it has been thought that this passage contradicts the assertion in chap. ii. 16. "There is no contradiction, for the present passage speaks of outward success, the former of inward deterioration" (Conybeare).

not their own fault, they might fully know it. Timothy had a great advantage in being trained up under such a tutor, and being apprized of the doctrine he preached.

2. He had fully known his conversation; Thou hast known my doctrine, and "manner of life;" and the manner of his life was of a piece with his doctrine, and did not contradict it. He did not pull down by his living what he built up by his preaching. Those ministers are likely to do good, and leave lasting fruits of their labours, whose manner of life agrees with their doctrine, as on the contrary those cannot expect to profit at all that preach well and live ill.

3. Timothy fully knew what was the great thing that Paul drove at, both in his preaching and in his conversation. Thou hast known my purpose; that is, what I drive at, how far it is from any worldly, carnal, secular design, and how sincerely I aim at the glory of God and the good of the souls of men.

4. Timothy fully knew Paul's good character, which he might gather from his doctrine, manner of life, and purpose; for he gave proofs of his faith, that is, of his integrity and fidelity, or, his faith in Christ, his faith concerning another world, by which Paul lived; his long-suffering towards the churches to which he preached, and over which he presided; his charity towards all men, and his patience. These were graces that Paul was eminent for, and Timothy knew it.

5. He knew that he had suffered ill for doing well; ver. 11, Thou hast fully known the "persecutions and afflictions which came unto me." He instances those only which happened to him while Timothy was with him at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, and therefore let it be no surprise to thee if thou suffer hard things; it is no more than I have endured before.

ICONIUM (KONIAH).

6. He knew what care God hath taken of him; Notwithstanding "out of them all the Lord delivered me;" as he never failed his cause, so his God never failed him. Thou hast fully known my afflictions. When we know the afflictions of good people but in part, they are a temptation to us to decline that cause which they suffer for; when we only know the hardships they undergo for Christ, we may be ready to say, We will depart from that cause that is like to cost us so dear in the owning of it; but when we fully know the afflictions, not only how they suffer, but how they are supported and comforted under their sufferings, then instead of being discouraged we shall be encouraged by them, especially considering that we are told before that we must count upon such things; ver. 12, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." Not always alike; at that time they that professed the faith of Christ were more exposed to persecution than at other times, but at all times, more or less, they "that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." They must expect to be despised, and that their religion will stand in the way of their preferment; they that will live godly must expect it, especially they that will "live godly in Christ Jesus," that is, according to the strict rules of the Christian religion, will wear the livery and bear the name of the crucified Redeemer; all that will shew their religion in their conversation, that will not only be godly but live godly, let them expect persecution, especially when they are resolute in it.

Observe, 1st. The apostle's life was very exemplary to, three things: for his doctrine, which was according to the will of God; for his life, which was agreeable to his doctrine; and for his persecutions and sufferings. 2nd. Though his life was a life of great usefulness, yet it was a life of great sufferings, and none I believe came nearer to their great Master for eminent service and great sufferings than St. Paul; he suffered almost in every place: the Holy Ghost witnessed that bonds and afflictions did abide him, Acts xx. 23. Here he mentions his persecutions and afflictions at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, besides what he suffered elsewhere. 3rd. The apostle mentions the Lord's delivering him out of all for Timothy's and our encouragement under sufferings. 4th. We have the practice and treatment of true Christians; they live godly in Jesus Christ,—that is their practice; and they shall suffer persecution,—that is the usage they must expect in this world.

Secondly. He warns Timothy of the fatal end of seducers as a reason why he should stick close to the truth as it is in Jesus; ver. 13, "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse." &c. Observe, That as good men by the grace of God grow better and better, so bad men, through the subtlety of Satan, and the power of their own corruptions, grow worse and worse. The way of sin is down-hill, for such proceed from bad to worse, "deceiving and being deceived." Those that deceive others do but deceive themselves; those that draw others into error, run themselves into more and more mistakes, and they will find it so at last to their cost.

14 But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; 15 And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith

iii. 11. Lystra and Derbe are generally mentioned together (Acts xiv. 6, xvi. 1), here only Lystra; and a reference to the history of St. Paul's journeys shews that he suffered no persecution at Derbe.

iii. 15. "Wise unto salvation;" "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite to salvation" (Art. VI. "Book of Common Prayer").

which is in Christ Jesus. 16 All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: 17 That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

First. He directs him to keep close to a good education, and particularly to what he had learned out of the holy Scriptures; ver. 14, 15, "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned." Note, It is not enough to learn that which is good, but we must continue in it, and persevere in it unto the end; "Then are we Christ's disciples indeed," Jno. viii. 31. We should not be any more children, "tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive," Eph. iv. 14: "Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines, for it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace," Heb. xiii. 9. And for this reason we should continue in the things we have learned from the holy Scriptures; not that we ought to continue in any errors and mistakes which we may have been led into in the time of our childhood and youth, for these, upon an impartial inquiry and full conviction, we should forsake; but this makes nothing against our continuing in those things the holy Scriptures plainly assert, and which he that runs may read.

Secondly. If Timothy would stick to the truth as he had been taught it, that would arm him against the snares and insinuation of seducers. They are "the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of."

1. It is a great happiness to know the certainty of the things wherein we have been instructed, Lu. i. 4; not only to know what the truths are, but to know that they are of undoubted certainty. What we have learned we must labour to be more and more assured of; that, being grounded in the truth, we may be guarded against error, for certainty in religion is of great importance and advantage. Knowing, 1st. That thou hast had good teachers: "Consider of whom thou hast learned them." Not of evil men and seducers, but good men, that had themselves experienced the power of the truths they taught thee, and been ready to suffer for them, and thereby would give the fullest evidence of their belief of these truths. 2nd. Knowing especially the firm foundation upon which thou hast built, namely, that of the Scripture; ver. 15, "That from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures."

2. Those that would acquaint themselves with the things of God, and be assured of them, must know the holy Scriptures, for those are the summary of Divine revelation.

3. It is a great happiness to know the holy Scriptures from our childhood, and children should betimes get the knowledge of the Scriptures. The age of children is the learning age, and those that would get true learning must get it out of the Scriptures.

[Timothy enjoyed the inestimable advantage of having a pious mother, and she, with his no less pious grandmother also, early taught him to read the Bible; and doubtless, as he read, unfolded to him its meaning, and aimed to impress its truths upon his heart. It is impossible to say at how early a period the infantile mind may receive a saving knowledge of the word of God; but parents cannot begin too young the practice of reading to them and with them its sacred pages. This is one of the first and most important of parental obligations, and it cannot be neglected without criminality. At the same time discretion is needed to guide in the selection of proper portions of Scripture, suited to the youthful capacity, and to prevent the sacred book ever appearing in a repulsive light. We may regard the apostle's notice of Timothy's early acquaintance with the Scriptures as a commendation of his parents; and if parents ourselves, we should be stimulated by it to imitate their excellent example.]

4. The Scriptures we are to know are the holy Scriptures. They came from the holy God, and were delivered by holy men, and contain holy precepts, and treat of holy things, and were designed to make us holy, and to lead us in the way of holiness to happiness. Being called the holy Scriptures, they are by that distinguished from profane writings of all sorts, and from those that only treat of morality and common justice and honesty, but do not meddle with holiness. If we would know the holy Scriptures we must read and search them daily, as the noble Bereans did, Acts xvii. 11; they must not lie by us neglected, and seldom or never looked into. Now here observe,

1st. What is the excellency of the Scripture. It is "given by inspiration of God," ver. 16, and therefore is his word. It is a Divine revelation, which we may depend upon as infallibly true. The same Spirit that breathed reason into us breathes revelation among us; for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men spake as they were moved or carried forth by the Holy Ghost, 2 Pet. i. 21. The prophets and apostles did not speak from themselves, but what they received of the Lord that they delivered unto us. That the Scripture was given by inspiration of God appears by the majesty of its style, and the truth, purity, and sublimity of the doctrines contained in it; from the harmony of its several parts; from its power and efficacy on the minds of multitudes that converse with it; from the accomplishment of many prophecies relating to things beyond all human foresight; and from the uncontrollable miracles that were wrought in proof of its Divine original, "God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will," Heb. ii. 4.

2nd. What use it will be of to us. First. It is able to make us wise to salvation; that is, it is a sure guide in our way to eternal life. Note, Those are wise indeed that are wise to salvation. The Scriptures are able to make us truly wise, wise for our souls and another world; "To make thee wise to salvation through faith." Observe, The Scriptures will make us wise to salvation, if they be mixed with faith, and not otherwise, Heb. iv. 2; for if we do not believe their truth and goodness they will do us no good.

Secondly. It is profitable to us for all the purposes of the Christian life, "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." It answers all the ends of Divine revelation; it instructs us in that which is true, reproves us for that which is amiss, directs us in that which is good. It is of use to all, for we all need to be instructed, corrected, and reproofed; and whence can they fetch it better than from the Scripture? "That the man of God may be perfect," ver. 17. The Christian, the minister, is the man of God. That which finishes a man of God in this world is the Scripture: by it we are "thoroughly furnished for every good work." There is that in the Scripture which suits every case. Whatever duty we have to do, whatever service is required from us, we may find enough in the Scriptures to furnish us for it. 1st. We see the Scripture hath various uses, and answers divers ends and purposes; it is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction of all errors in judgment and practice, and for instruction in righteousness. 2nd. The Scripture is a perfect rule of faith and practice, and was designed for the man of God, the minister, as well as the Christian who is devoted to God, for it is profitable for doctrine, &c. 3rd. If we consult the Scripture that was given by inspiration of God, and follow its directions, we shall be made men of God, perfect, and thoroughly furnished to every good work. 4th. We farther learn there is no occasion for the writings of the philosophers, nor for rabbinical fables, nor popish legends, nor unwritten traditions, to make us perfect men of God, since the Scripture answers all these ends and purposes. O that we may love our Bibles more, and keep closer to them than ever, and then shall we find the benefit and advantage designed thereby, and shall at last attain the happiness therein promised and assured to us!

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter, I. St. Paul doth with great solemnity and earnestness press Timothy to the diligent and conscientious discharge of his work and office as an evangelist; and the charge given to him all gospel ministers are to take to themselves, ver. 1—5. II. The reason of his concern in this case. Why must Timothy now be instant in season, &c., in a particular manner? Because the church was likely to be deprived of the apostle's labours, for his departure was at hand, ver. 6—8. III. Divers particular matters, with a hint and caution about Alexander the coppersmith, ver. 9—15. IV. He informeth him of what befel him at his first answer: though men forsook him, the Lord stood by him, and that encouraged him to hope for future deliverance, ver. 16—18. And then he concludes with salutations and a benediction, ver. 19—22.

CHARGE thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; 2 Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all longsuffering and doctrine. 3 For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; 4 And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables. 5 But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry. 6 For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. 7 I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: 8 Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

Observe, First. How awfully this charge is introduced; ver. 1, "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and his kingdom." Observe, The best of men have need to be awed into the discharge of their duty. The work of a minister is not an indifferent thing, but absolutely necessary. Woe be to him if he preach not the Gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 16; "I charge thee," to induce him to faithfulness. He must consider,

1. That the eye of God and Jesus Christ was upon him. "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ:" that is, as thou tenderest the favour of God and Jesus Christ; as thou wilt approve thyself to God and Jesus Christ, by the obligations both of natural and revealed religion; as thou wilt make due returns to the God that made thee, and the Lord Jesus Christ that redeemed thee.

2. He charges him, as he will answer it at the great day, minding him of the judgment to come, which is committed to the Lord Jesus. He shall "judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and in his kingdom," that is, when he appears in his kingdom. It concerns all, both ministers and people, seriously to consider the account that they must shortly give to Jesus Christ, of all the trusts reposed in them. "Christ shall judge the quick and the dead;" that is, those that at the last day shall be found alive, and those that shall be raised to life out of the grave. Note, 1st. The Lord Jesus Christ shall judge the quick and dead. "God hath committed all judgment unto the Son," and hath appointed him judge of quick and dead, Acts x. 42. 2nd. He will appear. He will come the second time, and it will be a glorious appearance, as the word ἐπιφάνεια signifies. 3rd. Then his kingdom shall appear in his glory, "at his appearing and kingdom," for he will then appear in his kingdom, sitting on a throne to judge the world.

Secondly. What is the matter of the charge, ver. 2—5. He is charged, 1. To "preach the word." That is a minister's business; a dispensation is committed to them. It is not their own notions and fancies that they are to preach, but the pure, plain word of God, and they must not corrupt it, "but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God they speak in Christ," 2 Cor. ii. 17.

2. To urge what he preached, and to press it with all earnestness upon his hearers. "Be instant in season, out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort;" that is, do this work with all fervency of spirit. Call upon those under thy charge to take heed of sin, to do their duty. Call upon them to repent and believe, and live a holy life, and this both "in season and out of season." "In season"

iii. 16. "Inspiration:" "The inspiration gives the Divine sanction to all the words of Scripture, though those words be the utterances of the individual writer, and only in special cases revealed directly by God (1 Cor. ii. 13). . . . There are degrees of revelation in Scripture, but not of inspiration. The sacred writers did not always know the full significance of their own God-inspired words (1 Peter i. 10—12). Verbal inspiration does not mean mechanical dictation, but 'all Scripture is (so) inspired by God' that everything in it, its narratives, prophecies, citations, the whole—ideas, phrases, and words—are such as he saw fit to be there. The present condition of the text is no ground for concluding against the original text being inspired, but is a reason why we should use all critical diligence to restore the original inspired text. Again, inspiration may be accompanied by revelation or not, but it is as much needed for writing known doctrines or facts authoritatively, as for communicating new truths" (Tregelles).

that is, when they are at leisure to hear thee, when some special opportunity offers itself of speaking to them with advantage. Nay, do it "out of season," even when there is not that apparent probability of fastening something upon them; because thou dost not know but the Spirit of God may fasten upon them, for the wind bloweth where it listeth; and "in the morning we must sow our seed, and in the evening not withhold our hand," Ecc. i. 6. We must do it "in season," that is, let slip no opportunity; and do it "out of season," that is, we must not shift off the duty, under pretence that it is out of season."

3. He must tell people of their faults: "Reprove them, rebuke them;" convince wicked people of the evil and danger of their wicked courses. Endeavour, by dealing plainly with them, to bring them to repentance. Rebuke them with gravity and authority, in Christ's name, that they may take thy displeasure against them as an indication of God's displeasure.

4. He must direct, encourage, and quicken, those that began well. "Exhort them," persuade them to hold on, and endure to the end, and this "with all longsuffering and doctrine." 1st. He must do it very patiently; "with all longsuffering." If thou do not see the effect of thy labours presently, yet do not therefore give up the cause, be not weary of speaking to them; while God shews to them all longsuffering, let ministers exhort with all longsuffering. 2nd. He must do it rationally, not with passion, but "with doctrine;" that is, in order to the reducing of them to good practices, instil into them good principles. Teach them the truth as it is in Jesus, and reduce them to a firm belief of that, and that will be a means both to reclaim them from evil and to bring them to good. Observe, First. A minister's work hath various parts; he is to preach the word, to reprove, rebuke, and exhort. Secondly. He is to be very diligent and careful; he must be instant in season and out of season; he must spare no pains nor labour, but must be urgent with them to take care of their souls and their eternal concerns.

5. He must "watch in all things," that is, seek an opportunity of doing them a kindness; let no fair occasion slip through thy negligence. Watch to thy work; watch against the temptations of Satan, by which thou mayest be diverted from it; watch over the souls of those that are committed to thy charge.

6. He must count upon afflictions, and endure them, make the best of them. Κακοπάθειον,—endure patiently; be not discouraged by the difficulties thou meetest with, but bear them with an evenness of spirit. Inure thyself to hardships.

7. He must remember his office, and discharge that; "Do the work of an evangelist." The office of the evangelists was, as the apostle's deputies, to water the churches that they planted. They were not settled pastors, but for some time resided in, and presided over, the churches that the apostles had planted, till they were settled under a standing ministry. This was Timothy's work.

8. He must fulfil his ministry; "Make full proof of it." It was a great trust that was reposed in him, and therefore he must answer it, and perform all the parts of his office with diligence and care.

Observe, 1st. A minister must expect afflictions in the faithful discharge of his duty. 2nd. He must endure them, that is, bear them patiently like a Christian hero. 3rd. These must not discourage him in his work, for he must do his work and fulfil his ministry. 4th. The best way to make full proof of our ministry is to fulfil it, to fill it up in all its parts with proper work.

Thirdly. The reasons to enforce the charge to creep into the church, by which the minds of many professing Christians would be corrupted; ver. 3, 4, "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine." Therefore improve the present time, when they will endure it; be busy now, for it is seed time. When the fields are white unto the harvest, but in the sickle, for the present gale of opportunity will be soon over. "They will not endure sound doctrine;" there will be those that will "heap to themselves corrupt teachers, and will turn away their ears from the truth;" and therefore secure as many as thou canst, that when these storms and tempests do arise they may be well fixed, and their apostasy may be prevented. People must hear, and ministers must preach, for the time to come, and guard against the mischief that are likely to arise hereafter, though they do not yet arise. They will "turn away their ears from the truth," that is, they will grow sick of the old plain Gospel of Christ, and then they will be greedy of fables, and take pleasure in them, and God shall give them up to those strong delusions, because they received not the truth in the love of it, 2 Thes. ii. 11, 12. Observe, 1st. These teachers were of their own heaping up, and not of God's sending; but they chose them to gratify their lusts, and to please their itching ears. 2nd. People do so when they will not endure sound doctrine, that preaching which is searching, plain, and to the purpose; then they will have teachers of their own. 3rd. There is a wide difference between the word of God and the words of such teachers; the one is sound doctrine, the word of truth, the other is only fables. 4th. They that are turned unto fables first turn away their ears from the truth, for they cannot bear and mind both any more than they can serve two masters; nay, farther, it is said they shall be turned unto fables. God justly suffers them to turn to fables who grow weary of the truth, and gives them up to be led aside from the truth by fables.

2. Because Paul, for his part, had almost done his work. Do thou make full proof of thy ministry, "for I am now ready to be offered," ver. 6. And, 1st. Therefore there will be the more occasion for thee. When labourers are removed out of the vineyard, it is no time for them to loiter that are left behind, but to double their diligence. The fewer hands there are to work, the more industrious those hands must be that are at work. 2nd. I have done the work of my day and generation; do thou in like manner do the work of thy day and generation.

3. The comfort and cheerfulness of Paul in the prospect of his approaching departure might encourage Timothy to the utmost industry, and diligence, and seriousness in his work. Paul was an old soldier of Jesus Christ, Timothy was but newly enlisted. Come, saith Paul, I have found our Master kind, the cause good, and I can look back upon my warfare with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction, and therefore be not afraid of the difficulties thou must meet with. The crown of life is as sure to thee as if it were already upon thy head, and therefore endure afflictions, and make full proof of thy ministry. The courage and comfort of dying saints and ministers, and especially dying martyrs, is a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian religion, and a great encouragement to living saints and ministers in their work. Here,

1st. He looks forward upon his death approaching; "I am now ready to be offered." The Holy Ghost witnessed in every city that bonds and afflictions did abide him, Acts xx. 23. He was now at Rome, and it is probable he had particular intimations from the Spirit that there he should seal the truth with his blood; and he looks upon it now as near at hand. I am "already poured out," so it is in the original, ἤδη σπένδωμι; that is, I am already a martyr in affection. It alludes to the pouring out of the drink offerings; for the blood of the martyrs, though it was not a sacrifice of atonement, yet it was a sacrifice of acknowledgment to the honour of the grace of God and his truths. Observe with what pleasure he speaks of dying. He calls it his departure. Though it is probable he foresaw he must die a violent, bloody death, yet he calls it his departure, or his release. Death to a good man is his release from the imprisonment of this world, and his departure to the enjoyments of another world; he doth not cease to be, but is only removed from one world to another.

2nd. Observe with what pleasure he looks back upon the life he had lived; ver. 7, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course," &c. He therefore did not fear death, because he had the testimony of his conscience that, by the grace of God, he had in some measure answered the ends of living. As a Christian, as a minister, he had "fought the good fight." He had done the service, gone through the difficulties of his warfare, and had been instrumental in carrying on the glorious victories of the exalted Redeemer over the powers of darkness. His life was a course, and he had now finished it; as his warfare was accomplished, so his race was run. "I have kept the faith." I have kept the doctrines of the Gospel, and never betrayed any of them. Note, First. The life of a Christian, but especially of a minister, is a warfare, and a race; sometimes compared to the one in the Scripture, and sometimes to the other. Secondly. It is a good fight, a good warfare; the cause is good, and the victory is sure, if we continue faithful and courageous. Thirdly. We must fight this good fight, we must fight it out, and finish our course. We must not give over till we are made more than conquerors through him that hath loved us, Rom. viii. 37. Fourthly. It is a great comfort to a dying saint, when he can look back upon his past life, and say with our apostle, "I have fought," &c.; I have kept the faith, the doctrine of faith, and the grace of faith. Towards the end of our days to be able to speak in this manner, what comfort, unspeakable comfort, will it afford! Let it then be our constant endeavour, by the grace of God, that we may finish our course with joy, Acts xx. 24.

3rd. With what pleasure he looks forward to the life he was to live hereafter; ver. 8, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," &c. He had lost for Christ, but he was sure he should not lose by him, Phil. iii. 8. Let this encourage Timothy to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, that there is a crown of life before us, the glory and joy of which will abundantly recompense all the hardships and toils of our present warfare. Observe, It is called "a crown of righteousness," because it will be the recompense of our services, which God is not unrighteous to forget; and because our holiness and righteousness will there be perfected, and that will be our crown. God will give it as a righteous God, who will let none lose by him. And yet this crown of righteousness was not peculiar to Paul, as if it belonged only to apostles, and eminent ministers and martyrs, but to "all them also that love his appearing." Observe, It is the character of all the saints that they love the appearing of Jesus Christ. They love his first appearing, when he appeared to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself, Heb. ix. 26. They love to think of it; they love his second appearing at the great day; love it, and long for it. And those that love the appearing of Jesus Christ, he shall appear to their joy; there is a crown of righteousness reserved for them, which shall then be given them, Heb. ix. 28. We learn hence, First. The Lord is the righteous Judge, for his judgment is according to truth. Secondly. The believers' crown is a crown of righteousness, purchased by the righteousness of Christ, and bestowed as the reward of the saints' righteousness. Thirdly. This crown, which believers shall wear, is laid up for them; they have it not at present, for they are but heirs; they have it not in possession, and yet it is sure, for it is laid up for them. Fourthly. The righteous Judge will give it to all that love, prepare, and long for his appearing. "Surely I come quickly: Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus."

9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me: 10 For Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica; Crescens to Galatia, Titus unto Dalmatia. 11 Only Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for he is profitable to me for the ministry. 12 And Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus. 13 The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments. 14 Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil: the Lord reward him according to his works: 15 Of whom be thou ware also; for he hath greatly withstood our words.

Here are divers particular matters which Paul mentioned to Timothy now at this: closing of the epistle.

iv. 1. "I adjure thee before God and Christ Jesus, who shall judge the living and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom—his coming, at which we shall stand before him; his kingdom, in which we hope to reign with him" (Alford).

iv. 2. "In season, out of season;" see Ezek. ii. 4, 5. "For even as fountains, though none draw from them, flow on; and rivers, though none drink of them, still run; so must we also in speaking, though none give heed, thoroughly do our part" (Chrysostom, Hom. xxx).

iv. 5. "But thou be sober;" not as in Authorised Version, "watch." The Greek word signifies "be wary;" be cool and collected amidst the enemies of the faith.

iv. 7. Literally, "I have completed the glorious contest."
iv. 8. Not "a" but "the crown." "A man is justified by the merits of Christ through faith, and when he is so justified God accepts his works, and honours them with a reward which is not their due, but is given of grace" (Fausset, "Port. Com.").

First. He bids him hasten to him, if possible; ver. 9, "Do thy diligence to come shortly to me." For Timothy was an evangelist that was not a fixed pastor of any one place, but attended the motions of the apostles, to build upon their foundation. Paul wanted Timothy's company and help, and the reason he gives is, because several had left him, ver. 10; one from an ill principle, that was Demas, who abides under an ill name for it: "Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world." He quitted Paul and his interest, either for fear of suffering, (because Paul was now a prisoner, and he was afraid of coming into trouble upon his account,) or being called off from his ministry by secular affairs, which he entangled himself in, his first love to Christ and his Gospel was forsaken and forgotten, and he fell in love with the world. Note, Love to this present world is oftentimes the cause of apostasy from the truths and ways of Jesus Christ. He is gone off, is "departed unto Thessalonica;" called thither perhaps by trade, or by some other worldly business. Crescens is gone one way, and Titus another way, and only Luke was with Paul, ver. 10, 11; was not that enough? Paul did not think it so; he loved the company of his friends.

Secondly. He speaks respectfully concerning Mark. "He is profitable to me for the ministry." It is supposed this Mark was he about whom Paul and Barnabas fell out, Acts xv. 39. Paul would not take him with him to the work, because he had once flinched and drawn back. But now, saith he, take Mark and bring him with thee. By this it appears that Paul was now reconciled to Mark, and had now a better opinion of him than he had had formerly. This teaches us to be of a forgiving spirit; and those that are profitable and useful, though they may have done amiss, yet we must not therefore disclaim for ever making use of them.

Thirdly. Paul orders Timothy to come to him, bids him as he came through Troas to bring with him from thence those things which he had left behind him there, ver. 13. His cloak he had left there, which, it may be, Paul had the more occasion for in a cold prison. It is probable it was the habit that Paul usually wore, a plain dress. Some read it, 'the roll of parchment that I left at Troas;' others, 'the desk that I left.' Paul was guided by Divine inspiration, and yet he would have his books with him. Whereas he had exhorted Timothy to give attendance to reading, so he did himself, though he was now ready to be offered; as long as we live we must be still learning. "But especially the parchments," which some think were the originals of his epistles; others think they were the skins of which he made his tents, whereby he got a livelihood, working with his own hands.

Fourthly. He mentions Alexander, and the mischief that he had done him, ver. 14, 15. This is he that is spoken of Acts xix. 33. It should seem he had been a professor of the Christian religion, a forward professor, for he was there particularly maligned by the worshippers of Diana, and yet he did Paul much evil. Paul was in as much danger from false brethren, 2 Cor. xi. 26, as from open enemies. Paul foretels that God would reckon with him. It is a prophetic denunciation of the just judgment of God that would befall him. "The Lord will reward him according to his works." He cautions Timothy to take heed of him; "Of whom be thou aware also," that he do not, under pretence of friendship, betray thee to mischief. It is dangerous having any thing to do with those that would be enemies to such a man as Paul. Observe, 1. Some that were once Paul's hearers and admirers did not give him reason to remember them with much pleasure; for one forsook him, and another did him much evil, and greatly withstood his words. Yet, 2. At the same time he mentions some with pleasure, (the badness of some did not make him forget the goodness of others,) such as Timothy, Titus, Mark, and Luke. 3. The apostle hath left a brand on the names and memory of two persons; the one is Demas, who forsook him, having loved the present world, and the other is Alexander, who greatly withstood his words. 4. God will reward evil-doers, particularly apostates, according to their works. 5. Of such that are of Alexander's spirit and temper we should beware, for they will do us no good, but all the mischief that is in their power.

16 At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. 17 Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. 18 And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen. 19 Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus. 20 Erastus abode at Corinth: but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick. 21 Do thy diligence to come before winter. Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren. 22 The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen.

Here he, First. Gives Timothy an account of his own present circumstances.

1. He had lately been called to appear before the emperor, upon his appeal to Caesar, and then no man stood with him, ver. 16, to plead his cause, to bear testimony for him, or so much as to keep him in countenance, but all men forsook him. This was strange, that so good a man as Paul should have nobody to own him, even at Rome, where there were many Christians, whose faith was spoken of throughout all the world, Rom. i. 8. But men are but men. The Christians at Rome were forward to go and meet him, Acts xxviii. 15; but when it came to the pinch that they would be in danger of suffering with him, then they all forsook him. He prays that God would not lay it to their charge, intimating that it was a great fault, and God might justly be angry with them, but he prays God to forgive them. See what distinction is put between sins of presumption and sins of infirmity. Alexander the coppersmith, that maliciously withstood Paul, he prays against him, "The Lord reward him according to his works;" but these Christians that through weakness shrunk from Paul in time of trial, The Lord lay it not to their charge. Here we see, 1st. St. Paul had his trials in his friends forsaking him in a time of danger, as well as in the opposition made by enemies; all forsook him. 2nd. It was their sin not to appear for the good apostle, especially at his first answer; but it was a sin of weakness, and therefore the more excusable. Yet, 3rd. God might lay it to their charge, but St. Paul endeavours to prevent it by his earnest prayers: "Let it not be laid to their charge."

2. Notwithstanding this, God stood by him, ver. 17; that is, gave him extraordinary wisdom and courage, to enable him to speak so much the better himself. When he had nobody to keep him in countenance, God made his face to shine. "That by me the preaching might be fully known;" that is, God brought me out from that difficulty, that I might preach the Gospel, which is my business. Nay, it should seem that he might preach the Gospel at that time; for Paul knew how to preach at the bar as well as in the pulpit. "And that all the Gentiles might hear," the emperor himself, and the great men, that would never have heard Paul preach if he had not been brought before them. "And I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion," that is, of Nero, as some think, or some other judge. Some understand it only as a proverbial form of speech, to signify that he was in imminent danger. [Still, says Barnes, 'it is quite as natural to suppose, that the punishment which had been appointed for him, or to which he would have been subjected, was, to be thrown to lions, and that in some way, now unknown to us, he had been delivered from it; see 1 Cor. xv. 32.] "And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work." See how Paul improved his experiences; he that hath delivered doth deliver, and we trust, he shall yet deliver. "Shall deliver me from every evil work;" that is, from doing any ill myself, and having any ill done to me by others, "And shall preserve me to his heavenly kingdom." And for this he gives glory to God, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God. 1st. If the Lord stand by us, he will strengthen us in a time of difficulty and danger, and his presence will more than supply every one's absence. 2nd. When the Lord preserves his servants from great and imminent danger, it is for eminent work and service. Paul was preserved, that by him the preaching might be fully known, &c. 3rd. Former deliverances should encourage future hopes. 4th. There is a heavenly kingdom, to which the Lord will preserve his faithful, witnessing, or suffering servants. 5th. We ought to give God the glory of all past, present, and future deliverances; "To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

Secondly. He sends salutations to "Aquila, and Priscilla, and the household of Onesiphorus," ver. 19. He mentions his leaving Trophimus sick at Miletum, ver. 20, by which it appears that, though the apostles healed all manner of diseases miraculously, for the confirmation of their doctrine, yet they did not exert that power upon their own friends, lest it should have looked like a collusion.

Thirdly. He hastens Timothy to come to him before winter, ver. 21, because he longed to see him, and because in the winter the journey or voyage would be more dangerous.

Fourthly. He sends commendations to him from Eubulus, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren. One of the heathen writers at this time mentions one Pudens and his wife Claudia, and saith that Claudia was a Briton; whence some have gathered that it was this Pudens, and that Claudia here was his wife, and that they were eminent Christians at Rome.

Fifthly. He concludes with a prayer, that the Lord Jesus would be with his spirit. We need no more to make us happy than to have the Lord Jesus Christ with our spirits; for in him all spiritual blessings are summed up. And it is the best prayer we can put up for our friends, that the Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirits, to sanctify and save them, and at last to receive them to himself, as Stephen the protomartyr prayed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," Acts vii. 59; as if he had said, Lord Jesus, receive that spirit thou hast been with whilst it was united to the body; do not now leave it in its separate state. "Grace be with you. Amen." This was our apostle's token in every epistle; so he wrote, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen," 2 Thes. iii. 17, 18. And if grace be with us here to convert and change us, to make us holy, and to keep us humble, and to enable us to persevere to the end, glory will crown us hereafter; "For the Lord is a sun, and a shield, the Lord will give grace and glory, and no good will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee," Ps. lxxxiv. 11, 12. "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, our Saviour, be honour and glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

have thought this only an expression for great danger, some that it referred to Nero; but Alford and others argue with much force that the devil is meant. "The falling into the power of the tempter, the giving way, in his own weakness and the desertion of all, and betraying the Gospel for which he was sent as a witness" (Alford).

iv. 22. "With thy spirit:" "The third and highest part in man" (Ellicott).

iv. 13. "The mention of his 'cloak,' so far from being unworthy of inspiration, is one of those graphic touches which sheds a flood of light on the last scene of Paul's life, on the confines of two worlds; in this wanting a cloak to cover him from the winter cold, in that covered with the righteousness of the saints" (Gaussen).

iv. 14. "The Lord will reward him;" not a prayer, as in Authorised Version; so oldest MSS.

AN EXPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO TITUS, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

THIS epistle of Paul to Titus is much of the same nature with those to Timothy; both were converts of Paul, and his companions in labours and sufferings, both in the office of evangelists, whose work was to water the churches planted by the apostles, and to set in order the things that were wanting in them. They were vice-apostles, as it were, "working the work of the Lord, as they did," and mostly under their direction, though not despotic and arbitrary, but with the concurring exercise of their own prudence and judgment, 1 Cor. xvi. 10, 12. We read much of this Titus, his titles and character, and active usefulness in many places. He was a Greek, Gal. ii. 3; St. Paul called him his "son," ch. i. 4; his "brother," 2 Cor. ii. 13; his "partner and fellow-helper," 2 Cor. viii. 23; "one that walked in the same spirit, and in the same steps with himself." He went up with the apostle to the church at Jerusalem, Gal. ii. 1; was much conversant at Corinth, for which church he had an earnest care, 2 Cor. viii. 16. Paul's second epistle to them, and probably his first also, was sent by his hand, 2 Cor. viii. 16—18, 23; ix. 2—4; and xii. 18. He was with the apostle at Rome, and thence went into Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv. 10; after which no more occurs of him in the Scriptures. So that by them he appears not to have been a fixed bishop: if such he were, and in those times, the church of Corinth, where he most tended, had best title to him. In Crete, (now called Candia, formerly Hecatompolis, from the hundred cities that were in it,) a large island at the mouth of the Ægean Sea, the Gospel had got some footing; and here Paul and Titus were in one of their travels, cultivating this plantation; but the apostle of the Gentiles, having on him "the care of all the churches," could not himself tarry long at this place, therefore left Titus some time there to carry on the work which he had begun; wherein, probably meeting with more difficulty than ordinary, Paul wrote this epistle to him; and yet perhaps not so much for his own sake as for the people's, that the endeavours of Titus, strengthened with apostolic advice and authority, might be more significant and effectual among them. He was to see all the cities furnished with good pastors; to reject and keep out the unmeet and unworthy; to teach sound doctrine, and instruct all sorts in their duties; to set forth the free grace of God in man's salvation by Christ; and withal to shew the necessity of maintaining good works by those who have believed in God, and hope for eternal life from him.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have the preface or introduction to the epistle, shewing from and to whom it was written, with the apostle's salutation and prayer for Titus, wishing all blessings to him, ver. 1—4. Entrance into the matter, by signifying the end of Titus's being left at Crete, ver. 5. And how the same should be pursued, in reference both to good and bad ministers, from ver. 6—16.

PAUL, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness; 2 In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began; 3 But hath in due times manifested his word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour;

I. Here is the preface to the epistle. Shewing, First. The writer. Paul, a Gentile name, taken by the apostle of the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 9, 46, 47. Ministers will accommodate even smaller matters, so as they may be any furthering of acceptance in their work. When the Jews rejected the Gospel, and the Gentiles received it, we read no more of this apostle by his Jewish name, Saul, but by his Roman one, Paul. "A servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ." Here he is described by his relation and office. A servant of God, not in the general sense only, as a man and a Christian; but specially as a minister, "serving God in the Gospel of his Son," Rom. i. 9. This is a high honour. It is the glory of angels that they and "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be the heirs of salvation," Heb. i. 14. Yea, more especially a chief minister, "an apostle of Jesus Christ," one who had seen the Lord, and was immediately called and commissioned by him, and had his doctrine from him. Observe, The highest officers in the church are but servants. There is much divinity and devotion in the inscriptions of the epistles. The apostles of Jesus Christ, who were employed to spread and propagate his religion, were therein also the servants of God; they did not set up any thing inconsistent with the truths and duties of natural religion. Christianity, which they preached, was in order to clear and enforce those natural principles, as well as to advance them, and to superadd what was fit and necessary in man's degenerate and revolted state. Therefore the apostles of Jesus Christ were the servants of God. [There is too much honour here given to what is called natural religion. As to the expression "servant of God, and apostle of Jesus Christ," see on Rom. i. 1.] "According to the faith of God's elect." Their doctrine agreed with the faith of all the elect from the beginning of the world, and was for propagating and promoting of the same. Observe, There are elect of God, 1 Pet. i. 2, and in these the Holy Spirit works precious, Divine faith, proper to those who are chosen to eternal life; 2 Thes. ii. 13, 14, "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth; whereto he called you by our Gospel." Faith is the first principle of sanctification. "And the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness." The Gospel is truth: the great, sure, and saving truth: Col. i. 5, "the word of the truth of the Gospel." Divine faith rests not on fallible reasonings, or probable opinions, but on the infallible word, the truth itself, "which is after godliness;" that is, of a godly nature and tendency, pure, and purifying the heart of the believer. By this mark judge of doctrines and of spirits, whether they be of God or not; what is impure, and prejudicial to true piety and practical religion, cannot be of Divine origin. All gospel truth is after godliness, teaching and nourishing reverence and fear of God, and obedience to him. It is truth not only to be known, but acknowledged; it must be held forth in word and practice. Phil. ii. 15, 16; "With the heart man believes to righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation," Rom. x. 10. Such as retain the truth in unrighteousness neither know nor believe as they ought. To bring to this knowledge and faith, to the acknowledging and profession of the "truth which is after godliness," is the great end of the gospel ministry, even of the highest degree and order in it. Their teachings should have this chief aim, namely, to beget faith and confirm in it; ver. 2, "In (or for) hope of eternal life." This is the farther intent of the Gospel, to beget hope as well as faith; to take off the mind and heart from the world, and to raise them to heaven and the things above. The faith and godliness of Christians lead to eternal life, and give hope and well-grounded expectation of it; for God, that cannot lie, hath promised it. It is the honour of God that he cannot lie or deceive, and the comfort of believers, whose treasure is laid up in his faithful promises.

But, Question. How is he said to promise before the world began? Answer. By promise some understand his decree, he purposed it in his eternal counsels, which was, as it were, his promise in embryo; or rather, say some, πρὸ χρόνων αἰώνων, is 'before ancient times,' or many ages ago, referring to the promise darkly delivered, Gen. iii. 15.

"Before the world began." That is, the purpose was then formed, and the promise may be considered as in fact then made; for a purpose in the mind of God, though it is not as yet made known, is equivalent to a promise.]

Here is the stability and antiquity of the promise of eternal life to the saints; "God, that cannot lie, hath promised before the world began," that is, many ages since. How excellent, then, is the Gospel, that was the matter of Divine

i. 1—4. These somewhat involved sentences are thus rendered by Conybeare and Howson: "Paul, a bondsman of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, sent forth to bring God's chosen to faith, and to the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness, with hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before the times of old (but he made known his word in due season, in the message committed to my trust by the command of God our Saviour, to Titus," &c. The expression "servant" or "bondsman of God," here and here only used by St. Paul of himself, is a proof of the genuineness of this epistle; no forger would have ventured on applying a new epithet to the apostle. "Before the world began;" see Note on 2 Tim. i. 9. "Grace, mercy, and peace;" "mercy" omitted by the oldest MSS. "From God the Father and Christ Jesus our Saviour:" so the oldest MSS.

promise so early; and how much to be esteemed by us, and what thanks due for our privilege beyond those before us! "Blessed are your eyes, for they see," &c. No wonder if the contempt of it be punished severely, since he hath not only promised it of old, "but," ver. 3, "faith in due times manifested his word through preaching;" that is, made that his promise, so darkly delivered of old, "in due times," that is, the proper season before appointed, more plain by preaching; that which some called "foolishness of preaching" hath been thus honoured. "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God," namely, by the word preached. "Which is committed unto me." The ministry is a trust; none taketh this honour but he that is thereunto appointed, and whoso is appointed and called must preach the word; 1 Cor. ix. 16, "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." Unpreaching ministers are none of the apostles' successors. "According to the commandment of God our Saviour," preaching is a work appointed by God as a Saviour. See a proof here of Christ's deity, for by him was the Gospel committed to Paul, when he was converted, Acts ix. 15, 17; xxii. 10, 14, 15; and again when Christ appeared to him, Acts v. 17-21. He, therefore, is this Saviour; not but that the whole Trinity concur therein: the Father saves by the Son, through the Spirit, and all concur in sending ministers. Let none rest, therefore, in men's calling without God's; he furnishes, and inclines, and authorises, and gives opportunity for the work.

4 To Titus, mine own son after the common faith: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Secondly. Here is the person written to described,

1. By his name. Titus, a Gentile Greek, yet called both to the faith and ministry. Observe, The grace of God is free and powerful. What worthiness or preparation was there in one of heathen stock and education? "Mine own (or my genuine) son," not by natural generation, but by supernatural regeneration. "I have begotten you through the Gospel," said he to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. iv. 15. Ministers are spiritual fathers to those whom they are the means of converting, and will tenderly affect and care for them, and must be answerably regarded by them. "Mine own son after the common faith;" that is, that faith which is common to all the regenerate, and which thou hast in truth, and expressest to the life. This might be said to distinguish Titus from hypocrites and false teachers, and to recommend him to the regard of the Cretians, as being among them a lively image of the apostle himself, in faith, and life, and heavenly doctrine. To this Titus, deservedly so dear to the apostle, is—

Thirdly. The salutation and prayer, wishing all blessings to him: "Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour." Here are,

1. The blessings wished: "Grace, mercy, and peace." Grace, that is, the free favour of God, and acceptance with him. Mercy, that is, the fruits of that favour in pardon of sins, and freedom from all miseries by it, both here and hereafter. And peace, the positive effect and fruit of mercy. Peace with God through Christ, who is our peace, and with the creatures and ourselves, outward and inward peace, comprehending all good whatsoever, that makes for our happiness in time and to eternity. Observe, Grace is the fountain of all blessings; mercy and peace, and all good, spring out of this. Get into God's favour, and all must be well; for,

2. These are the persons from whom blessings are wished. "From God the Father," the fountain of all good. Every blessing and comfort comes to us from God as a Father; he is the Father of all by creation, but of the good by adoption and regeneration. "And the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour," namely, as the way and means of procurement and conveyance. All is from the Father by the Son, who is Lord by nature, heir of all things, and our Lord, Redeemer, and Head, ordering and ruling his members. All are put under him. We hold of him as in capite, and owe subjection and obedience to him, who is also Jesus and Christ, the anointed Saviour, and especially our Saviour who believe in him, delivering us from sin and hell, and bringing us to heaven and happiness.

Thus far is the preface to the epistle, then follows:—

II. The entrance into the matter, by signifying,

First. The end of Titus's being left in Crete.

5 For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee:

CRETE—RUINS OF GORTYNA.

Here is the end expressed,

1. More generally: "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting." This was the business of evangelists, in which office Titus was, to water where the apostles had planted, 1 Cor. iii. 6; furthering and finishing what they had begun, so much ἐπιδοποιῶν imports, 'to order after another.' Titus was to go on in settling what the apostle himself had not time for in his short stay there. Observe, 1st. The apostle's great diligence in the Gospel; when he had set things on foot in one place, he hastened away to another. He was debtor to the Greeks, and to the barbarians, and laboured to spread the Gospel as far he could among them all. And observe, 2nd. His faithfulness and prudence. He neglected not the places that he went from; but left some to cultivate the young plantation, and carry on what was begun. And observe, 3rd. Likewise his humility. He disdained not to be helped in his work, and that by such as were not of so high a rank in the ministry, nor of so great gifts and furniture as himself. So the Gospel might be furthered, and the good of souls promoted, he willingly used the hands of others in it; a fit example for exciting zeal and industry, and engaging to faithfulness and care of the flock, and present or absent, living and dying, for ministers, as much as in them lies, to provide for the spiritual edification and comfort of their people. We may here also observe, 4th. That Titus, though inferior to an apostle, yet was above the ordinary fixed pastors or bishops, who were to attend particular churches, as their peculiar stated charge; but Titus was in a higher sphere, to ordain such ordinary pastors where wanting, and settle things in their first state and form, and then to pass to other places for like service, as there might be need. Titus was not only a minister of the catholic church, as all others also are, but a catholic minister. Others had power habitual, and in actu primo,—'original authority,' to minister anywhere, upon call and opportunity; but evangelists, such as Titus was, had power in actu secundo et exercitio,—'exercised secondary authority,' and could exercise their ministry wherever they came, and claim maintenance of the churches; they were everywhere actually in their diocese or province, and had right to direct and guide, and preside among the ordinary pastors and ministers. Where an apostle could act as an apostle, an evangelist could as an evangelist; for "they worked the work of the Lord, as they did," 1 Cor. xvi. 10, in a like unfixed and itinerant manner.

"[That thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting." Margin, 'left undone.' The Greek is, 'the things that are left;' that is, those which were left unfinished; referring, doubtless, to arrangements which had been commenced, but which for some cause had been left incomplete. Whether this had occurred because he had been driven away by persecution, or called away by important duties demanding his attention elsewhere, cannot now be determined. The word rendered 'set in order,' ἐπιδοποιῶν, occurs now here else in the New Testament. It means, properly, 'to make straight upon,' and then to put farther to rights, to arrange farther.—Robinson, Lex. There were things left unfinished, which he was to complete. One of these things, and perhaps the principal, was to appoint elders in the various cities where the Gospel had been preached.]

Here, at Crete, Titus was but occasionally, and for a short time; Paul willed him to despatch the business he was left for, and come to him at Nicopolis, where he purposed to winter; after this he was sent to Corinth, with the apostle at Rome, and was sent thence into Dalmatia, which is the last we read of him in Scripture, so that from thence no fixed episcopacy in him does appear. He left Crete, and we find not in Scripture that he returned thither any more.

But, Q. What power had either Paul or Titus here? Was not what they did an encroachment on the rights of civil rulers? A. In no sort; they came not to meddle with the civil rights of any. Lu. xii. 14, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?" Their work was spiritual, to be carried on by conviction and persuasion, no way interfering with, or prejudicing, or weakening, the power of magistrates, but securing and strengthening it rather; the things wanting were not such as civil magistrates are the fountains or authors of, but Divine and spiritual ordinances and appointments for spiritual ends, and derived from Christ, the King and Head of the church; for settling these was Titus left. And observe, No easy thing is it to raise churches, and bring them to perfection. Paul had himself been here labouring, and yet were there things wanting. Materials are out of square, need much hewing and fitting to bring them into right form, and when they are set therein, to hold and keep them so. The best are apt to decay and to go out of order. Ministers are to help against this, to get what is amiss rectified, and what is wanting supplied. This in general was Titus's work in Crete; and

2. In special to "ordain elders in every city;" that is, ministers who were mostly out of the elder and most understanding and experienced Christians; or if younger in years, yet such as were grave and solid in their deportment and manners.

"[Elders." Gr., 'presbyters;' see the comment on Acts xiv. 23. These elders, or presbyters, were also called bishops, (compare notes on 1 Tim. iii. 1,) for Paul immediately, in describing their qualifications, calls them bishops: "Ordain elders in every city—if any be blameless—for a bishop must be blameless," &c. If the elders and bishops in the times of the apostles were of different ranks, this direction would be wholly unmeaning. It would be the same as if the following direction were given to one who was authorised to appoint officers over an army: 'Appoint captains over each company, who shall be of good character, and acquainted with military tactics, for a brigadier-general must be of good character, and acquainted with the rules of war.' That the same rank is denoted also by the terms presbyter and bishop here, is farther apparent, because the qualifications which Paul states as requisite for the 'bishop' are not those which pertain to a prelate or a diocesan bishop, but to one who was a pastor of a church, or an evangelist; 'pastors,' says Thomas Scott, 'who are called elders and bishops indiscriminately.']

These were to be set where was any fit number of Christians, as in bigger towns and cities it first and mostly was, though villages too might have them where were Christians enough for it. These presbyters or elders were to have the ordinary and stated care and charge of the churches; to feed and govern them, and perform all pastoral work and duty in and towards them. The word is used sometimes more largely for any that bear ecclesiastical functions in the church, and so the apostles were presbyters or elders, 1 Pet. v. 1; but here it is meant of ordinary fixed pastors, who "laboured in the word and doctrine," and were "over the churches in the Lord," such as are described here throughout the chapter. This word presbyter some use in the same sense as sacerdos, and translate it 'priests,' a term not given to gospel ministers, unless in a figurative or allusive way, as all God's people are said to be made "kings and priests unto God," (1 Pet. ii. 9,) it is not πρεσβύτερος,) to offer up spiritual sacrifices of prayers, and praises, and alms, &c. But properly we have no priests under the Gospel, but Christ alone, "the high priest of our profession," Heb. iii. 1, who offered up himself a sacrifice to God for us, and ever lives, in virtue thereof, to make intercession in our behalf. Presbyters here, therefore, are not proper priests to offer sacrifices, either typical or real; but only gospel ministers, to dispense Christ's ordinances, and to "feed the church of God, over which the Holy Ghost hath made them overseers." Observe, 1st. A church without a fixed and standing ministry in it is imperfect and wanting. 2nd. Where a fit number of believers is, presbyters or elders must be set; their continuance in churches is as necessary as their first appointment, "for perfecting the saints, and edifying the body of Christ, till all come to a perfect man in Christ;" that is, till the whole number of God's chosen be called and united to Christ in one body, and brought to their full stature and strength, and that measure of grace that is proper, and designed for them, Eph. iv. 12, 13. Work this is that must and will be doing to the world's end; to which, therefore, the person. The Greek word translated "bishop" here is the same that more correctly is rendered "overseer" in Acts xx. 28. "Elder" denotes the rank, "overseer" the duty. "Every 'elder' was by his office an 'overseer,' but Titus had power over all elders, and so was an overseer in a higher sense of the term" (Burton).

i. 6-9. "Blameless:" specially needful for one who had to reprove such profligates as the Cretians, who would respect none against whom they could find an accusation, however groundless. "Self-necessary and appointed means for it must last. What praise is due to God for such an institution! What thankfulness from those that enjoy the benefits of it! what pity and prayer for such as want it! "Pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth labourers into his harvest." "Faith comes by hearing," and is preserved, and maintained, and made fruitful through it also. Ignorance and corruption, decay of good, and increase of all evil, come by want of a teaching and quickening ministry. On such accounts, therefore, was Titus left in Crete, to "set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city;" but this he was to do, not ad libitum, or according to his own will, or fancy, but according to apostolic direction, which is,

3. The rule of his proceeding. "As I had appointed thee," probably when he was going from him, and in the presence and hearing of others, which now he may refer to, not so much for Titus's own sake as for the people's, that they might the more readily yield obedience unto Titus, knowing and minding that in what he did he was warranted and supported by apostolic injunction and authority. As under the law all things were to be made according to the pattern shewn to Moses in the mount, so under the Gospel all must be ordered and managed according to the direction of Christ, and of his chief ministers, who were infallibly guided by him. Human traditions and inventions may not be brought into the church of God. Prudent disposals for carrying on the ends of Christ's appointments, according to the general rules of the word, such may, yea, must be; but none may alter any thing in the substance of the faith, or worship, or order and discipline of the churches; if an evangelist might not do any thing but by appointment, much less may others. The church is the house of God, and to him it belongs to appoint the officers and orders of it as he pleaseth; the "as" here refers to the qualifications and characters of the elders that he was to ordain. "Ordain elders in every city, as I appointed thee;" that is, such as I then described, and shall now again more particularly point out to thee, which he does from the 6th verse to the 9th, inclusive. And here is,

Secondly. The second thing in the matter of the epistle, namely, the directions that the apostle gives Titus about ordination, shewing whom he should ordain, and whom not.

1. Of those whom he should ordain. He points out their qualifications and virtues; such as respect their life and manners, and such as relate to their doctrine; the former in the 6th, 7th, and 8th verses, and the latter in the 9th.

6 If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly.

7 For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; not selfwilled, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre; 8 But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; 9 Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers.

1st. Their qualifications respecting their life and manners are,

First. More general. "If any be blameless;" not absolutely without fault, so none are; for "there is none that liveth and sinneth not;" nor altogether unblamed, that is rare and hard. Christ himself and his apostles were blamed, though not worthy of it. In Christ, to be sure, was nothing blameable, and his apostles were not such as their enemies charged them to be; but the meaning is, he must be one that lies not under an ill character, but rather must have a good report, even "from those that are without;" not grossly or scandalously guilty, so as would bring reproach upon their holy function; he must not be such an one.

Secondly. More particularly.

1st. There is his relative character. In his own person he must be of conjugal chastity, "the husband of one wife." The church of Rome saith the husband of no wife; but from the beginning it was not so. Marriage is an ordinance from which no profession or calling is a bar; 1 Cor. ix. 5, "Have I not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles," saith St. Paul. "Forbidding to marry" is one of the erroneous doctrines of the antichristian church, 1 Tim. iv. 3. Not that ministers must be married, that is not meant; but the "husband of one wife" may be either, not having divorced his wife and married another, as was too common among them of the circumcision, even for slight causes; or "the husband of one wife," that is, at one and the same time—no bigamist. Not that he might not be married to more than one wife successively; but being married he must have but one wife at once, not two or more, according to the too common sinful practice of those times, by a perverse imitation of the patriarchs, from which evil custom our Lord taught a reformation. Polygamy is scandalous in any, as also having a harlot or concubine with his lawful wife; such sin, or any wanton, libidinous carriage, must be very remote from such as would enter into so sacred a function. And as to his children, "having faithful children;" that is, obedient and good, brought up in the true Christian faith, and living according to it, at least as much as the parents can will that it be so. It is for the honour of ministers that their children be faithful and pious, and such as become their religion. "Not accused of riot, or unruly;" that is, not justly so accused, as having given ground and occasion for it, for otherwise the most innocent may be falsely so charged; they must look to it, therefore, that there be no colour for such censure. Children so faithful, and obedient, and temperate, will be a good sign of faithfulness and diligence in the parent who has so educated and instructed them; and from his faithfulness in the less there may be encouragement to commit to him the greater, namely, the rule and government of the church of God. The ground of this qualification is shewn from the nature of his office; ver. 7. "For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God." Those before termed presbyters, or elders, are in this verse styled bishops, and such they were, having no ordinary fixed and standing officers above them. Titus's business here, it is plain, was but occasional, and his stay short, as before was noted. Having ordained elders, and settled things in their due form, he went and left all, for aught appears in Scripture, in the hands of those elders, whom here he calls bishops and stewards of God. We read not in the sacred writings of any successor he had in Crete; but to those elders or bishops was committed the full charge of feeding, and ruling, and watching over their flock; they wanted not any powers necessary for carrying on religion and the ministry of it among them, and deriving it down to succeeding ages. Now, being such bishops and overseers of the flock, who were to be examples to them, and God's stewards to take care of the affairs of his house, to provide for and dispense to them things needful, here is great reason that their characters should be clear and good, that they should be blameless. How else could it be but that religion must suffer, their work be hindered, and souls prejudiced and endangered, whom they were set to save? These are the qualifications relative, with the ground of them.

2nd. The more absolute ones are expressed.

(1.) Negatively, shewing what an elder or bishop must not be; "Not self-willed." The prohibition is of large extent, excluding self-opinion, or overweening conceit of parts and abilities, and abounding in one's own sense, and self-love, and self-seeking, making self the centre of all; also self-confidence and trust, and self-pleasing, little regarding or setting by others; not proud, stubborn, froward, inflexible, set on one's own will and way, or churlish, as Nabai; to such sense do expositors carry it. A great honour it is to a minister not to be thus affected, to be ready to ask and to take advice, to be ready to defer as much as reasonably may be to the mind and will of others, becoming all things to all men, that they may gain some. "Not soon angry," μὴ ὀργίζου,—"not one of a hasty, angry temper, soon and easily provoked and inflamed. How unfit are they to govern a church who cannot govern themselves, their own turbulent and unruly passions! The minister must be meek, and gentle, and patient towards all men. "Not given to wine;" no greater reproach on a minister than to be a wine-bibber, one that loves it, and gives himself undue liberty this way, who continues at the wine or strong drink till it inflames him. Seasonable and moderate use of this, as of other of God's good creatures, is not unlawful. "Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities," said Paul to Timothy, 1 Tim. v. 23; but excess therein is shameful in all, especially in a minister. "Wine takes away the heart," turns the man into a brute. Here most proper is that exhortation of the apostle, Eph. v. 18, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." Here is no exceeding, but in the former too easily there may; take heed, therefore, of going too near the brink. "No striker;" namely, in any quarrelsome or contentious manner, not injuriously, or out of revenge, with cruelty or unnecessary roughness. "Not given to filthy lucre;" not greedy of it, as 1 Tim. iii. 3, whereby is not meant refusing a just return for their labours, in order to their necessary support and comfort; but not making gain their first or chief end, not entering into the ministry, or managing it, with base worldly views. Nothing more unbecoming a minister, who is to direct his own and others' eyes to another world, than to be too intent upon this. It is called "filthy lucre," from its defiling the soul that inordinately affects or greedily looks after it, as if it were any otherwise desirable than for the good and lawful uses of it. Thus of the negative part of the bishop's character; but,

(2.) Positively he must be, ver. 8, "A lover of hospitality." As an evidence that he is not given to filthy lucre, but is willing to use what he hath to the best purposes, not laying up for himself so as to hinder charitable laying out for the good of others; "receiving and entertaining strangers," as the word imports; a great and necessary office of love, especially in such times as then were, of affliction and distress. When Christians were put to fly and wander for safety from persecution and enemies, or in travelling to and fro where were not such public houses for reception as in our days—nor it may be had many poor saints sufficiency of their own for such uses—then to receive and entertain them was good and pleasing to God. And such a spirit and practice, according to ability and occasion, is very becoming such as should be examples of good works. "A lover of good men," or of good things; ministers should be exemplary in both; this will evidence their open piety and likeness to God and their Master, Jesus Christ. "Do good to all, but especially to them of the household of faith;" these that are the excellent of the earth, in whom should be all our delight. Sober, or prudent, as the word signifies, a needful grace in a minister, both for his ministerial and personal carriage and management. He should be a wise steward, and one that is not rash, or foolish, or heady, but who can govern well his passions and affections. "Just;" namely, in things belonging to civil life, and moral righteousness, and equity in dealings, giving to all their due. "Holy;" in what concerns religion; one that reverences and worships God, and is of a spiritual and heavenly conversation. "Temperate;" it comes from a word that signifies strength, and notes one that hath power over his appetite and affections, or in things lawful can, for good ends, restrain and hold them in. Nothing more becoming a minister than such things as these—sobriety, temperance, justice, and holiness; sober in respect of himself, just and righteous towards all men, and holy towards God. And thus of the qualifications respecting the minister's life and manners; relative and absolute, negative and positive; what he must not, and what he must be and do. Now,

2nd. As to doctrine.

First. Here is the duty. "Holding fast the faithful word, as he hath been taught;" that is, keeping close to the doctrine of Christ, "the word of his grace," adhering thereto according to the instructions he hath received, holding it fast in his own belief and profession, and in teaching others. Observe, 1st. The word of God, revealed in the Scripture, is a true and infallible word; the word of him that is "the Amen, the true and faithful witness," and whose Spirit guided the penmen of it; "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." 2nd. Ministers must hold fast and hold forth the faithful word, in their teaching and life. "I have kept the faith" was Paul's comfort, 2 Tim. iv. 7, and "not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God;" there was his faithfulness, Acts xx. 27.

Secondly. Here is the end; "That he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers;" that is, to persuade and draw others to the true faith, and convince the contrary-minded. Which how should he do if himself were uncertain or unsteady, not holding fast that "faithful word and sound doctrine" which should be the matter of this teaching, and the means and ground of convincing those that oppose the truth? See we here summarily the great work of the ministry,—to exhort those who are willing to know and do their duty, and to convince them that contradict; both which are to be done by sound doctrine, that is, in a rational, instructive way, by Scripture arguments and testimonies, which are the infallible words of truth, what all may and should rest and be satisfied in, and determined by. And thus of the qualifications of the elders that Titus was to ordain.

Secondly. The apostle's directory shews whom he should reject or avoid—men of another character, the mention of whom is brought in as a reason of that care he had recommended about the qualifications of ministers, why they should be such, and only such, as he had described. The reasons he takes both from bad teachers and hearers among them, from ver. 10 to the end.

1. From bad teachers.

10 For there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision: 11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake.

i. 10. "Deceivers;" teachers who delude the minds of their disciples with casuistical sophistries. "They soothe the minds of men, and as it were bewitch them" (Calvin).

i. 12. "The Cretians are always liars;" seems to have been a proverbial expression. The apostle's quotation is from the works of Epimenides. His sarcasm is, that though Crete was free from wild beasts, its inhabitants supply their place. "Slow bellies;" given up to sloth, as wild beasts when gorged with prey.

willed;" "A self-loving spirit, which in seeking only to gratify itself is regardless of others" (Ellicott). "A lover of hospitality;" in the early times of the Church, Christians travelling were entertained and forwarded on their journey by their brethren. This is the hospitality so often commended in the New Testament (Rom. xii. 13; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Peter iv. 9). "Sober;" i.e., discreet, or self-restrained. "Temperate;" "One having his passions, tongue, hands, and eyes at command" (Chrysostom).

1st. Those false teachers are described. They were unruly, headstrong, and ambitious of power; refractory and untractable, as some render it, and such as would not bear or submit themselves to the discipline and necessary order in the church, impatient of good government and of sound doctrine. "And vain talkers and deceivers," conceiting themselves to be wise, but really foolish, and thence great talkers, and falling into errors and mistakes, and fond of them; they were studious and industrious to draw others into the same.

[There are many persons who are indisposed to submit to authority (see the word "unruly" in ver. 6), many who are vain talkers—who are more given to talk than to the duties of practical religion, (see the character of "Talkative" in the Pilgrim's Progress), and many who live to deceive others under the mask of religion. They make great pretensions to piety; they are fluent in argument, and they urge their views in a plausible manner.]

Many such there were, "especially they of the circumcision," converts, as they pretended, at least, from the Jews, who yet were for mingling Judaism and Christianity together, and so making a corrupt medley. These were the false teachers. And,

2nd. There is the apostle's direction how to deal with them; ver. 11, "Their mouths must be stopped;" not by outward force; Titus had no such power, nor are those the Gospel methods, but by confutation and conviction, shewing them their error, not giving place to them, even for an hour. In case of obstinacy, indeed, and breaking the peace of the church, and corrupting other churches, censures are to have place; the last means for recovering the faulty, and preventing the hurt of many. Observe, Faithful ministers must timely oppose seducers, that their folly being made manifest they may proceed no farther.

3rd. The reasons are given for this. First. From the pernicious effects of their errors; they "subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not," namely, the necessity of circumcision, and of keeping the law of Moses, &c.; so subverting the Gospel and the souls of men; not some few only, but whole families. It was unjustly charged on the apostles, "that they turned the world upside down;" but justly on these false teachers, that they drew many from the true faith to their ruin. The mouths of such should be stopped; especially considering, Secondly. Their base end in what they do; namely, "for filthy lucre's sake," serving a worldly interest under pretence of religion. "Love of money is the root of all evil." Most fit that such should be resisted, and confuted, and put to shame, by sound doctrine, and reasons from the Scriptures.

[No people can be too vigilant in regard to pretended religious teachers; and while it is undoubtedly their duty to contribute liberally for the support of the Gospel, and the promotion of every good cause, it is no less their duty to examine with care every proposed object of benevolence, and to watch with an eagle eye those who have the disbursement of the charities of the church. It is very rare that ministers ought to have much to do with disposing of the funds given for benevolent purposes; and when they do, they should in all cases be associated with their lay brethren: see Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, ch. iv., No. 1, 3, note.]

Thus of the grounds respecting the bad teachers.

2. In reference to their people or hearers, who are described from ancient testimony given of them.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are alway liars, evil beasts, slow bellies. 13 This witness is true. Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith; 14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth.

1st. Here is the witness; ver. 12, "One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said;" that is, one of the Cretians, not of the Jews, namely, Epimenides, a Greek poet, likely to know, and unlikely to slander them. A prophet of their own; so their poets were accounted writers of Divine oracles, as they esteemed them. These often witnessed against the vices of the people: Aratus, Epimenides, and others among the Greeks; Horace, Juvenal, and Persius among the Latins; much smartness did they use against divers vices.

[Epimenides was one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was a contemporary of Solon, and was born at Phæstus, in the island of Crete, B.C. 659, and is said to have reached the age of one hundred and fifty-seven years. Many marvellous tales are told of him, (see Anthol. Class. Dic.) which are commonly supposed to be fabulous, and which are to be traced to the invention of the Cretians. The event in his life which is best known is, that he visited Athens, at the request of the inhabitants, to prepare the way by sacrifices for the introduction of the laws of Solon. He was supposed to have intercourse with the gods, and it was presumed that a peculiar sacredness would attend the religious services in which he officiated. On this account, also, as well as because he was a poet, the name prophet may have been given him.]

2nd. Here is the matter of the testimony, Κῆρες ἀεὶ ψεύσται, κακὰ θήρια, ἡστέρες ἀργαί. "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies," even to a proverb; they were infamous for falsehood and lying, κρητίζεν,—to play the Cretian, or to lie, is the same; and they were compared to evil beasts for their sly hurtfulness and savage nature, and called slow bellies for their laziness and sensuality, more inclined to eat than to work, and live by some honest employment. Observe, Such scandalous vices as were the reproach of heathens should be far from Christians. Falsehood and lying, invidious craft and cruelty, all beastly and sensual practices, and idleness and sloth, are sins condemned by the light of nature; for these were the Cretians taxed by their own poets. And,

3rd. Here is the verification of this by the apostle himself; ver. 13, "This witness is true." The apostle saw too much ground for that character. The temper of some nations is more inclined to some vices than others. The Cretians were too generally such as here described,—slothful and ill-natured, false and perfidious, as the apostle himself vouches. And thence

4th. He instructs Titus how to deal with them; "Wherefore rebuke them sharply." When Paul wrote to Timothy he bade him "instruct with meekness;" but now he writes to Titus he bids him "rebuke them sharply." The reason of the difference may be taken either from the different temper of Timothy and Titus; the former might have more keenness in his disposition, and be apt to be warm in reproof, whom therefore he bids to "rebuke with meekness;" and the latter (Titus) might be one of more mildness, therefore he quickens him, and bids him rebuke sharply; or rather it was from the difference of the case and people. Timothy had a more polite people to deal with, and therefore he must "rebuke them with meekness;" and Titus had to do with those who were more rough and uncultivated, and therefore he must "rebuke them sharply;" their corruptions were many and gross, and committed without shame or modesty, and therefore should be dealt with accordingly.

i. 16. "They profess," or better, "they confess that they know God, but by their works they deny him." This justifies the charge of the preceding verse, that they are unbelievers in reality, though not in name. "Abominable:" "This was one of the terms which the advocates of a spurious philosophy applied very freely to the common people (John vii. 49); the apostle retorts upon them their own terms." "Reprobate;" or incapable, unfit when put to the proof.

There must, in reproof, be a distinguishing of sins and sins; some are more gross and heinous in their nature, or in the manner of their commission, with openness and boldness, to the greater dishonour of God, and danger and hurt to men; and between sinners and sinners; some are of a more tender and tractable temper, apter to be wrought on by gentleness, and to be sunk and discouraged by too much roughness and severity; others more hardy and stubborn, and needing more cutting language to beget remorse and shame. Wisdom, therefore, is requisite to temper and manage reproofs aright, as may be most likely to do good; Jude 22, 23, "Of some have compassion, making a difference; and others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire." The Cretians' sins and corruptions were many, and great, and habitual; therefore they must be rebuked sharply. But, that such direction might not be misconstrued,

5th. Here is the end of it noted: "That they may be sound in the faith;" ver. 14, "Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men that turn from the truth;" that is, that they may be, and shew themselves, truly and effectually changed from such evil temper and manners, as those Cretians in their natural state lived in; and might not adhere to or regard (as some that were converted might be too ready to do) the Jewish traditions, and superstitions of the Pharisees, which would be apt to make them disrelish the Gospel, and the sound and wholesome truths of it. Observe, First. The sharpest reproofs must aim at the good of the reproofed; they must not be of malice, or hatred, or ill-will, but of love; not to gratify pride, or passion, or any evil affection in the reproofer, but to reclaim and reform the erroneous and the guilty. Secondly. Soundness in the faith is most desirable and necessary. This is the soul's health and vigour, pleasing to God, comfortable to the Christian, and what makes ready to, cheerful and constant in, duty. Thirdly. A special means to soundness in the faith is, to turn away the ear from fables, and the fancies of men; 1 Tim. i. 4, "Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, that minister questions rather than edifying, which is in faith;" so ch. iv. 7, "Refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather to godliness. Fancies and devices of men in the worship of God are contrary to truth and piety. Jewish ceremonies and rites, that were at first Divine appointments, the substance being come and their season and use over, are now but unwarranted commands of men, which not only stand not with, but turn from, the truth; that is, the pure gospel truth, and spiritual worship, set up by Christ instead of that bodily service under the law." Fourthly. A fearful judgment it is to be turned away from the truth,—to leave Christ for Moses,—the spiritual worship of the Gospel for the carnal ordinances of the law, or the true Divine institutions and precepts for human inventions and appointments. "Who hath bewitched you?" said Paul to the Galatians, ch. iii. 1, "that ye should not obey the truth?" Having begun in the Spirit are you made perfect by the flesh?" Thus, having shewn the end of sharply reproofing the corrupt and vicious Cretians, that they might be sound in the faith, and not heed Jewish fables and commands of men,

6th. He gives the reasons of this, from the liberty we have by the Gospel from legal observances, and the evil and mischief of a Jewish spirit under the Christian dispensation, in the two last verses, namely,

15 Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled. 16 They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

To good Christians [truly converted persons] that are sound in the faith, and thereby purified, "all things are pure;" meats and drinks, and such things that were forbidden under the law, and in which observance some were still apt to stick, in these there is now no distinction; all are pure, that is, lawful and free in their use; "But to them that are defiled, and unbelieving, nothing is pure;" things lawful and good they abuse and turn to sin; they suck poison out of that from which others draw sweetness. Because their mind and conscience, those leading faculties, are defiled, a taint is derived to all they do. "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord," Pr. xv. 8; and ch. xxi. 4, "The ploughing of the wicked is sin," not in itself, but as done by him; the carnality of the mind and heart mars all the labour of the hand.

[But there may be a somewhat higher application of the words—that every ordinance of religion, every command of God, every event that occurs in Divine providence, tends (through grace) to promote the holiness of one who is of pure (renewed) heart. He can see a sanctifying tendency in every thing, and can derive from all that is commanded, and all that occurs, the means of making the heart more holy. While a depraved mind will turn every such thing to a pernicious use, and make it the means of augmenting its malignity and corruption—to the pure mind it will be the means of increasing its confidence in God, and of making itself more holy. To such a mind every thing may become a means of grace.]

Objection. But are not these Judaizers, as you call them, men that profess religion, and speak well of God and Christ, and righteousness of life, and should they be so severely taxed? Answer. Ver. 16, "They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate." There are many who in word and tongue profess to know God, and yet in their lives and conversations deny and reject him; their practice is a contradiction to their profession. "They come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words; but they will not do them: with their mouth they shew much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness," Eze. xxxiii. 31. "Being abominable, and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate." The apostle instructing Titus to rebuke sharply, does himself rebuke sharply; he gives them very hard words; yet, doubtless, no harder than their case warranted, and their need required. "Being abominable," βδελυκτοί, but deserving that God and good men should turn away their eyes from them as nauseous and offensive. "And disobedient," ἀπειθεῖς,—unpersuadable, and "unbelieving;" they might do divers things; but it was not the obedience of faith, not what was commanded, or short of the command. "To every good work reprobate;" without skill or judgment to do any thing aright. See the miserable condition of hypocrites, such as have a form of godliness, but without the power. [Alas! taking the church at large, there are many such, and the fact that there are such persons is the grand hindrance to the triumphs of religion on the earth. The way to heaven is blocked up by dead professors of religion.] Yet be we not so ready to fix this charge on others as careful that it agree not to ourselves, that there be not in us "an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God;" but that we be "sincere and without offence, till the day of Christ, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God," Phil. i. 10, 11.

ii. 1, 2. "The apostle deals more in exhortations, because those intent on useless questions needed chiefly to be recalled to the study of a holy, moral life; for nothing so effectually allays men's wandering curiosity as the being brought to recognise those duties in which they ought to exercise themselves" (Calvin). "Sound in faith," &c.: literally, healthy, free from disease—i.e., error or weakness.

ii. 3—5. "The aged women likewise to let their deportment testify of holiness" (Conybeare and Howson). "Teachers of that

CHAPTER II.

The apostle here directs Titus about the faithful discharge of his own office, generally, ver. 1; and particularly as to several sorts of persons, ver. 2-10; and gives the grounds of those and of other following directions, ver. 11-14; with a summary direction in the close, ver. 15.

UT speak thou the things which become sound doctrine :

Thirdly. Here is the third thing in the matter of the epistle. In the chapter foregoing the apostle had directed Titus about matters of government, and to set in order the things that were wanting in the churches: now here he exhorts him,

1. Generally to a faithful discharge of his own office. His ordaining others to preach would not excuse himself from preaching, nor might he take care of ministers and elders only, but he must instruct private Christians also in their duty. The adverbative particle, ἵνα, here points back to the corrupt teachers, who invented fables, things vain and unprofitable: in opposition to them, saith he, "But speak thou the things that become sound doctrine;" that is, what is agreeable to the word, which is pure and uncorrupt, healthful and nourishing to eternal life. Observe, 1st. The true doctrines of the Gospel are sound doctrines, formally and effectively; they are in themselves good and holy, and make the believers so; they make fit for, and vigorous in, the service of God. 2nd. Ministers must be careful to teach only such truths; if common talk of Christians must "be uncorrupt to the use of edifying, such as may minister grace to the hearers," Eph. iv. 29, much more must ministers' preaching be such. Thus the apostle exhorts Titus generally; and then,

2. Specially and particularly he instructs him to apply this sound doctrine to several sorts of persons, from ver. 2-10. Ministers must not stay in generals, but must divide to every one his portion, what belongs to his age, or place, or condition of life; they must be particular as well as practical in their preaching; they must teach men their duty, and must teach all and each his duty. Here is an excellent Christian directory, accommodated to the old and to the young, to men and women, to the preacher himself, and unto servants.

1st. To the aged men.

2 That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in charity, in patience.

By aged men some understand elders by office, including deacons, &c.: but it is rather to be taken of the aged in point of years. Old disciples of Christ must carry themselves in every thing agreeably to the Christian doctrine. "That the aged men be sober," not thinking that the decays of nature, which they feel in old age, will justify them in any inordinacy, or intemperance, whereby they conceit to repair them; they must keep measure in things, both for health and for fitness for counsel and example to the younger. "Grave:" levity is unbecoming in any, but especially in the aged; they should be composed and staid, grave in habit, and speech, and behaviour. Crisiness in dress, levity and vanity in the carriage, how unbecoming is it in their years! "Temperate:" moderate and prudent, one that governs well his passions and affections, so as not to be hurried away by them to any thing that is evil or indelicate. "Sound in the faith:" that is, sincere and steadfast, constantly adhering to the truth of the Gospel, not fond of novelties, or easy to run into corrupt opinions, or parties, or to be taken with Jewish fables or traditions, or the dotages of their rabbins. The full of years should be full of grace and goodness, the inner man renewing more and more as the outer decays. "In charity:" or love; this is fitly joined with faith, which works by, and must be seen in, love; love to God and men, and soundness therein. It must be sincere love, without dissimulation; love of God for himself, and of men for God's sake; the duties of the second table must be done in virtue of those of the first; love to men as men, and to the saints as the excellencies of the earth, in whom must be special delight; and love at all times, in adversity as well as prosperity: thus must there be soundness in charity. "In patience:" aged persons are apt to be peevish, and fretful, and passionate, and therefore need to be on their guard against such infirmities and temptations; faith, and love, and patience, are three main Christian graces, and soundness in these is much of gospel perfection. There is enduring and waiting patience, both must be looked after; to bear evils becomingly, and contentedly to wait the good till we are fit for it, and it for us, being "followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." Thus as to the aged men.

2nd. To the aged women,

3 The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things ;

These also must be instructed and warned. Some by these aged women understand the deaconesses, who were mostly employed in looking after the poor, and tending the sick; but it is rather to be taken, as we render it, of all aged women professing religion; they must "be in behaviour as becometh holiness." Both men and women must accommodate their behaviour to their profession; those virtues before mentioned, namely, sobriety, gravity, temperance, soundness in the faith, and charity and patience, recommended to aged men, are not proper to them only, but applicable to both sexes, and to be looked to by aged women as well as men. Women are to hear and learn their duty from the word, as well as the men; there is not one way of salvation for one sex or sort, and another for another; but both must learn and practise the same things, both as aged and as Christians; the virtues and duties are common. "The aged women likewise," that is, as well as the men, "be in behaviour as becometh holiness," or as becometh is proper for holy persons, such as they profess to be, and should be; keeping a pious decency and decorum in clothing and gesture, in looks and speech, and all other deportment; and this from an inward principle and habit of holiness, influencing and ordering the outward carriage at all times. Observe, Though express Scripture does not occur, or be not brought for every word, or look, or fashion in particular, yet general rules there are, according to which all must be ordered: 1 Cor. x. 31, "Whatever you do, do all to the glory of God;" and Phil. iv. 8, "Whatever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. And here, whatsoever things are beseeching or unbeseeching, holiness is a measure and rule of carriage to be looked to. "Not false accusers," μὴ ψευδοῦντες, no calumniators or sowers of discord, slandering and backbiting their neighbours, a great and too common fault; not only loving to speak, but to speak ill of people, and to separate very friends. A slanderer is one whose tongue is set on fire of hell; so much, and so directly, do these do the devil's work, that for it the devil's name is given to such. This is a sin contrary to the great duties of love, and justice, and equity, between one another; it springs often from malice and hatred or envy, and such like evil causes, to be shunned as well as the effect. "Not given to much wine;" the word notes such addictedness thereto as to be under the power and mastery of it. This is unseemly and evil in any, but especially in this sex and age, and too much to be found among the Greeks of that time and place. How immodest and shameful, corrupting and destroying purity both of body and mind. Of what evil example and tendency, unfitting for the next thing, which is a positive duty of aged matrons, namely, to be "teachers of good things." Not public preachers, that is forbidden; 1 Cor. xiv. 34, "I permit not a woman to speak in the church;" but otherwise, teach they may and should, namely, by example and good life. Whence observe, Those whose action and carriage are as becomes holiness, are thereby "teachers of good things;" and, beside that, they may and should also teach by doctrinal instruction at home, and in a private way; 1ro. xxxi. 1, "The words of king Lemuel, the prophecy his mother taught him." Such a woman is praised; 1ro. xxxi. 26, "She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness." "Teachers of good things" is opposed to things corrupt, or to what is trifling and vain, of no good use or tendency; old wives' fables, or superstitious sayings and observances; in opposition to these their business is, and they may be called on to it, to be "teachers of good things." For,

3rd. There are lessons for young women also, which the aged women must teach, and instruct, and advise them in; the duties of religion according to their years.

4 That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children, 5 To be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed.

For teaching such things many times they have better access than the men, even than ministers have, and which therefore they must improve in instructing the young women, especially the young wives; for he speaks of their duty to their husbands and children; these young women the more aged must teach.

First. To bear a good personal character, namely, to be sober and discreet, contrary to that vanity and rashness which younger years are subject to; discreet in their judgments, and sober in their affections and carriage. Discreet and chaste stand well together; many expose themselves to fatal temptations by that which at first might be but indiscretion. "Discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee from the evil way," 1ro. ii. 11. "Chaste and keepers at home," are well joined too. Dinah, when she went to see the daughters of the land, lost her chastity. Those whose home is their prison, it is to be feared their chastity is their fetters. Not but occasions there are, and will be, of going abroad; but a gadding temper for merriment and company sake, to the neglect of domestic affairs, or from uneasiness at being in her place, that is the opposite evil intended, which is commonly accompanied with, or draws after it, other evils. "They learn to be idle, wandering from house to house, and not only idle, but tattlers also, and busy-bodies, speaking things which they ought not," 1 Tim. v. 13, 14. Their business is to guide the house, and should give no occasion to the enemy to speak reproachfully. "Good," namely, generally in opposition to all vice; and specially in her place, kind, and helpful, and charitable, as Dorcas, "full of good works, and almsdeeds." Also it may have, as some think, a more particular sense, one of a meek and yet cheerful spirit and temper, not sullen, or bitter, or taunting, or fretting and galling any; not of a troublesome or a jarring disposition, uneasy in herself, and to those about her; but of a good nature and pleasing conversation, and likewise helpful by her advice and pains; thus "building her house, and doing her husband good, and not evil, all her days." Thus, in their personal character, "sober, discreet, chaste, keepers at home, and good." And,

Secondly. In their relative capacities; "To love their husbands," and to be obedient to them. And where there is true love there will be no difficult command. God in nature, and by his will, hath made his subordination. "I suffer not a woman to usurp authority over the man," 1 Tim. ii. 12; and ver. 13, the reason is added, "For Adam was first formed, then Eve." Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression; she fell first, and was the means of seducing the husband. She was given to be an helper, but proved a most grievous hinderer, even the instrument of his fall and ruin, on which the bond of subjection was confirmed and tied faster on her; Gen. iii. 16. "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," namely, with less easiness, it may be, than before. It is therefore doubly enjoined; first in innocence, when was settled, a subordination of nature—Adam being first formed, and then Eve, and the woman being taken out of the man; and then upon the fall, the woman being first in the transgression, and seducing the man; here now began to be a subjection not so easy and comfortable, being part of the penalty in her case, but yet through Christ is this nevertheless a sanctified state; Eph. v. 22, "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord;" as owning Christ's authority in them, whose image they bear; "for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and he is the saviour of the body." God would have a resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, held forth in the husband's over the wife. Christ is the head of the Church, to protect and save it, and to supply it with all good, and secure or deliver it from evil; and so is the husband over the wife, to keep her from injuries, and to provide comfortably for her, according to his ability. Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the "wives be unto their own husbands, as is fit in the Lord," Col. iii. 18; that is, as stands with the law of Christ, and is for his and the Father's glory: It is not then an absolute, or unlimited, or a slavish subjection that is required; but a loving subordination, to prevent disorder or confusion, and to further all the ends of the relation. Thus, in reference unto the husbands, wives must be instructed in the duties of love and subjection to them. "And to love their children," not with a natural affection only, but a spiritual; a love springing from a holy, sanctified heart, and regulated by the word; not a fond foolish love, indulging them in evil, neglecting due reproof and correction where necessary; but it must be a true Christian love, shewing itself in their pious education, which is good;" before the apostle mentions this duty of instructing others, he insists on the personal qualities of governing the tongue and restraining the appetite, intimating thereby that instructions have little weight unless enforced by example. The teaching here spoken of (verses 4, 5) is not public (1 Cor. xiv. 34), but addressed to women by women, probably in house visitation (district visiting). "Discreet" of the Authorised Version is better than "self-restrained," as some would read. There is in the latter, says Alford, an implication of effort which destroys the spontaneity, and brushes off, so to speak, the bloom of this best of female graces. "Keepers at home:" "house-wifely," as Tyndal and Cramer render it. Some MSS. give "workers at home." "That the word of God be not blasphemed:" i.e., "as encouraging wives to neglect their husbands and children on pretence of attending on the offices of religion" (Macknight). "The virtues to be inculcated on women are those of domestic and private life" (Webster and Wilkinson).

forming their life and manners aright, taking care of their souls as well as of their bodies; of their spiritual welfare as well as of their temporal; of the former chiefly, and in the first place. The reason is added, namely, "That the word of God may not be blasphemed." Failures in such relative duties would be greatly to the reproach of Christianity. What are these the better for this their new religion? would the infidels be ready to say. The word of God and Gospel of Christ is pure, and excellent and glorious in itself, and the excellency of it should be expressed and shewn in the lives and carriage of its professors, especially in relative duties. Failures here bring disgrace; Rom. ii. 24, "The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you." Judge what a God he is, would they be ready to say, by these his servants; and what his word, and doctrine, and religion is, by these his followers. Thus would Christ "be wound in the house of his friends." Thus of the duties of the younger women.

6 Young men likewise exhort to be sober minded.

They are apt to be eager and hot, thoughtless and precipitant, therefore must be earnestly called upon and exhorted to be considerate, and not rash; advisable and submissive, not wilful and headstrong; humble and mild, not haughty and proud; for there are more young people ruined by pride than by any other sin. The young in years should be grave and solid in their deportment and manners, joining the seriousness of age with the liveliness and vigour of youth. This will make even those younger years to pass to good purpose, and yield matter of comfortable reflection when the evil days come; it will be preventive of much sin and sorrow, and lay the ground for doing and enjoying much good. Such shall not mourn at the last, but have peace and comfort in death, and after it a glorious crown of life. Now with these instructions to Titus what he should teach others, the aged men and women, and the younger of both sexes, Titus himself probably at this time being a young man also, the apostle inserts,

[Young men should be "steady in their behaviour, superior to sensual temptations, and constant in the exercise of every part of self-government."—Doddridge. The reasons for this are obvious; 1. The hopes of the church depend much on them. 2. A young man who cannot govern himself gives little promise of being useful or happy. 3. Indulgence in the propensities to which young men are prone will, sooner or later, bring ruin to the body and the soul. 4. They are just at the period of life when they are exposed to peculiar temptations, and when they need to exercise a peculiar guardianship over their own conduct. 5. Like others, they may soon die; and they should be habitually in such a frame of mind as to be prepared to stand before God. A young man who feels that he may be soon in the eternal world cannot but be sensible of the propriety of having a serious mind, and of living and acting as in the immediate presence of his Maker and Judge.]

5th. Some direction to himself. He could not expect so successfully to teach others if he carried not himself well both in his conversation and preaching.

7 In all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, 8 Sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you.

First. Here is direction for his conversation: "In all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works;" without this he would pull down with one hand what he built with the other. Observe, Preachers of good works must be patterns of them also; good doctrine and good life must go together. "Thou that teacheth another, teacheth thou not thyself?" A defect here is a great blemish, and a great hindrance. "In all things," some read 'above all things,' or, 'above all men.' Instructing and informing others in the particulars of their duty is necessary, and above all things example, especially that of the teacher himself, is needful; hereby both light and influence are more likely to go together. Let them see a lively image of those virtues and graces in thy life which must be in theirs. Example may both teach and impress the things taught. When they see purity and gravity, sobriety and all good life, in thee, they may be more easily won and brought thereto themselves; they may become pious and holy, sober and righteous, as thou art. Ministers must be examples to the flock, and the people "followers of them as they are of Christ." And here is direction,

Secondly. For his teaching and doctrine, as well as for his life. "In doctrine, shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech that cannot be condemned." They must make it appear that the design of their preaching is purely to advance the honour of God, and interest of Christ and his kingdom, and the welfare and happiness of souls; that it was not with secular views this office was entered into, or is used, not from ambition or covetousness, but a pure aim at the spiritual ends of its institution. In their preaching, therefore, the display of wit, or parts, or of human learning or oratory, is not to be affected; but "sound speech" must be used, "which cannot be condemned;" Scripture language, as far as well may be, in expressing Scripture truths. This is "sound speech that cannot be condemned." We have more than once these duties of a minister set together; 1 Tim. iv. 16, "Take heed to thyself, and to thy doctrine;" and ver. 12 of the same chapter, "Let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an example of believers in word." In thy speech, as a Christian, being grave and serious, and to the use of edifying; and in thy preaching, that it be the pure word of God, or what is agreeable to it, and founded on it: thus be an example in word, and in conversation, the life corresponding with the doctrine. In doing this "thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee." In 2 Tim. iii. 10, "Thou hast fully known my doctrine, and the manner of life," said the same apostle, namely, how agreeable these have been. And so must it be with others; their teaching must be agreeable with the word, and their life with their teaching. This is the true and good minister; 1 Thes. ii. 9, 10, "Labouring night and day, we preached to you the Gospel of God; and ye are our witnesses, and God also, how holy, and justly, and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you." This must be looked to, as the next words shew: which are

Thirdly. The reason both for the strictness of the minister's life and the gravity and soundness of his preaching. "That he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." Adversaries would be seeking occasion to reflect, and would do so, could they find any thing amiss in doctrine or life; but if both were right and good, such ministers might set calumny itself at defiance; they would have no evil thing to say justly, and so must be ashamed of their opposition. Observe, Faithful ministers will have enemies watching for their halting, such as will endeavour to find or pick holes in their teaching or behaviour; the more need therefore for them to look to themselves, that no just occasion be found against them. Opposition and calumny perhaps may not be escaped. Men of corrupt minds will resist the truth, and often reproach the preachers and professors of it; but let them see that "with well doing they put to silence the ignorance of foolish men; that when they speak evil of them as evil doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse their good conversation in Christ." This is the direction to Titus himself, and so of the duties of free persons, male and female, old and young. Then follows,

6th. The directions respecting servants.

9 Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again; 10 Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

Servants must not think their mean and low state puts them beneath God's notice, or the obligation of his laws; that because they are servants of men they are thereby discharged from serving of God. No. Servants must know and do their duty to their earthly masters, but with an eye to their heavenly one; and Titus must not only instruct and warn earthly masters of their duties, but servants also of theirs, both in his public preaching and private admonitions. Servants must attend the ordinances of God for their instruction and comfort as well as the masters themselves. In this direction to Titus there are the duties themselves to which he must exhort servants, and a weighty consideration wherewith he was to enforce them.

First. The duties themselves are these:—

1st. "To be obedient to their own masters." This is the prime duty, that by which they are characterised; Rom. vi. 16, "His servants ye are to whom ye obey." There must be inward subjection, and dutiful respect and reverence in the mind and thoughts. "If I be a master, where is my fear?" saith God; that is, the dutiful affection you shew to me, together with the suitable outward significations and expressions of it, in doing what I command you. This must be in servants; their will must be subject to their master's will, and their time and labour at their master's disposal and command; 1 Pet. ii. 18, "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward." The duty results from the will of God, and the relation in which, by his providence, he hath put such, not from the quality of the person; if he be a master, the duties of a servant are to be paid to him as such. Servants, therefore, are to be exhorted to be obedient to their own masters; and,

2nd. "To please them well in all things," that is, in all lawful things, and such as belong to them to command, or, at least, as are not contrary to the will of their great and superior Lord. We are not to understand it either of obeying or pleasing them absolutely, without any limitation, but always with a reserve of God's right, which may in no case be intrenched upon. If his command and the earthly master's come in competition, we are instructed to obey God rather than man; but servants then must be upon good grounds in this, that there is an inconsistency, else are they not held to be excused; and not only must the will of God be the measure of the servant's obedience, but the reason of it also; all must be done with a respect to him, and in virtue of his authority, and for pleasing him primarily and chiefly; Col. iii. 22—24, "Servants, obey in all things your masters, according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but with singleness of heart, fearing God. And whatever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ." In serving the earthly master according to Christ's will he is served; and such shall be rewarded by him accordingly. But, Q. How are servants to please their masters in all things, and yet not be men-pleasers? A. Men-pleasers in the faulty sense are such as eye men alone, or chiefly, in what they do, leaving God out, or subordinating him to man; when the will of man shall carry it, though against God's will, or man's pleasure is more regarded than his; when that can content them, that the earthly master is pleased though God be displeased; or more care or more satisfaction is taken in man's being pleased than in God's: this is sinful man-pleasing, which all must take heed of; Eph. vi. 5—7, "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, with singleness of your heart, as unto Christ: not with eye-service as men-pleasers," who look at nothing but the favour or displeasure of men, or nothing so much as that, "but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with goodwill doing service as to the Lord, and not to men," namely, not to them chiefly, but to Christ, who requires and who will reward any good done, whether by bond or free. Observe, Therefore Christian liberty stands well with civil servitude and subjection. Persons may serve men, and yet be the servants of Christ; these are not contrary, but subordinate, so far as serving men is according to Christ's will, and for his sake. Christ came not to destroy or prejudice civil order and differences; "Art thou called, being a servant? Care not for it," 1 Cor. vii. 21. Let not that trouble thee, as if it were a condition unworthy of a Christian, or wherein the person so called is less pleasing unto God; "For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman," not free from that service, but free in it; free spiritually, though not in a civil sense. "Likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant," he is bound to him, though he be not under civil subjection to any; so that "bond or free, all are one in Christ." Servants therefore should not regret, or be troubled at their condition, but be faithful and cheerful in the station wherein God hath set them, striving to please their masters in all things. Hard it may be under some churlish Nabals, but must be endeavoured all that they are able.

3rd. "Not answering again," not contradicting them, or disputing it with them; not giving them any disrespectful or provoking language. Job complained of his servants, that he "called them, and they gave him no answer;" and that was faulty another way. Non respondere pro convito est,—"such silence is contempt;" but here it is respect, rather to take a check or reproof with humble silence, not making any confident or bold replies. When conscious of a fault, to palliate or stand in justification of it, doubles it. Yet this not answering again excludes not turning away wrath with a soft answer, when season and circumstances admit. God and wise masters will be ready to hear, and do right; but answering unseasonably, or in an unseemly manner, or where the case admits not excuse to be pert or confident, shews want of such humility and meekness, which such relation requires.

4th. "Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity." This is another great essential of good servants, to be honest; never converting that to their own use which is their master's, nor wasting the goods they are intrusted with; that is purloining. They must be just and true, and do for them as they would or should for themselves; Pr. xxviii. 24, "Whoso robbeth his father or his mother, and saith it is no transgression, the same is the companion of a destroyer;" he will be ready to join with them. Thus, having such light thoughts of taking beyond what is right, though it be from a parent or master, is like to harder

ii. 7. The Sinaitic and Alexandrine MSS. omit "sincerity." "Uncorruptness;" this word may refer to the teaching of Titus, or to his motive in teaching. In the one case it would imply that he was to set forth "uncorruptness" or purity as to be striven after, in the other that his motive in teaching must be pure, disinterested.

ii. 8. "No evil thing to say of you:" many of the best MSS. read "to say of us." The apostle feels that any unsound teaching on the part of Titus would reflect discredit on him as well as on Titus.

ii. 9: "To please them well;" as it is commonly expressed now "to give satisfaction."

ii. 11. The connection is wrong in the Authorised Version; it should read, "For the grace of God, bringing salvation to all men, has been manifested." The reason for the foregoing exhortations from verse 1.

ii. 12. "Teaching" or disciplining us, in order that, denying ungodliness, &c. "Grace exercises its discipline on us (Heb. xii. 6) conscience to go farther; it is both wicked in itself, and it tends to more. Be it so that the master is hard and strait, scarce making sufficient provision for servants, yet may they not be their own carvers, or go about by theft to right themselves? They must bear their lot, committing their cause to God for righting and providing for them. I speak not of cases of extremity, for preserving life, the necessities for which the servant hath a right to. "Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity." He must not only not steal or waste, but must improve his master's goods, and promote his prosperity and thriving what he can. He that increased not his master's talent is accused of unfaithfulness, though he had not embezzled or lost it. Faithfulness in a servant lies in ready, punctual, and thorough executing his master's orders; keeping his secrets and counsels, dispatching his affairs, and managing with frugality, and to as much just advantage for his master as he is able; looking well to his trusts, and preventing what he can all spoil, or loss, or damage. This is a way to bring a blessing upon himself, as the contrary often brings utter ruin; Lu. xvi. 12, "If you have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" Thus of the duties themselves, to which servants are to be exhorted. Then,

Secondly. Here is the consideration with which Titus was to enforce them; "That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things;" that is, that they may recommend the Gospel, and Christ's holy religion, to the good opinion of them that are without, by their meek, humble, obedient and faithful carriage in all things. Even servants, though they may think that such as they, in so low and inferior a condition, can do little to bring repute to Christianity, or adorn the doctrine of Christ, and set forth the excellencies of his truth and ways, yet, if they are careful to do their duty, it will redound to the glory of God, and credit of religion. The unbelieving masters would think the better of that despised way, which was every where spoken against, when they found that their servants which were Christians were better than their other servants; more obedient and submissive, more just and faithful and diligent in their places. True religion is an honour to it, but adorn it rather in all that they are able. Our light must "shine among men, so that they seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in heaven." And thus of the apostle's directions to Titus, about the discharge of his office, in reference to several sorts of persons. Next follow,

3. The grounds or considerations upon which all the directions are urged, taken from the nature and design of the Gospel, and the end of Christ's death.

11 For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, 12 Teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; 13 Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; 14 Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

1st. Here are motives from the nature and design of the Gospel. Let young and old, men and women, masters and servants, and Titus himself. Let all sorts do their respective duties, for this is the very aim and business of Christianity, to instruct, and help, and form persons, under all distinctions and relations, to a right frame and carriage. For this,

First. They are put under the dispensation of the grace of God; so the Gospel is called, Eph. iii. 2. It is grace in respect of the spring of it, the free favour and goodwill of God, not any merit or desert in the creature, and as manifesting and declaring this goodwill in an eminent and signal manner; and as it is the means of conveying and working grace in the hearts of believers. Now grace is obliging and constraining to goodness; "Let not sin reign, but yield yourselves unto God; for you are not under the law, but under grace," Rom. vi. 12-14. "The love of Christ constrains us," namely, not to live to self, but to him, 2 Cor. v. 14, 15; without this effect grace is received in vain.

Secondly. This gospel grace brings salvation; it reveals, and offers, and ensures it to believers. Salvation from sin and wrath, from death and hell; whence it is called the word of life. It brings to faith, and so to life; the life of holiness now, and of happiness hereafter. The law is the ministration of death, but the Gospel the ministration of life and peace. This, therefore, must be received as salvation, its rules minded, its commands obeyed, that the end of it may be obtained, the salvation of the soul. And more inexcusable will the neglectors of this grace of God bringing salvation now be, since,

Thirdly. It "hath appeared," or shone out, namely, more clearly and illustriously than ever before. The old dispensation was comparatively dark and shadowy, this is a clear and shining light; and as it is now more bright, so more diffused and extensive also. For,

Fourthly. It "hath appeared unto all men;" not to the Jews only, as the glory of God appeared at mount Sinai to that particular people, but out of the ken of all others; but gospel grace is open to all, and all are invited to come and partake of the benefit of it, Gentiles as well as Jews. The publication of it is free and general. "Disciple all nations; preach the Gospel to every creature." The pale is broken down, there is no such inclosure now as formerly. "The preaching of Jesus Christ, which was kept secret since the world began, now is made manifest, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith," Rom. xvi. 25, 26. The doctrine of grace and salvation by the Gospel is for all ranks and conditions of men, slaves and servants as well as masters; therefore engaging and encouraging all to receive and believe it, and walk suitably to it, adorning it in all things.

Fifthly. This gospel revelation is to teach, and not by way of information and instruction only, as a schoolmaster does his scholars; but by way of precept and command, as a sovereign that gives laws unto his subjects. It directs what to shun, and what to follow: what to avoid and what to do. The Gospel is not for speculation only or chiefly, but for practice and right ordering of life. It teaches,

1st. To abandon sin; "Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts." To renounce and have no more to do with these as we have had. "Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt;" that is, the whole body of sins, distributed here into ungodliness and worldly lusts. Put away ungodliness and irreligion, all unbelief, neglect, or disrespect of the Divine Being, not loving, or fearing, or trusting in him, or obeying him as we should, neglecting his ordinances, slighting his worship, profaning his name or day, &c. Thus "ungodliness," that is, hate and put it away. "And worldly lusts;" all corrupt and vicious desires and affections that prevail in worldly men, and carry out to worldly things. "The lusts of the flesh, and of the eye, and the pride of life." All sensuality and filthiness, covetous desires and ambition, seeking and valuing more the praise of men than of God;—put away all these. An earthly, sensual conversation suits not a heavenly calling; "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." They have done it by covenant engagement and promise, and have initially and prevalently done it in act, and are going on in the work, cleansing themselves more and more from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. Thus the Gospel first unteaches that which is evil, to abandon sin; and then,

2nd. To make conscience of that which is good; "To live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Religion is not made up of negatives only, there must be doing good as well as eschewing evil; in these conjunctly is sincerity proved, and the Gospel adorned. We should live soberly with respect to ourselves, in the due government of our appetites and passions, keeping the limits of moderation and temperance, avoiding all inordinate excesses. Righteously toward all men; rendering to all their due, and injuring none, but rather doing good to others according to our ability and their need. This seems a part of justice and righteousness, for we are not born for ourselves alone, and therefore may not live only to ourselves. "We are members one of another," and "must seek every man another's wealth," 1 Cor. x. 24; xii. 25. The public especially, which includes the interests of all, must have the regards of all. Selfishness is a sort of unrighteousness, it robs others of that share in us which is their due. How amiable, then, will a just and righteous carriage be! It secures and promotes all interests, not particular only, but general and public, and so makes for the peace and happiness of the world. Live righteously, therefore, as well as soberly; and godly towards God, in the duties of his worship and service. Regards to him, indeed, should run through all; 1 Cor. x. 31, "Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." Personal and relative duties must be done in obedience to his command, with due aim at pleasing and honouring him, from principles of holy love and fear of him. But there is an express and direct duty also that we owe to God, namely, belief and acknowledgment of his being and perfections, paying him internal and external worship and homage; loving, and fearing, and trusting in him, and depending on him, and devoting ourselves to him; observing all those religious duties and ordinances that he hath appointed, praying to him, and praising of him, meditating on his word and works. This is godliness, looking and coming to God, as our state now is, not immediately, but as he has manifested himself in Christ; so does the Gospel direct and require. To go to God any other way, namely, by saints or angels, is unsuitable, yea, contrary to the gospel rule and warrant. All communications from God to us are through his Son, and our returns must also be by him. God in Christ we must look at, as the object of our hope and worship. Thus must we exercise ourselves to godliness, without which there can be no adorning that Gospel which is according to it, which teaches and requires such a deportment. A gospel conversation must needs be a godly conversation, expressing our love, and fear, and reverence of God; our hope, and trust, and confidence in him, as manifested in his Son. "We are the circumcision," who have in truth what was signified by that sacrament, "who worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." See in how little a compass our duty is comprised; it is put in a few words, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." The Gospel teaches us not only how to believe and hope well, but also to live well, as becomes that faith and hope in this present world, and as expectants of another and better. There is "the world that now is, and that which is to come;" the present is the time and place of our trial, and the Gospel teaches us to live well here, not as our final state, but with an eye chiefly to a future. For,

3rd. It teaches in all to look for the glories of another world, to which the sober, righteous, and godly life in this is preparative; "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Hope, by a metonymy, is put for the thing hoped for, namely, heaven and the felicity thereof, called emphatically that hope, because it is the great thing we look, and long, and wait for; and a blessed hope, because when attained we shall be completely happy for ever. "And the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." This notes both the time of the accomplishing our hope and the sureness and greatness of it; it will be at the second appearing of Christ, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels, Lu. ix. 26. His own glory, which he had before the world was; and his Father's, being "the express image of his person," and God-man, his delegated Ruler and Judge; and of the holy angels, as his ministers and glorious attendants. His first coming was in meanness, to satisfy justice, and purchase happiness; his second will be in majesty, to bestow and instate his people in it. "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation," Heb. ix. 28. "The great God and our Saviour" (or "even our Saviour") "Jesus Christ;" for they are not two subjects, but one only, as appears by the single article, τὸ θεῶν καὶ τοῦ σωτῆρος, not καὶ τοῦ σωτῆρος, and so is καὶ rendered, 1 Cor. xv. 24. "When he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father;" τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρί. [See Bloomfield, Rec. Syn., and Notes, in loc. He contends that the meaning is, "the glorious appearance of that Great Being who is our God and Saviour." The arguments for this opinion are well summed up by Bloomfield.] Christ, then, is the great God, not figuratively, as magistrates and others are sometimes called gods, or as appearing and acting in the name of God, but properly and absolutely the true God, 1 Jno. v. 20; "The mighty God," Isa. ix. 6; "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God," Phil. ii. 6. In his second coming he will reward his servants, and bring them to glory with him. Observe, (1.) There is a common and blessed hope for all true Christians in the other world. "If in this life only they had hope in Christ, they were of all men the most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19. By hope is meant the thing hoped for, namely, Christ himself, who is called our hope, 1 Tim. i. 1, and blessedness in and through him, even riches of glory, Eph. i. 18, hence fitly termed here that blessed hope. (2.) The design of the Gospel is to stir up all to a good life, by this blessed hope; 1 Pet. i. 13. "Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." To the same purpose here, "Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for the blessed hope; not as mercenaries, but as dutiful and thankful Christians. "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening to the coming of the day of God," 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12. "Looking and hastening," that is, expecting and diligently preparing for it. (3.) At and in the glorious appearing of Christ will the blessed hope of Christians be attained; for their felicity will be that, "to be where he is, and to behold his glory," Jno. xvi. 24. The glory of "the great God and our Saviour" will then break out as the sun. Though in the exercise of his judiciary power he will appear as the Son of man, yet will he be mightily declared to be the Son of God too; the divinity, that on earth was much veiled, will shine out then as the sun in its strength. Hence the work and design of the Gospel is to raise the heart to wait for this second appearing of Christ. "We are begotten again to a lively before its benefits can be fully felt or thankfully acknowledged; the heart must be rectified, and the affections chastened, before sanctifying grace can have its full issues" (Ellicott).

ii. 13. "The glorious appearing;" rather, "the manifestation of the glory." There has been considerable discussion whether the next words should be as in the Authorised Version, or "of the great God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ." The Greek Fathers and others support the Authorised Version; but Alford combats this with much force, and is supported by many modern commentators. The strength of the testimony to our Lord's divinity is almost equally great in either case. In the first he is identified with "the great God," in the second he is placed by his side as his equal in glory, which would be a blasphemous assertion if it referred to any human being.

ii. 14. "A peculiar people;" i.e., peculiarly his own, as Israel of old (Exod. xix. 5; Psa. cxxxv. 4).

iii. 1. "Put them in mind;" they knew their duty, but were apt hope of it." 1 Pet. i. 3; turned "to serve the living God, and wait for his Son from heaven." 1 Thes. i. 9, 10. Christians are marked by this, "expecting their Master's coming," Lu. xii. 36; "loving his appearance," 2 Tim. iv. 8. Look we then to this hope; let our loins be girt, and our lights burning, and ourselves like those that wait for our Lord. The day or hour we know not, but "he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry," Heb. x. 37. (4.) The comfort and joy of Christians is, that their Saviour is "their great God," and will gloriously manifest himself at his second coming. Power and love, majesty and mercy, will then appear together in highest lustre, to the terror and confusion of the wicked, but to the everlasting triumph and rejoicing of the godly. Were he not thus "the great God," and not a mere creature, he could not be their Saviour, nor their hope. Thus far of the considerations to enforce the directions for all sorts to their respective duties, from the nature and design of the Gospel, which is to teach and persuade to those things. And herewith is connected another ground, namely,

2nd. From the end of Christ's death; ver. 14, "Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." To bring us to holiness and happiness was the end of Christ's death, as well as the scope of his doctrine. Here we have,

First. The purchaser of salvation: "Who," that is, Jesus Christ, "that great God and our Saviour," who saves, not simply as God, much less as man alone; but as God-man, two natures in one person: man, that he might obey, and suffer, and die for man, and be meet to deal with him and for him; and God, that he might support the manhood, and give worth and efficacy to his undertakings, and have due regard to the rights and honour of the Deity, as well as the good of his creature, and bring about the latter to the glory of the former. Such an one became one of us; and this was,

Secondly. The price of our redemption, "He gave himself;" the Father gave him, but he gave himself too; and in the freeness and voluntariness, as well as the greatness of the offering, lay the acceptableness and merit of it; Jno. x. 17, 18, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself;" so Jno. xvii. 19, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," that is, separate and devote myself to this work, to be both a priest and a sacrifice to God for the sins of men. The human nature was the offering, and the Divine the altar, sanctifying the gift, and the whole the act of the person. "He gave himself a ransom for all," 1 Tim. ii. 6; "Once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." He was the priest and sacrifice too. "We are redeemed not with silver and gold, but the precious blood of Christ," 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; called the blood of God, Acts xx. 28, that is, of him who is God.

Thirdly. The persons for whom. For us; namely, poor perishing sinners, gone off from God, and turned rebels against him. He gave himself for us, not only for our good, but in our stead. Messiah was cut off, not for himself, but for us; "He suffered, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God," 1 Pet. iii. 18. He "was made sin for us," that is, an offering and sacrifice for sin, "that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. v. 21. Wonderful condescension and grace! "He loved us, and gave himself for us;" what can we do less than love and give up ourselves to him? especially considering,

Fourthly. The ends of his giving himself for us; namely, 1st. "That he might redeem us from all iniquity." This is fitted to the first lesson, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts;" Christ gave himself to redeem us from these, therefore put them away. To love and live in sin is to trample under foot redeeming blood, to despise and reject one of the greatest benefits of it, and to act counter to its design. But, Q. How could the short sufferings of Christ redeem us from all iniquity? A. Through the infinite dignity of his person. He, who was God, suffered, though not as God. The acts and properties of either nature are attributed to the person. "God purchased" his church "with his own blood," Acts xx. 28. Could payment be made at once, no need of suffering for ever. A mere creature could not do this, from the finiteness of his nature; but God-man could. "The great God and our Saviour gave himself for us;" that accounts for it. "By one offering he hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified," Heb. ix. 25, 26. He needed not to offer himself often, nor could he be holden of death, when he had once undergone it. Happy end and fruit of Christ's death, by redemption from all iniquity! Christ died for this. And,

2nd. "To purify to himself a peculiar people." This enforces the second lesson: "To live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world." Christ died to purify, as well as to pardon; to obtain grace, to heal the nature, as well as to free from guilt and condemnation. He gave himself for his church to cleanse it. Thus does he make "to himself a peculiar people," by purifying of them. Thus are they distinguished from the world that lies in wickedness; they are born of God and assimilated to him, bear his image, are holy as their heavenly Father is holy. Observe, Redemption from sin and sanctification of the nature go together, and both make a peculiar people unto God; freedom from guilt and condemnation, and from the power of lusts, and purification of soul by the Spirit. These are "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, and so a peculiar people," And,

3rd. "Zealous of good works." This peculiar people, as they are made so by grace purifying them, so must they be seen to be so, by doing good, and a zeal therein. Observe, The Gospel is not a doctrine of licentiousness, but of holiness and good life. We are redeemed from our vain conversation to serve God "in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life." See we then that we do good, and have zeal in it; only looking that zeal be guided by knowledge, and spirited with love, directed to the glory of God, and always in some good thing; and thus of the motive to the duties directed, from the end of Christ's death. Then,

4th. The apostle closeth the chapter, as he began it, with a summary direction to Titus upon the whole.

15 These things speak, and exhort, and rebuke with all authority. Let no man despise thee.

Here is the matter and manner of the ministers' teaching, and a special instruction to Titus in reference to himself.

First. The matter of ministers' teaching; "These things," namely, the before-mentioned, not Jewish fables and traditions, but the truths and duties of the Gospel, of avoiding sin, and "living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Observe, Ministers in their preaching must keep close to the word of God; 1 Pet. iv. 11, "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God," and not the figments and inventions of his own brain.

Secondly. The manner; namely, by "doctrine, and exhortation, and reproof with all authority," 2 Tim. iii. 16. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness;" that is, to teach sound doctrine, to convince of sin, and refute error, to reform the life, and to carry forward in what is just and good, "that the man of God," Christian or minister, "may be perfect, thoroughly furnished to all good works," namely, that are to be practised by himself, or to be taught others. Here is what will furnish for all parts of his duty, and the right discharge of them. "These things speak," or teach; shun not to declare the whole counsel of God. The great and necessary truths and duties of the Gospel especially, these "speak and exhort," παρακαλεῖται,—press with much earnestness. Ministers must not be cold and lifeless in delivering heavenly doctrine and precepts, as if they were indifferent things, or of little concern; but they must urge them with earnestness suitable to their nature and importance. They must call upon persons to mind and heed, and not be "hearers only, deceiving themselves, but doers of the word, that they may be blessed therein." And rebuke, convince and reprove such as contradict, or gainsay, or neglect, and receive not the truth as they should, or retain it in unrighteousness; those who hear it not with such a believing and obedient mind and heart as they ought, but instead of that, it may be, live in contrary practices, shewing themselves stubborn and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate. "Rebuke with all authority," as coming in the name of God, and armed with his threatenings and discipline, which, whoever make light of, at their peril it will be. Ministers are reprovers in the gate.

Thirdly. Here is a special instruction to Titus in reference to himself; "Let no man despise thee," that is, give no occasion to do so, nor suffer it without reproof, considering "he that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God." Or, "thus speak, and exhort, these things;" press them upon all, as they may respectively be concerned; with boldness and faithfulness reprove sin; and carefully look to thyself, and thy own carriage, and then none will despise thee. The most effectual way for ministers to secure themselves from contempt is to keep close to the doctrine of Christ, and imitate his example; to preach and live well, and do their duty with prudence and courage; this will best preserve both their reputation and comfort. Perhaps too an admonition might be here intended to the people; that Titus, though young, and but a substitute of the apostle, yet should not be contemned by them; but considered and respected as a faithful minister of Christ, and encouraged and supported in his work and office; 1 Thes. v. 12, 13, "Know them that labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and esteem them very highly in love, for their work's sake." Mind their teaching, respect their persons, support them in their function, and what in you lies further their endeavours for the honour of God and the salvation of souls.

CHAPTER III.

Of duties which concern Christians more in common, and the reasons of them, ver. 1—8. What Titus in teaching should avoid, and how he should deal with a heretic, with some other directions, ver. 9—14. And salutations in the close, ver. 15.

UT them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work, 2 To speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, shewing all meekness unto all men.

Fourthly. Here is the fourth thing in the matter of the epistle. The apostle had directed Titus in reference to the particular and special duties of several sorts of persons; now he bids him exhort to what concerned them more in common, namely, to quietness and submission to rulers, and readiness to do good, and to equitable and gentle behaviour towards all men; things comely and ornamental of religion; he must therefore put them in mind of such things. Ministers are people's remembrancers of their duty; as they are remembrancers for the people to God in prayers, Isa. lxii. 6, so are they from God to them in preaching; 2 Pet. i. 12, "I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance." Forgetfulness of duty is a common frailty; there is need therefore of minding and quickening them thereto. Here are the duties themselves, and the reasons of them.

1. The duties themselves, which they were to be minded of. 1st. "Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates." Magistracy is God's ordinance for the good of all, and therefore must be regarded and submitted to by all; not for wrath and by force only, but willingly and for conscience' sake. "Principalities, and powers, and magistrates," that is, all civil rulers, whether supreme and chief, or subordinate in the government under which they live, of whatever form it be, that they be subject to them and obey them, namely, in things lawful and honest, and that belong to their office to require. The Christian religion was misrepresented by its adversaries as prejudicial to the rights of princes and civil powers, and tending to faction and sedition, and to rebellion against lawful authority; therefore, "to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," and stop the mouths of malicious enemies, Christians must be minded to shew themselves examples rather of all due subjection and obedience to the government that is over them. Natural desire of liberty must be guided and bounded by reason and Scripture. Spiritual privileges do not make void or weaken, but confirm and strengthen, their obligations to civil duties. Mind them, therefore, "to be subject to principalities and powers, and to obey magistrates." And,

2nd. "To be ready to every good work." Some refer this to such good works as are required by magistrates, and within their sphere; whatever tends to good order, and to promote and secure public tranquillity and peace, be not backward but ready to promote such things. But though this be included, if not first intended, yet is it not to be hereto restrained; it respects doing good in all kinds, and on every occasion that may offer, whether respecting God, ourselves, or our neighbour; what may bring credit to religion in the world. "Whatever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, of good report; if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, think on these things," Phil. iv. 8, namely, to do, and follow, and further them. Mere harmlessness, or good words, and good meanings only, are not enough without good works. Of pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction, and keep unspotted from the world." Not only take, but seek occasion for doing good, keep fitness and readiness that way, put it not off to others, but embrace and lay hold on it thyself, delight and rejoice therein, put all in mind of all this. And,

3rd. "To speak evil of no man;" ὀνειδίζεσθαι, 'to revile,' or 'curse,' or 'blaspheme none;' or, (as our translation more generally) "to speak evil of to forget it. The fact of Cretan turbulence is established by the testimony of Diodorus Siculus.

iii. 4. "Kindness;" it is difficult to render the full meaning of the Greek word into English. Wickliffe's and the Rheims versions give "benignity," of which Jerome writes, "Benignity is a gentle virtue, kind, calm, and fitted for the society of all that is good" (Trench, "New Testament Synonyms").

iii. 5. Not the "washing" but the "bath" or "laver of regeneration." Here the baptismal font; the visible instrument put for the invisible grace. "The apostles were accustomed to draw an argument from the sacraments to prove the thing therein signified, because it should be a recognised principle amongst the devout that God does not mock us with empty signs, but by his power makes good inwardly that which he demonstrates by the outward sign. Wherefore baptism is congruously and truly called the laver of regeneration. It will rightly hold the power and utility of sacranone," unjustly, and falsely, or unnecessarily, without call, and when it may do hurt, but no good to the person himself or any other. If no good can be spoken, rather than speak evil unnecessarily, say nothing. We must never take pleasure in speaking ill of others, or make the worst of any thing, but the best that we can. We must not "go up and down as tale bearers," carrying ill-natured stories, to the prejudice of our neighbour's good name, and destruction of brotherly love. Misrepresentations, or ill insinuations of bad intent, or of hypocrisy in what is done, things out of our reach, or cognizance, these come within the reach of this prohibition. An evil this is, as too common, so of great malignity; Jas. i. 26, "If any man seemeth to be religious, and brideth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain." Such loose, uncharitable talk, is displeasing to God, and hurtful among men; Pr. xvii. 9, "He that covereth a transgression seeketh love," namely, to himself by this tenderness and charity, or rather to the transgressor, "but he that repeateth a matter," who blazes and tells the faults of another abroad, "separateth very friends;" he raiseth dissensions, and alienates his friend from himself and perhaps from others: this is among the sins to be put off, Eph. iv. 31, or if indulged, unfit for Christian communion here, and the society of the blessed in heaven, 1 Cor. vi. 10. Mind them therefore to avoid this. And,

4th. "To be no brawlers;" ἀμαχοὺς εἶναι,—"no fighters," either with hand or tongue; that is, no quarrelsome, contentious persons, apt to give or return ill and provoking language. A holy contending there is for matters good and important, and in a manner suitable and becoming, not with wrath or injurious violence. Christians must follow the things that make for peace, and that in a peaceful, not a rough, and boisterous, and hurtful way, but as becomes the servants of the God of peace and love. "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath," Rom. xii. 19. This is the Christian's wisdom and duty. The glory of a man is to pass over a transgression; the duty of a reasonable, and therefore to be sure of a Christian man, whose reason is improved and advanced by religion. Such may not, will not, presently fall foul on one that hath offended him; but, like God, will be "slow to anger, and ready to forgive." Contention and strife arises from men's lusts, and exorbitant, unruly passions, which must be curbed and moderated, not indulged; and Christians need to be minded of these things, that they do not by a wrathful contentious spirit and carriage displease and dishonour God, and discredit religion, promoting feuds in the places where they live. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty," and he that "ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city." Wherefore it follows,

5th. "But gentle;" ἐπιεικής,—"equitable and just," or candid and fair in constructions of things, not taking words or actions in the worst sense; and for peace sometimes yielding somewhat of strict right. And,

6th. "Shewing all meekness to all men." We must be of a mild disposition, and not only having meekness in our hearts, but shewing it in our speeches and carriage. "All meekness," that is, meekness in all instances and occasions, not towards friends only, but "to all men," though still with wisdom, as James admonishes, Jas. iii. 13. Distinguish the person and the sin, pity the one and hate the other. And so of sin and sin; look not on all alike, there are motives and beams. And of sinner and sinner; "Of some have compassion, others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire, thus making a difference," Jude 22, 23. Mind these things; "The wisdom that is from above is pure and peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated." Meekness of spirit and carriage renders religion amiable; it is a commanded imitation of Christ the grand exemplar, and what brings its own reward with it in the ease and comfort of the disposition itself, and the blessings accompanying it. These shall be glad and rejoice, shall be taught and guided in their way, and satisfied with bread, and beautified with salvation.

Thus of the duties themselves which Titus was to put people in mind of, for which,

2. He adds the reasons,

1st. From their own past condition, which he next describes,

3 For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.

Observe, Consideration of men's natural condition is a great means and ground of equity, and gentleness, and all meekness towards those who are yet in such a state. This hath aptness to abate pride, and to work pity and hope in reference to those who are yet unconverted; we ourselves also were so and so, corrupt and sinful, therefore we should not be impatient and bitter, hard and severe toward those who are but as ourselves once were. Would we then have been contemned, and proudly and rigorously dealt with? No, but would have been treated with gentleness and humanity, and therefore should we now so treat those who are unconverted, according to that rule of equity, Quod tibi non vis fieri, alteri ne feceris,—"What you would not have done to you, that do not you to another." Their past natural condition is set forth in divers particulars. "We ourselves also were sometimes,"

First. "Foolish;" without true spiritual understanding and knowledge, ignorant of heavenly things. Observe, They should be most disposed to bear with others' follies who may remember many of their own; they should be meek, and gentle, and patient toward them who once needed, and, doubtless, then expected, the same. "We ourselves also were sometimes foolish." And,

Secondly. "Disobedient;" heady and unpersuadable, resisting the word, and rebellious, even against the natural laws of God, and those which human society requires. Well are these set together, foolish and disobedient. For what folly like this to disobey God and his laws, natural or revealed? This is contrary to right reason, and men's true and greatest interests; and what so foolish as to violate and go counter to these?

Thirdly. "Deceived;" or wandering; namely, out of the ways of truth and holiness. Man in this his degenerate state is of a straying nature, thence compared to a lost sheep; this must be sought and brought back, and guided in the right way, Ps. cxix. 176. He is weak and ready to be imposed upon by the wiles and subtleties of Satan, and of men lying in wait to seduce and mislead.

Fourthly. "Serving divers lusts and pleasures;" namely, as vassals and slaves under them. Observe, 1st. Men deceived are easily entangled and ensnared. They would not otherwise serve divers lusts and pleasures, as they do, were they not blinded and beguiled into it. See here, too, what a different notion the word gives of a sensual and fleshly life from what the world generally hath of it. Carnal people think they enjoy their pleasures; the word calls it servitude and vassalage. They are very drudges and bond slaves under them; so far are they from freedom and felicity in them that they are captivated by them, and serve them as taskmasters and tyrants. 2nd. It is the misery of the servants of sin, that they have many masters, one lust hurrying them one way, and another another; pride commands one thing, covetousness another, and often a contrary. What vile slaves are sinners, while they conceit themselves free? The lusts that tempt them promise them liberty, but in yielding they become the servants of corruption; for "of whom a man is overcome, of the same he is brought into bondage."

Fifthly. "Living in malice;" one of those lusts that bear rule in them. Malice desires hurt to another, and rejoices in it.

Sixthly. "And envy," which grudges and repines at another's good, frets at his prosperity and success in any thing. Both roots of bitterness whence many evils spring; evil thoughts and speeches, "tongues set on fire of hell," detracting from and impairing the just and due praises of others. "Their words are swords" wherewith they slay the good name and honour of their neighbour; the sin of Satan and of Cain, who was of that evil one, and slew his brother,—and wherefore slew he him, but of this envy and malice? "Because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous." These were some of the sins in which we lived in our natural state, And Seventhly. "Hateful," or odious, deserving to be hated.

Eighthly. And "hating one another." Observe, Those that are sinful, that is, living and allowing themselves in sin, are hateful to God and all good men. Their temper and ways are so, though not simply their persons; and it is the misery of sinners that they hate one another, as it is the duty and happiness of saints to love one another. What contentions and quarrels flow from men's corruptions, such as were in the nature of those that by conversion are now good, but in their unconverted state made them ready to run like furious wild beasts one upon another! The consideration of its having been thus with us should moderate our spirits, and dispose us to be more equal and gentle, meek and tender-hearted, towards those who are such. This is the argument from their own past condition here described. And he reasons,

2nd. From their present state. We are delivered out of that our miserable condition by no merit or strength of our own, but only by the mercy and free grace of God, and merit of Christ, and operation of his Spirit; therefore we have no ground in respect of ourselves to condemn those who are yet unconverted, but rather to pity them, and cherish hope concerning them, that they, though in themselves as unworthy and unmeet as we were, yet may obtain mercy, as we have; and so upon this occasion the apostle again opens the causes of our salvation, ver. 4-7.

4 But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared, 5 Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; 6 Which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; 7 That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

First. We have here the prime Author of our salvation; namely, God the Father, therefore termed here "God our Saviour." "All things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ," 2 Cor. v. 18. All things belonging to the new creation and recovery of fallen man to life and happiness, of which he is there speaking, all these things are of God the Father, as contriver and beginner of this work. There is an order in acting as in subsisting. The Father begins, the Son manages, and the Holy Spirit works and perfects, all. God, namely, the Father, is a Saviour by Christ, through the Spirit. "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish, but have everlasting life," Jno. iii. 16. He is the Father of Christ, and through him the Father of mercies; all spiritual blessings are by Christ from him. "We joy in God through Jesus Christ," Eph. i. 3. "And with one mind, and with one mouth, glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," Rom. v. 11.

Secondly. spring and rise of it. The Divine philanthropy or kindness and love of God to man. By grace we are saved from first to last; this is the ground and motive. God's pity and mercy to man in misery was the first wheel, or rather the spirit in the wheels, that sets and keeps them all in motion. God is not, cannot be, moved by any thing out of himself; the occasion is in man, namely, his misery and wretchedness; but sin bringing that misery, wrath might have issued out, rather than compassion; but God knowing how to adjust all with his own honour and perfections, would pity and save rather than destroy. He delights in mercy. "Where sin abounded grace did much more abound." We read of "riches of goodness and mercy," Rom. ii. 4; Eph. ii. 7. Acknowledge we this, and give him the glory of it, not turning it to wantonness, but to thankfulness and obedience.

Thirdly. Here is the means or instrumental cause; namely, the shining out of this love and grace of God in the Gospel, after it appeared, namely in the word. Love and grace appearing hath, through the Spirit, great virtue to soften and change, and turn to God, and so is "the power of God to salvation, to every one that believeth." Thus having asserted God to be the author, his free grace the spring, and the manifestation of this in the Gospel the means of salvation, that the honour of all still may be the better secured to him, Fourthly. False grounds and motives are here removed; "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us;" not for foreseen works of ours, but his own free grace and mercy alone. Works must be in the saved, (where is room for it), but not among the causes of his salvation; they are the way to the kingdom, not the meriting price of it: all is upon the foot of undeserved favour and mercy from first to last. Election is of grace; we are chosen to be holy, not because antecedently seen we would be so, Eph. i. 4. It is the fruit, not the cause of election. "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," 2 Thes. ii. 13. So effectual calling, in which election breaks out and is first seen: "He hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began," 2 Tim. i. 9. We "are justified freely by grace," Rom. iii. 24, and "sanctified and saved by grace." By grace ye are saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God," Eph. ii. 8. Faith and all saving graces are God's free gift and works; the beginning, and increase, and perfection of them in glory, all is from this. In building men up to be a holy temple unto God, from the foundation to the top stone, we must cry nothing but "Grace, grace," unto it. It is "not of works, lest any man should boast; but of grace, that he that glorieth should glory only in the Lord." Thus the true cause is shewn, and the false removed.

Fifthly. Here is the formal cause of salvation, or that wherein it lies, the beginnings of it at least, in regeneration, or spiritual renewing, as it is here called. "Old things pass away, and all things become new," namely, in a moral ments who so connects the reality and the sign as not to make the sign empty and ineffectual; nor yet for the sake of honouring it takes away from the Holy Spirit that which is his" (Calvin). "The sacrament of baptism is selected as being the initiatory rite of discipleship, to represent all the outward means and ordinances, all the hopes and privileges, implied in the condition of discipleship" (Webster and Wilkinson). "And renewing of the Holy Ghost:" "Baptismal regeneration is the distinguishing doctrine of the new covenant, (Matt. iii. 11); but let us take care that we know and bear in mind what baptism means—not the mere ecclesiastical act, not the mere fact of reception by that act among God's professing people, but that completed by the Divine act, manifested by the operation of the Holy Spirit in the heart and through the life" (Alford).

iii. 7. "According to the hope of eternal life:" i.e., consistently with the hope, so that the inheritance does not disappoint, but fully satisfies the hope.

and spiritual, not in a physical and natural sense; it is the same man, but with other dispositions and habits. Evil ones are done away, as to the prevalence of them at present, and all remains of them in due time will be so, namely, when the work shall be perfected in heaven. A new prevailing principle of grace and holiness is wrought, which inclines, and sways, and governs, and makes the man a new man, a new creature; new thoughts, desires, and affections, a new and holy turn of life and actions; the life of God in man, not only from God in a special manner, but conformed and tending to him. Here is salvation begun, and which will be growing and increasing to perfection; therefore it is said, He saved us. What is so begun, as sure to be perfected in time, is expressed as if it already were so. Look we to this therefore without delay; we must be initially saved now by regeneration, if on good ground we would expect complete salvation in heaven. The change then will be but in degree, not in kind. Grace is glory begun, as glory is but grace in its perfection. How few mind this! Most carry it as if they were afraid to be happy before the time. They would have heaven, they pretend, at last, yet care not for holiness now; that is, they would have the end without the beginning, so absurd are sinners; but without regeneration, that is the first resurrection, no attaining the second glorious one, the resurrection of the just. Here then is formal salvation in the new Divine life, wrought by the Gospel.

Sixthly. Here is the outward sign and seal thereof in baptism, called therefore "the washing of regeneration." The work itself is inward and spiritual, but this is outwardly signified and sealed in this ordinance. Water is of a cleansing and purifying nature, does away the filth of the flesh, and so was apt to signify the doing away the guilt and defilement of sin by the blood and spirit of Christ; though that aptness alone, without Christ's institution, had not been sufficient. This it is that makes it of this signification on God's part, a seal of righteousness by faith, as circumcision was, in the place of which it succeeds, and on ours an engagement to be the Lord's. This baptism saves figuratively, and sacramentally, where it is rightly used. "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord," Acts xxii. 16. So Eph. v. 26. "That he might sanctify and cleanse us by the washing of water, by the word." Slight not this outward sign and seal, where it may be had according to Christ's appointment; yet rest not in the outward washing only, but look to the "answer of a good conscience," without which the external washing will avail nothing. The covenant sealed in baptism binds to duties, as well as exhibits and conveys benefits and privileges; if the former be not minded, in vain are the latter expected. Sever not what God has joined, in both the outer and inner parts is baptism complete. As he that was circumcised became debtor to the whole law, Gal. v. 3. so is he that is baptized to the Gospel to observe all the commands and ordinances thereof, as Christ appointed: "Disciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you," Mat. xxviii. 19, 20. This is the outward sign and seal of salvation, baptism, called here "the washing of regeneration."

Seventhly. Here is the principal efficient; namely, the Spirit of God; it is the "renewing of the Holy Ghost;" not excluding the Father and the Son, who in all works without themselves are concurring; nor the use of means, namely, the word and sacraments, by which the Spirit works; through his operation it is that they have their saving effect. In the economy of our salvation the applying and effecting part is specially attributed to the Holy Spirit. We are said "to be born of the Spirit; to be quickened and sanctified by the Spirit; to be led and guided, strengthened and helped, by the Spirit." Through him we mortify sin, perform duty, walk in God's ways. All the acts and operations of the Divine life in us, the works and fruits of righteousness without us, all are through this blessed and holy Spirit, who is therefore called the Spirit of life, and of grace and holiness; all grace is from him. Earnestly, therefore, is he to be sought, and greatly to be heeded by us, that we quench not his holy motions, nor resist and oppose him in his workings. Res delictula est Spiritus. "The Spirit is a tender thing." As we carry toward him, so may we expect he will to us. If we slight, and resist, and oppose his workings, he will slack them; if we continue to vex him, he will retire. "Grieve not, therefore, the Holy Spirit of God, whereby you are sealed to the day of redemption," Eph. iv. 30. The Spirit seals by his renewing and sanctifying, his witnessing and assuring work; he distinguishes and marks out for salvation, fits for it; it is his work. We could not turn to God by any strength of our own, any more than we can be justified by any righteousness of our own.

Eighthly. Here is the manner of God's communicating this Spirit in the gifts and graces of it, not with a scanty and niggardly hand, but most freely and plentifully: "Which he shed on us abundantly." More of the Spirit in its gifts and graces is poured out under the Gospel than was under the law, whence it is eminently styled the ministration of the Spirit, 2 Cor. iii. 8. A measure of the Spirit the church hath had in all ages, but more in gospel times, since the coming of Christ, than before; "The law came by Moses, but grace and truth by Jesus Christ," that is, a more plentiful effusion of grace, fulfilling the promises and prophecies of old; Isa. xlv. 3. "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring; this greatest and best of blessings, an effusion of grace, and of the sanctifying gifts of the Spirit. "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh," Joel ii. 28. not on Jews only, but Gentiles also. This was to be in gospel times, and accordingly, Acts ii. 17, 18, 33. speaking of Christ risen and ascended, "Having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth (saith Peter) this, that ye now see and hear;" and ch. x. 44, 45. "The Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word," namely, Gentiles as well as Jews. Miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost indeed those were in great measure, but not without the sanctifying graces of it also accompanying many, if not all of them. There was then great abundance of common gifts of illumination, outward calling and profession, and general faith, and of more special gifts of sanctification too, such as faith, and hope, and love, and other graces of the Spirit. Get we a share in these. What will it signify if much be shed forth, and we remain dry? Our condemnation will but be aggravated the more, if under such a dispensation of grace we remain void of grace. "Be filled with the Spirit," saith the apostle; it is duty as well as privilege, because of the means which God in the Gospel is ready to bless and make effectual. This is the manner of God's communicating grace and all spiritual blessings under the Gospel,—plentifully; he is not straitened towards us, but we towards him, and in ourselves.

Ninthly. Here is the procuring cause of all; namely, Christ: "Through Jesus Christ our Saviour." He it is who purchased the Spirit, and his saving gifts and graces; all come through him, and through him as a Saviour, whose undertaking and work it is to bring to grace and glory; he is our righteousness and peace, and our head, from whom we have all spiritual life and influences. "He is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." Praise we God for him above all, go we to the Father by him, improve him to all sanctifying and saving purposes. Have we grace? Thank him with the Father and Spirit for it. "Account all things but loss and dung for the excellency of the knowledge of him," and grow and increase therein more and more.

Tenthly. Here are the ends why we are brought into this new spiritual condition; namely, justification, and heirship, and hope of eternal life: "That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs, according to the hope of eternal life." Justification in the gospel sense is the free remission of a sinner, and accepting him as righteous through the righteousness of Christ received by faith. In it there is removing guilt that bound to punishment, and accepting and dealing with the person as one that now is righteous in God's sight. This God does freely as to us, yet through the intervention of Christ's sacrifice and righteousness, laid hold on by faith. Rom. iii. 20, &c. "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified," but through "the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe;" whence, ver. 24. we are said to be "justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins, that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." God, in justifying a sinner in the way of the Gospel, is gracious to him, and yet just to himself and his law; forgiveness being through a perfect righteousness and satisfaction made to justice by Christ, who is the propitiation for sin, and not merited by the sinner himself. So it is here, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, that being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." It is by grace, as the spring and rise, as was said, though "through the redemption that is in Christ," as making the way, God's law and justice being thereby satisfied; and by faith applying that redemption. "By him," that is, by Christ, "all that believe are justified, from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Acts xiii. 39; whence the apostle desires "to be found in him, not having his own righteousness, which was of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." Trust we not therefore in our own righteousness or merit of good works, but to Christ's righteousness alone, received by faith for justification and acceptance with God. Inherent righteousness we must have, and the fruits of it in works of obedience; not as our justifying righteousness before God, but as fruits of our justification, and evidences of our interest in Christ, and qualification for life and happiness, and the very beginning and part of it; but the procuring of all this is by Christ, that "being justified by his grace we should be made heirs." Observe, Our justification is by the grace of God, and our justification by that grace is necessary in order to our being made "heirs of eternal life;" without such justification no adoption and sonship, and so no right of inheritance. "Whoever received him," namely, Christ, "to them gave he power to become sons of God, even to them that believe on his name," Jno. i. 12. Eternal life is set before us in the promise, the Spirit works faith in us, and hope of that life, and so are we made heirs of it, and have a kind of possession of it even now; faith and hope bring it near, and fill with joy in the well-grounded expectation of it. The meaneat believer is a great heir, though he have not his portion in hand; he has good hope through grace, and may bear up under all difficulties; there is a better state in view, he is waiting for "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for him." How well may such comfort themselves with these words! And now all this gives good reason why we should "shew all meekness to all men," because we have experienced so much benefit by the kindness and love of God to us, and may hope that they, in God's time, may be partakers of the like grace as we are. And thus of the reasons of equal and gentle, meek and tender, carriage towards others, from their own bad condition in time past, and the present more happy state into which they are brought without any merit or deservings of their own, and whereunto by the same grace others may be brought also.

3. The apostle having opened the duties of Christians in common, with the reasons respecting themselves, adds another from their goodness and usefulness to men.

8 This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men.

Observe, 1st. When he hath opened the grace of God toward us, he immediately presseth the necessity of good works, for we must not expect the benefit of God's mercy unless we make conscience of our duty. "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly;" that is, this is a true Christian doctrine of highest importance, and which ministers must most earnestly and constantly press and inculcate, that they which have believed in God do not think that a bare naked faith will save them, but it must be an operative working faith, bringing forth the fruit of righteousness; they must make it their care to maintain good works, not to do them occasionally only, and when opportunities come in their way, but to seek opportunities for doing them. "These things are good and profitable unto men;" these good works, say some, or the teaching of these things, rather than idle questions, as follows. These things are good in themselves, and the teaching of them useful to mankind, making persons a common good in their places. 2nd. Ministers in teaching must see that they deliver what is sound and good in itself, and profitable to them that hear; all must be to the use of edifying both of persons and societies.

Fifthly. Here is the fifth and last thing in the matter of the epistle: what Titus should avoid in teaching; how he should deal with a heretic; with some other directions.

9 But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

1. That the apostle's meaning here might be more clear and full, and specially fitted to the time and state of things there, and the many Judaizers among them, he tells Titus what in teaching he should shun. There are needful questions to be discussed and cleared, such as make for improvement in useful knowledge; but idle and foolish inquiries, tending neither to God's glory or the edification of men, these must be shunned. Some may have a show of wisdom, but are vain, as many among the Jewish doctors, as well as of later schoolmen, who abound with questions of no moment or use to faith or practice; avoid these. "And genealogies;" of the gods, say some, that the heathen poets made such noise about, or rather, those that the Jews were so curious in. Some lawful and useful inquiries might be made into these things, to see the fulfilling of the Scriptures in some cases, and specially in the descent of Christ the Messiah; but all that served to pomp only, and feed vanity, in boasting of a long pedigree, and much more such as the Jewish teachers were

iii. 8. Not as in Authorised Version, as if it referred to the clause following, but "Faithful is the saying, and concerning these things I will that thou affirm constantly, in order that they which have believed God may be careful to practise good works."

iii. 10. "An heretic;" i.e., one who founds or belongs to an heresy. The Greek word means originally one taking his own course, separating himself from others. Here "an heretic" is one departing from the teaching and practice of the Church.

iii. 11. "Condemned of himself;" after a double admonition, no heretic could say that he knew no better; the plea of ignorance would no longer be a true one.

iii. 12. "When I shall send;" i.e., "When I shall have sent Artemas or Tychicus to supply thy place in Crete, be diligent to come," &c. Artemas is said to have been afterwards bishop of Lystra. Tychicus was probably one of those who accompanied St. Paul on his missionary journey when he passed from Troas to ready to busy themselves in, and trouble their hearers with, even since Christ was come, and that distinction of families and tribes had been taken away, as if they would build again that polity that now is abolished; these Titus must withstand as foolish and vain. "And contentions and strivings about the law." There were those that were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, and would have them continued in the church, though by the Gospel and coming of Christ they were superseded and done away. Titus must give no countenance to these, but avoid and oppose them. "For they are unprofitable and vain;" this is to be referred to all those "foolish questions and genealogies," as well as those "strivings about the law." They are so far from instructing and building up in godliness, that they are hindrances of it rather. Christian religion and good works, which are to be maintained, will hereby be weakened and prejudiced, the peace of the church disturbed, and progress of the Gospel stayed. Observe, Ministers must not only teach things good and useful, but shun and oppose the contrary, what would corrupt the faith, and hinder godliness and good works; nor should people have itching ears, but love and embrace sound doctrine, which tends most to the use of edifying.

2. But because after all there will be heresies and heretics in the church, the apostle next directs Titus what to do in such a case, and how to deal with such.

10 A man that is an heretick after the first and second admonition reject; 11 Knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself.

He that forsakes the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, and broaches false doctrines, and propagates them to the corrupting of the faith in weighty and momentous points, and breaks the peace of the church about them, let such an one be rejected, after due means used to reclaim him. Admonish him once and again, that if possible he may be brought back, and thou mayest gain thy brother; but if that will not reduce him, that others be not hurt, cast him out of the communion, and warn all Christians to avoid him. "Knowing that he that is such is subverted," that is, turned off from the foundation, and sinneth grievously, being self-condemned. Those that will not be reclaimed by admonitions, but are obstinate in their sins and errors, are subverted and self-condemned; they inflict that punishment upon themselves that the governors of the church should inflict upon them, that is, they throw themselves out of the church, and throw off its communion, and so are self-condemned. Observe, 1st. How great an evil proper heresy is; not lightly therefore to be charged upon any, though greatly to be taken heed of by all. Such an one is subverted or perverted, a metaphor from a building so ruined, as it is hard, if possible, to repair and raise it up again. Proper heretics have seldom been recovered to the true faith; not so much defect of judgment, as perverseness of the will, being in the case, through pride, or ambition, or self-will, or covetousness, or such like corruption, which therefore must be taken heed of. Be humble, love the truth, and practise it, and damning heresy will be escaped. 2nd. Pains and patience must be used about those that err most grievously. They are not easily and soon to be given up and cast off, but competent time and means must be tried for their recovery. 3rd. The church's means, even with heretics, are persuasive and rational. They must be admonished, instructed, and warned; so much voubeia does import. 4th. Upon continued obstinacy and irreclaimableness, the church hath power, and is obliged to preserve its own purity, by severing such a corrupt member, which discipline may, too, by God's blessing, become effectual to reform the offender, or leave him the more inexcusable in his condemnation.

3. The apostle subjoins some farther directions.

12 When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus, be diligent to come unto me to Nicopolis: for I have determined there to winter. 13 Bring Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their journey diligently, that nothing be wanting unto them.

Here are two personal things enjoined, namely,
1st. That Titus should hold himself ready to come to Paul at Nicopolis, a city in Thrace, as is reckoned, on the borders of Macedonia; so soon as Artemas or Tychicus should be sent to Crete to supply his place, and take care of the churches there when he should leave them. The apostle would not have them in their young and weak state be without one or other of chief sufficiency to guide and help them. Titus, it seems, was not their ordinary fixed bishop or pastor, but an evangelist; otherwise Paul would not have called him so much from his charge. Of Artemas we read little, but Tychicus is mentioned on many occasions with respect. Paul calls him "a beloved brother," and "faithful minister," and "fellow-servant in the Lord," one fit therefore for the service intimated. When Paul saith to Titus, "Be diligent to come to me to Nicopolis, for I have determined there to winter," it is plain the epistle was not written from Nicopolis, as the postscript would have it, for then he would have said, I determined here, not there, to winter.

2nd. The other personal charge to Titus is, that he would bring two of his friends on their journey diligently, and see them furnished, so that nothing should be wanting to them. This was to be done, not as a piece of common civility only, but of Christian piety, out of respect both to them and the work they were sent about, which probably was to preach the Gospel, or to be some way serviceable to the churches. Zenas is styled the lawyer, whether in reference to the Roman or the Mosaic law, as having some time been his profession, is doubtful. Apollos was an eminent and faithful minister. Accompanying such part of their way, and accommodating them for their work and journeys, was a pious and needful service. And to further this, and lay in for it, what before the apostle had before bid Titus teach, ver. 8, he repeats here, 14 And let our's also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful.

Let Christians, those that have believed in God, learn "to maintain good works," especially such as these, supporting ministers in their work of preaching and spreading the Gospel, hereby becoming "fellow-helpers to the truth," 3 Jno. 8, "that they be not unfruitful." Christianity is not a fruitless profession; the professors of it must be "filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ to the glory and praise of God." It is not enough that they be harmless, but they must be profitable, doing good, as well as eschewing evil. "Let ours" set up and maintain some honest labour and employment, to provide for themselves and their families, that they be not unprofitable burthens on the earth, so some understand it. Let them not think that Christianity gives them a writ of ease, no, it lays an obligation upon them to seek some honest work and calling, and therein "to abide with God." This is of good report, will credit religion, and be good to mankind; they will not be unprofitable members of the body, or burthensome and chargeable to others, but enabled to be helpful to those in want. "To maintain good works for necessary uses;" not living like drones on the labours of others, but themselves fruitful to the common benefit.

III. The apostle concludes with salutations and benedictions.

15 All that are with me salute thee. Greet them that love us in the faith. Grace be with you all. Amen.

Though perhaps not personally known, some of them at least, yet all by Paul testify their love and good wishes to Titus, owning him thereby in his work, and heartening him to go on therein. Great comfort and encouragement it is to have the heart and prayers of other Christians with and for us. "Greet them that love us in the faith," or, "for the faith," that is, who are our loving fellow Christians; holiness, or the image of God in any, is the great endearing thing, what gives strength to all other bonds, and is itself the best. "Grace be with you all. Amen." This is the closing benediction, not to Titus alone, but to all the faithful with him, which shews, though the epistle bears the single name of Titus in the inscription, yet it was for the use of the churches there, and they were in the eye and upon the heart of the apostle in the writing of it. "Grace be with you all," that is, the love and favour of God, with the fruits and effects thereof, according to need, spiritual ones especially, and the increase and feeling of them more and more in their souls. This is the apostle's wish and prayer, shewing his affection to them, and desire of their good, and a means of obtaining for them, and bringing down upon them, the thing requested. Observe, Grace is the chief thing to be wished and begged for, with respect to ourselves or others; it is, summarily, all good. "Amen" shuts up the prayer, expressing desire and hope, that so it may be, and "shall be."

GENEALOGICAL TABLE.—VER. 9.

Macedonia (Acts xx. 1-6). He was the bearer of the Epistle to the Colossians from St. Paul, then a prisoner at Rome, and had at the same time the care of Onesimus. He was, it seems, an Ephesian by birth, and is said to have subsequently become Bishop of Chalcedon, in Bithynia. "Nicopolis:" it is not to be assumed that St. Paul was at Nicopolis when he wrote this epistle. There seems but little doubt that the Nicopolis here spoken of is the celebrated city of Epirus. This city was built by Augustus in memory of the battle of Actium, hence its name—"the city of victory." Many of the handsomest parts of the town were built by Herod the Great. The city was situated on a peninsula to the west of the Bay of Actium, in a low and unhealthy position. The spot is now very desolate. The situation was very convenient for apostolic journeys in the eastern parts of Achaia and Macedonia, and also to the north.

iii. 13. "Zenas the lawyer:" probably a scribe who, when converted, yet retained the name of his former calling, as "Matthew the publican."

iii. 14. "Ours:" our fellow-believers who are with you. "Also:" i.e., the Cretan Christians were to aid in furnishing Zenas and Apollos with all that they needed. "For necessary uses:" i.e., to supply the necessary wants of Christian missionaries and brethren, as in the preceding verse.

iii. 15. "Greet them that love us in the faith:" "Those who love us in the sphere of faith, as the common principle which bound together and hallowed their common love" (Ellicott). This form of salutation, different from any occurring in St. Paul's other epistles, is a proof of genuineness. No forger would have altered the apostle's usual form of salutation. "Grace be with you:" literally, "the grace"—i.e., "the grace of God." "Amen" is omitted in the best MSS.

OF THE EPISTLE OF

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

THIS epistle to Philemon is placed the last of those with the name of Paul to them, perhaps because the shortest, and of an argument peculiar and different from all the others; yet such as the Spirit of God, which indited it, saw would, in its kind, be very instructive and useful in the churches. The occasion of it was this: Philemon, one of note, and probably a minister in the church of Colosse, a city of Phrygia, had a servant named Onesimus, who having purloined his goods, ran away from him,—[we should not take it for granted that he had defrauded his master, for that is not necessarily implied in what is said in ver. 18, and we should not impute crimes to men without proof; nor should we take it for granted that he feared to be punished as a runaway slave, for that cannot be proved; but some one or more of these reasons doubtless operated to make him apprehensive that if he returned he would meet with, at least, a cold reception,]—and in his rambles came to Rome, where Paul was then a prisoner for the Gospel, and providentially coming under his preaching there, was, by the blessing of God, converted by him; after which he ministered awhile to the apostle in bonds, and might have been farther useful to him, but understanding him to be another man's servant, he would not, without his consent, detain him, but sends him back with this letter commendatory, wherein he earnestly sues for his pardon and kind reception.

[There can be no doubt that this letter was written from Rome about the time when the epistle to the Colossians was written. The circumstances which conduct to this conclusion are such as the following: 1. Paul at the time when it was written was a prisoner; ver. 1. "Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ;" ver. 10, "Whom I have forgotten in my bonds." Comp. ver. 23, "Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus." 2. It was written when he had hopes of obtaining his liberty, or when he had such a prospect of it that he could ask Philemon, with confidence, to "prepare him a lodging," ver. 22. 3. Timothy was with him at the time when it was written, ver. 1; and we know that Paul desired him to come to him to Rome, when he was a prisoner there, as soon as possible; 2 Tim. iv. 9, "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me." 4. We know that Onesimus was actually sent by Paul to Colosse while he was a prisoner at Rome, and it would be morally certain that, under the circumstances of the case, he would send the letter to his master at that time. The same persons are mentioned in the salutations in the two epistles; at least, they are so far the same as to make it probable that the epistles were written at the same time, for it is not very probable that the same persons would in another place, and on another occasion, have been with the apostle. Thus Aristarchus, Mark, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas, join in the salutations both to the church at Colosse and to Philemon. These considerations make it clear that the epistle was written while Paul was a prisoner at Rome, and at about the same time with the epistle to the Colossians. If so, it was about A. D. 62.

It is impossible (says Doddridge) to read over this admirable epistle without being touched with the delicacy of sentiment, and the masterly address, that appear in every part of it. We see here, in a most striking light, how perfectly consistent true courtesy is,—not only with all the warmth and sincerity of a friend, but even with the dignity of the Christian and the apostle. And if this letter were to be considered in no other view than as a mere human composition, it must be allowed to be a masterpiece in its kind. As an illustration of this remark, it may not be improper to compare it with an epistle of Pliny, that seems to have been written on a similar occasion, (Lib. ix., Let. 21.) which, though penned by one that was reckoned to excel in the epistolary style, though it has undoubtedly many beauties, yet must be acknowledged by every impartial reader to be vastly inferior to this animated composition of the apostle.—As a specimen of the courtesy and politeness which the Christian ought to practise at all times, as well as furnishing many valuable lessons on Christian duty, it deserves a place in the volume of inspiration; and a material chasm would be produced in the instructions which are needful for us, if it were withdrawn from the sacred canon.—Barnes.]

Before we enter on the exposition, such general things as follow may be taken notice of from the epistle, and what relates to it; namely, First. The goodness and mercy of God to a poor wandering sinner, bringing him by his gracious providence under the means, and making them effectual to his conversion. Thus came he to be sought of him that asked not for him, and to be found of him that sought him not, Isa. lxx. 1. Secondly. The great and endeared affection between a true convert and him whom God used to be the instrument of his conversion. Paul regards this poor fugitive now as his son in the faith, and terms him his own bowels; and Onesimus readily serves Paul in prison, and would gladly have continued to do so, would duty have permitted; but, being another's servant, he must return and submit himself to his master, and be at his disposal. Thirdly. The tender and good spirit of this blessed apostle Paul. With what earnestness does he concern himself for the poor slave! Being now, through his preaching, reconciled to God, he labours for reconciliation between him and his master. How pathetic a letter does he here write in his behalf! scarce any argument is forgotten that could possibly be used in the case, and all pressed with such force, that had it been the greatest favour to himself that he was asking he could not have used more. Fourthly. The remarkable providence of God in preserving such a short writing as this, that might be thought of little concern to the church, being not only a letter to a particular person, as those to Timothy, and Titus, and Gaius, and the elect lady, likewise were, but of a private, personal matter; namely, the receiving of a poor fugitive servant into the favour and family of his injured master. What in this is there that concerns the common salvation? And yet over this hath been a special Divine care, it being given, as the other Scriptures were, by inspiration of God; and in some sort, as they are, profitable for doctrine, and for reproof, and for correction, and for instruction in righteousness. God would have extant a proof and instance of his rich and free grace for the encouragement and comfort of the meanest and vilest of sinners looking to him for mercy and forgiveness; and instruction to ministers and others not to despise any, much less to judge them as to their final state, as if they were utter castaways; but rather to attempt their conversion, hoping they may be saved; likewise how to carry toward them, and how they should carry. Joy must be on earth, as well as there is in heaven, over one sinner that repenteth; they must now be loved, and helped, and confirmed in good, and furthered in it; and in their outward concerns, their comfort and welfare must be consulted and promoted what in us lies. And on their part they must be humble and grateful, acknowledging God and his instruments, in what good they have received, ready to all suitable returns, making what reparation they can in case of injuries, and living a life of thankfulness and obedience. To such purposes may this epistle have been written and preserved. And perhaps, Fifthly. There may be something farther in all this; at least, by way of allusion, it is applicable to the mediation and intercession of Christ for poor sinners. We, like Onesimus, were revellers from God's service, and had injured him in his rights. Jesus Christ finds us, and by his grace works a change in us, and then intercedes for us with the Father, that we may be received into his favour and family again, and past offences may be forgiven; and we are sure the Father heareth him always. There is no reason to doubt but Paul prevailed with Philemon to forgive and receive Onesimus; and more reason have we to be confident that the intercession of Christ with the Father is prevalent for the acceptance of all whose case he takes in hand, and recommends to him. From these general observations come we to the epistle itself.

* By the Rev. Jeremiah Smith.

Introductory Note.—The genuineness and authenticity of this epistle are attested by ample authority. Though from its brevity it is not often quoted by the Fathers, yet strong external testimonies of antiquity are not wanting. Eusebius speaks of it as among the universally acknowledged epistles of the canon. For interesting proofs drawn from undesigned coincidences, see Paley's "Horæ Paulinæ." The arguments brought against its canonicity are mostly of an arbitrary and subjective character. Baur's arguments, for example, are grounded on the occurrence of some words in this epistle which are not found elsewhere in St. Paul's writings. The date above mentioned is the same as that assigned to the epistle by Ellicott. Some, however, place it somewhat later, as it was clearly written when St. Paul had good grounds for expecting his liberation from imprisonment (verse 22), and the date of his release is fixed A.D. 64 by the best chronologists.

1. "Paul, a prisoner:" "Considering," says Ellicott, "the in this epistle we have the preface, ver. 1—7; the substance and body of it, ver. 8—21; and then the conclusion, ver. 22—25.

AUL, a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother, unto Philemon our dearly beloved, and fellow-labourer, 2 And to our beloved Apphia, and Archippus our fellowsoldier, and to the church in thy house:

I. In these two verses of the preface are the persons from and to whom it is written, with some annexed note or title, implying somewhat of argument to the purpose of the letter.

First. The persons writing. Paul, the principal, who calls himself "a prisoner of Jesus Christ," that is, for Jesus Christ. A prisoner simply is no comfort or honour, but such as Paul was "for the faith and preaching of the Gospel," this was true glory, and proper to move Philemon upon the request made to him by such an one. A petition from one suffering for Christ and his Gospel sure would be tenderly regarded by a believer and minister of Christ, and especially when strengthened too with the concurrence of Timothy, one eminent in the church, sometimes called by Paul his "son in the faith," but now it is likely, grown more in years, he styles him his "brother." What could be denied to two such petitioners? Paul is not slight in serving a poor convert; he gets all the additional help he could in it.

Secondly. The persons written to are Philemon and Apphia, and with them Archippus, and the church in Philemon's house. Philemon, the master of Onesimus, was the principal to whom the letter is inscribed; the head of the family, in whom was the authority and power of taking in or shutting out, and whose property Onesimus was; with him, therefore, chiefly lay the business. "To Philemon, our dearly beloved and fellow-labourer;" a good man he was, and probably a minister, and on both accounts dearly beloved by Paul. A lover of good men is one property of a good minister, Tit. i. 8; and especially must such love those that labour with them in the work of the Gospel, and who are faithful therein. The general calling as Christians knits those together who are Christians; but when conjunction in the special calling as ministers is added this will be farther endearing. Paul, in the highest degree of ministry, not only calls Timothy, an evangelist, his brother, but Philemon, an ordinary pastor, his "dearly beloved fellow-labourer;" an example of humility, and condescension, and of all loving regards, even in those that are highest in the church, toward others that are labourers in the same special heavenly calling. With Philemon Apphia is joined, probably his yokefellow; and, having a concern in the domestic affairs, the apostle directs to her likewise. She was a party offended and injured by Onesimus, and therefore proper to be taken notice of in a letter for reconciliation and forgiveness. Justice and prudence would direct Paul to this express notice of her, who might be helpful and furthering of the good ends of his writing. She is set before Archippus, as more concerned and having more interest. A loving conjunction there is in domestic matters between husband and wife, whose interests are one, and affections and actions must be according. These are the principal parties written to. The less principal are Archippus and the church in Philemon's house. Archippus was a minister in the church of Colosse, Philemon's friend, and probably co-pastor with him. Paul might think him one whom Philemon would advise with, and who might be capable of furthering the good work of peace-making and forgiveness, and therefore might judge fit to put him in the inscription of the letter, with the adjunct of "fellow-soldier." He had called Philemon his "fellow-labourer." Ministers must look on themselves as labourers and soldiers, who must therefore take pains and endure hardship; they must stand on their guard, and make good their post, and must look on one another as fellow-labourers and fellow-soldiers, who must stand together, and strengthen one another's hearts and hands in any work of their holy function and calling. They need see to it that they be provided with spiritual weapons and skill to use them; as labourers they must minister the word, and sacraments, and discipline, and watch over souls, as those that must give an account of them; and as soldiers they must fight the Lord's battles, and not entangle themselves in the things of this life, but attend to the pleasing of him who hath chosen them to be soldiers, 2 Tim. ii. 4. To these it is added, "And to the church in thy house," that is, his whole family, in which the worship of God was kept up, so that he had, as it were, a church in his house. Observe, Families which generally may be most pious and orderly, yet may have one or other in them impious and wicked. This was the aggravation of Onesimus's sin, that it was where he might and should have learned better; it is like he was secret in his misdeeds till his flight discovered him. Hearts are unknown but to God, till overt acts discover them; yet this one evil servant did not hinder Philemon's house from being called and counted a church, for the religious worship and order that was kept up in it. And such should all families be, nurseries of religion, societies where God is called on, his word read, and sabbaths observed, and the members instructed in the knowledge of him and of their duty to him; neglect of which is followed with ignorance and all corruption. Wicked families are nurseries for hell, as good ones are for heaven. Masters and others of the family must not think it enough to be good, singly and severally, in their personal capacities, but they must be socially so, as here Philemon's house was a church; and Paul, for some concern that all might have in this matter of Onesimus, directs to them all, that their affection, as well as Philemon's, might return to him, and that in their way and place they might further, and not hinder, the reconciliation wished and sought. Desirable it is that all in a family be well affected toward one another, for furthering their particular and the common good and benefit of all. On such accounts might it be that Paul inscribes his letter here so generally, that all might be the more ready to own and receive this poor convert, and to carry lovingly toward him. Next to this inscription is,

Thirdly. The apostle's salutation of those named by him.

3 Grace to you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the token in every epistle; so the apostle writes. He is a hearty well-wisher to all his friends, and wishes for them the best things; not gold, or subject of the epistle, no title could be more appropriate, or more feelingly prepare Philemon for the request which the apostle is about to make to him." "Philemon;" a member of the church at Colosse (compare verse 10 with Col. iv. 9). He owed his conversion, under God, to St. Paul (verse 19). By his zeal in the Christian cause (verse 5) he had shown himself worthy of the apostle's confidence. His house at Colosse was shown in the time of Theodoret, and tradition represents him to have been bishop of that city.

silver, or any earthly good in the first or chiefest place, but grace and peace from God and Christ. He cannot give them himself, but he prays for them from him who can bestow them. "Grace," that is, the free favour and goodwill of God, the spring and fountain of all blessings; "and peace," that is, all good, as the fruit and effect of that grace; "to you," that is, be bestowed on you, and continued to you, with the comfortable feeling and sense of it in yourselves; "from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." The Holy Spirit also is understood, though not named; for all acts towards the creatures are of the whole Trinity: from the Father, who is our Father in Christ, the first in order of acting as of subsisting; and from Christ, his favour and goodwill as God, and the fruits of it through him as Mediator, God-man. It is in the beloved that we are accepted, and through him we have peace and all good things; who is, with the Father and Spirit, to be looked to, and blessed, and praised for all, and to be owned, not only as Jesus and Christ, but as Lord also. In 2 Cor. xiii. 14 the apostle's benediction is full: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all, Amen." Observe, Spiritual blessings are first and especially to be sought for ourselves and others. The favour of God and peace with him, as in itself it is the best and most desirable good, so is it the cause of all other, and what puts sweetness into every mercy, and can make happy even in the want of all earthly things: "Though there be no herd in the stall, and the labour of the olive fail," &c., yet may such "rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of their salvation," Hab. iii. 17, 18; "There be many that say, Who will shew us any good?" But if God "lift up the light of his countenance," that will put more joy and gladness into the heart than all worldly increase, Ps. iv. 6, 7; "The Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace," Num. vi. 6. In this is summarily all good, and from this one fountain, God the Father, Son, and Spirit, all comes. After this salutation of the apostle to Philemon, and his friends and family, for better making way still for his suit to him, Fourthly. He expresses the singular affection he had for him, by thanksgiving and prayer to God in his behalf, and the great joy for the many good things he knew and heard to be in him, in the four next following verses.

4 I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers, 5 Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints; 6 That the communication of thy faith may become effectual by the acknowledging of every good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus. 7 For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother.

The apostle's thanksgiving and prayer here for Philemon are set forth by the object, and circumstance, and matter of them, with the way whereby much of the knowledge of Philemon's goodness came to him.

1. Here is the object of Paul's praises and prayers for Philemon: "I thank my God, making mention of thee in my prayers." Observe, 1st. God is the author of all the good in any, or that is done by them; "From me is thy fruit found," Hos. xiv. 8. 2nd. To him, therefore, is all the praise due: "But (or for) who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? for all things come of thee," 1 Chr. xxix. 13, 14, both wherewith to offer and the will and heart to do it; on which account, says he, "we thank thee our God, and praise thy glorious name." 3rd. It is the privilege of good men that in their praises and prayers they come to God as their God; "Our God, we thank thee," said David; and "I thank my God," said Paul. 4th. Our prayers and praises should be offered up to God, not for ourselves only, but for others also. Private addresses should not be altogether with a private spirit, minding our own things only, but others must be remembered by us; we must be affected with joy and thankfulness for any good in them, or done by them, or bestowed on them, as far as is known to us, and seek for them what they need. In this lies no little part of the communion of saints. St. Paul, in his private thanksgivings and prayers, was often particular in remembering his friends: "I thank my God, making mention of thee in my prayers;" sometimes it may be by name, or however having them particularly in the thoughts, and God knows who is meant, though not named. This is a means of exercising love, and obtaining good for others. "Strive with me by your prayers to God for me," said the apostle; and what he desired for himself to be sure he practised on others' behalf, and so should all do. "Pray one for another," says St. James, ch. v. 16.

2. Here is the circumstance; "Always making mention of thee." "Always," that is, usually, not once or twice only, but frequently. So must we remember Christian friends much, and often, as their case may need, bearing them in our thoughts and upon our hearts before our God.

3. Here is the matter both of his praises and prayers, in reference to Philemon.

1st. Of his praises. First. He thanks God for the love which he heard Philemon had towards the Lord Jesus. He is to be loved as God superlatively, as his Divine perfections require, and as related to us; the Lord, and our Lord, our Maker, Redeemer, and Saviour, who loved us and gave himself for us. Paul thanks God for what he heard of this, the signal marks and expression of it in Philemon. And, Secondly. For his faith in Christ also. Love to Christ, and faith in him, are prime Christian graces, for which there is great ground of praise to God, where he hath blessed any with them; "I thank my God, because your faith is published throughout the world," Rom. i. 8; and in reference to the Colossians, "We give thanks to God since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus," Col. i. 3, 4. This is a saving grace, and the very principle of Christian life and of all good works. Thirdly. He praiseth God likewise for his love to all the saints. These two must go together, for he who loveth him that begat must and will love them also that are begotten of him. The apostle joins them in that; "We give thanks to God, since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints," Col. i. 3, 4. These bear the image of Christ, which will be loved by every Christian. Different sentiments and ways in what is not essential will not make difference of affection, that is, as to the truth; though difference in the degrees of love will be according as more or less of that image is discerned. Mere external differences are nothing here; Paul calls a poor converted slave his bowels. We must love, as God does, all saints. Paul thanked God not only for the good that was in the churches, but in the particular persons he wrote to; and though he had his account by report, "Hearing of the love and faith which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints" This was

2. "Apphia;" Chrysostom and the Greek commentators were disposed to regard Apphia as Philemon's wife; modern writers adopt the conjecture as probable. In this case it seems natural to suppose that Archippus was their son, or at any rate a member of their house and family. "The church in thy house;" not merely the household of Philemon, as in Notes above, but the assembly of Christians who used to meet at Philemon's house, and unite in public worship.

6. This verse depends on verse 4. "I thank God, and pray to what he inquired after concerning his friends, the truth, and growth, and fruitfulness of their graces, their faith in Christ, and love to him, and to all the saints. Love to saints, if it be sincere, will be catholic and universal, love toward all saints; but faith and love, as in the heart, are hidden things, they are known by the effects of them. Therefore,

2nd. The apostle joins prayer with his praises, that the fruits of Philemon's faith and love might be more and more conspicuous, so as that the communication of them might constrain others to the acknowledgment of all the good things that were in him, and in his house, toward Christ Jesus, that is, that their "light might so shine before men, that they, seeing your good works, might" be stirred up to imitate them, and to "glorify their Father which is in heaven." Good works must be done not of vain glory, to be seen, yet such as may be seen, to God's glory and the good of men.

4. He adds a reason both of that his prayer and praises; ver. 7, "For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother." [The word "bowels" here probably means, minds, hearts, for it is used in the Scriptures to denote the affections.] The good thou hast done and still doest is abundant matter of joy and comfort to me and others, who therefore desire you may continue and abound in such good fruits more and more, to God's honour and the credit of religion; 2 Cor. ix. 12, "The ministration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God."

Thus far is the preface to this epistle. Now,

II. He comes to that which is the main business of it; namely, to plead with Philemon in behalf of Onesimus, to receive him, and be reconciled to him. Many arguments he urges to this purpose, from ver. 8 to 21, inclusive.

8 Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient, 9 Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ.

1st Argument from what was before noted, and is carried in the illative "wherefore;" that is, seeing so much good is reported of thee and found in thee, especially "thy love to all saints," now let me see it on a fresh and farther occasion; refresh the bowels of Onesimus and mine also, in forgiving and receiving him who is now a convert, and so a saint indeed, and meet for thy favour and love. Observe, A disposition to do good, and past instances and expressions of it, is a good handle to take hold on for pressing unto more; "Be not weary of well doing," go on as thou art able, and as new objects and occasions occur, to do the same still. The 2nd Argument is from the authority of him that is now making this request to him. "I might be much bold in Christ, to enjoin thee that which is convenient." The apostles had, under Christ, great power in the church over the ordinary ministers, as well as the members of it, for edification; they might require of them what was fit, and were therein to be obeyed, which Philemon should consider. This was a matter within the compass of the apostle's power to require, though he would not in this instance act up to it. Observe, Ministers, whatever their power be in the church, are to use prudence in the exercise of it; they may not unseasonably, or farther than is requisite, put it forth,—in all they must use godly wisdom and discretion. Wherefore this may be a

3rd Argument; waiving the authority which yet he had to require, he chooses to entreat it of him; ver. 9, "Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee." Observe, It is no disparagement for those that have power, yet to be condescending, and sometimes even to beseech, where in strictness of right they might command. So does Paul here; though an apostle, he entreats where he might enjoin; he argues from love rather than authority, which doubtless must carry engaging influence with it. And especially, which may be a

4th Argument, when any circumstance of the person pleading gives additional force to his petition, as here; "Being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ." Years bespeak respect, and the motions of such in things lawful and fit should be received with regard. The request of an aged apostle, and now suffering for Christ and his Gospel, would be tenderly considered. If thou wilt do any thing for a poor aged prisoner, to comfort me in my bonds, and make my chain lighter, grant me this which I desire; hereby in a sort you will do honour to Christ, in the person of an aged suffering servant of his, which doubtless he will take as done to himself. He makes also a 5th Argument from the spiritual relation now between Onesimus and himself.

10 I beseech thee for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds:

Though of right and in civil respect he be thy servant, yet in a spiritual sense he is now a son to me, God having made me the instrument of his conversion, even here, where I am a prisoner for Christ's sake. So does God sometimes honour and comfort his suffering servants, not only working good in themselves by their sufferings, exercising and improving thereby their own graces, but making them a means of much spiritual good to others, either to their conversion, as of Onesimus here, or of their confirmation and strengthening, as Phil. i. 14, "Many brethren, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word of the Lord without fear." When God's servants are bound, yet his word and Spirit are not bound; spiritual children may then be born to them. The apostle lays an emphasis here, "My son, whom I have begotten in my bonds;" he was dear to him, and he hoped would be so to Philemon, under that consideration. Prison mercies are sweet and much set by. Paul makes an argument to Philemon from this dear relation that now was between Onesimus and him, his son begotten in his bonds. [The order of the Greek is this, "I entreat thee concerning a son of mine, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus." Here the name is not suggested, until he had mentioned that he sustained to him the relation of a son, and also till he had added that his conversion was the fruit of his labours "while he was a prisoner." Then, when the name of Onesimus is mentioned, it would occur to Philemon not primarily as the name of an ungrateful and disobedient servant, but as the interesting case of one converted by the labours of his own friend in prison. Was there ever more delicacy evinced in preparing the way for disarming one of prejudice, and carrying an appeal to his heart?] And a 6th Argument is from Philemon's own interest.

11 Which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me:

him that the communication of thy faith may become effectual in, or better, unto Christ Jesus; and this by the acknowledging, or the full knowledge, of every good thing which is in us." The best MSS. read "us" instead of "you." The word refers to "us Christians." In the kindness and faith of Philemon the power of the Divine good would be known.

7. "Bowels;" "hearts" will better sustain the idea of the apostle.

Observe, 1. Unsanctified persons are unprofitable persons, they answer not the great end of their being and relations. Grace makes good for somewhat, "In time past unprofitable, but now profitable;" that is, inclined and fitted to be so, and will be so to thee, his master, if thou receive him, as he hath since his conversion been here to me, ministering to me in my confinement. There seems an allusion to the name Onesimus, which signifies profitable; now he will answer this name. It may be noted also how the apostle speaks in this matter, not as Onesimus's former case and carriage might warrant; he had wronged his master, and ran away from him, and lived as if he were his own and not his; yet as God covers the sins of penitents, forgives and does not upbraid, so should men. How softly does Paul here speak! Not that Onesimus's sin was small, or that he would have any, much less himself, to take it so; but having been humbled for it, and doubtless taken shame to himself on account thereof, the apostle now would not sink his spirit by continuing to load and burthen him therewith, but speaks thus tenderly when he was pleading with Philemon not to make severe reflections on his servant's miscarriage, but to forgive. 2. What happy changes conversion makes; of evil, good; of unprofitable, useful. Religious servants are a treasure in a family; "Now profitable to thee and to me." Such will make conscience of their time and trusts, promoting the interests of those whom they serve, and managing all they can for the best. This then is the argument here urged: It will now be for thy advantage to receive him; thus changed as he is, thou mayest expect him to be a dutiful and faithful servant, though in time past he was not so. Whereupon,

7th Argument, he urges Philemon from the strong affection that he had to Onesimus. He had mentioned the spiritual relation before, "My son begotten in my bonds," and now he signifies how dear he was to him.

12 Whom I have sent again: thou therefore receive him, that is, mine own bowels:

I love him as I do myself, and have sent him back to thee for this end, that thou shouldst receive him; do it therefore for my sake, receive him as one thus dear to me.

[So far as appears, Paul neither advised Onesimus to return nor did he compel him, nor did he say one word to influence him to do it, nor did he mean or expect that he would be a slave when he should have been received again by his master. "Thou, therefore, receive him, that is, mine own bowels." There is great delicacy also in this expression. If he had merely said, "Receive him," Philemon might have thought only of him as he formerly was. Paul, therefore, adds, "That is, mine own bowels," one whom I so tenderly love that he seems to carry my heart with him wherever he goes.—Doddridge.]

Observe, Even good men may sometimes need great earnestness and entreaty to lay their passions, and let go their resentments, and forgive those who have injured and offended them. Some have thought it to look this way, when Paul is so pathetic and earnest, mustering up so many pleas and arguments to gain what he requests. Philemon, a Phrygian, might perhaps be naturally of a rough and difficult temper, and thence need no little pains in touching all the springs that might move him to forgiveness and reconciliation; but rather should we strive to be like God, who is "slow to anger and ready to forgive, and abundant in pardons." And again, an 8th Argument is from the apostle's denying himself in sending back Onesimus; though he might have presumed upon Philemon's leave to detain him longer, yet he would not.

13 Whom I would have retained with me, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel: 14 But without thy mind would I do nothing; that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly.

Paul was now in prison, and wanted a friend or servant to act for him, and assist him, for which he found Onesimus fit and ready, and therefore would have detained him to minister to him instead of Philemon himself, whom if he had requested to have come to him in person for such purpose, he might have presumed he would not have refused; much less might he have reckoned that he would be unwilling his servant should do this in his stead. But yet he would not take this liberty, though his circumstances needed it; I have sent him back to thee, that any good office of thine to me might not be of necessity, but willingly. Observe, Good deeds are most acceptable to God and man when done with most freedom. And Paul herein, notwithstanding his apostolical power, would shew what regard he had to civil rights, which Christianity does by no means supersede or weaken, but rather confirm and strengthen. Onesimus he knew was Philemon's servant, and therefore without his consent not to be detained from him. In his unconverted state he had violated that right, and withdrawn himself to his master's wrong, but now he had seen his sin and repented; he was willing and desirous to return to his duty, and Paul would not hinder, but further this rather. He might indeed have presumed of Philemon's willingness; but, notwithstanding his need, he would deny himself rather than take that way. And he urges farther, 9th Argument, that such a change was now wrought in Onesimus that Philemon need not fear his ever running from him, or injuring him any more. There are those of whom Solomon saith, "If thou deliver them, thou must do it again," Pr. ix. 19; but the change wrought in Onesimus was such that he would never again need one thus to intercede for him.

15 For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him for ever;

Charity would so hope and judge, yea, so it would be; yet the apostle speaks cautiously, that none might be bold to make another such experiment in expectation of a like gracious issue. Observe, 1. In matters that may be wrested to ill, ministers must speak warily, that kind providences of God toward sinners be not abused to encouragements to sin, or abatements of just abhorrence of it; "Perhaps he therefore departed from thee for a season," &c. 2. How softly still the sins of penitents are spoken of; he calls it a departure for a season, instead of giving it the term that it deserved. As overruled and ordered by God it was a departure; but in itself, and in respect of the disposition and manner of the act, it was a criminal going away. When we speak of the nature of any sin or offence, as against God, the evil of it is not to be lessened; but in the person of a penitent sinner, as God covers it, so must we. "He departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him for ever;" that is,

8. "Convenient;" the modern sense of this word does not suit the apostle's meaning. Alford and Ellicott translate "fitting." (Compare Eph. v. 4.)

9. "Being such an one;" these words are not to be connected with what follows, but with verse 8. Commonly they are taken with the words "as Paul the aged," as though the apostle said, "Being such as I am now, Paul aged and a prisoner, I beseech thee for," &c. It seems agreed that the true force of the phrase refers to the bold-that upon conversion he may return, and be a faithful and useful servant to thee as long as he lives. "Bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his folly depart from him;" but it is not so with true penitents, they will not return to folly. 3. The wisdom, and goodness, and power of God in issuing that so happily that was begun and carried on for some time so wickedly, thus regarding a poor vassal, one of such low rank and condition, and so little regarded by men; working so good and great a change in him that was so far gone in evil ways, that had wronged a master so good, had run from a family so pious, from the means of grace, the church in his house, that he should be led into the way of salvation that had fled from it, and find means made effectual at Rome who had been hardened under them at Colosse. What riches are here of Divine grace! None so low, or mean, or vile, as utterly to be despaired of. God can meet with them when running from him, can make means effectual at one time and place which have not been so at another. So was it in this instance of Onesimus; being returned to God, he now returns to his master, who will have more service and better hold of him than ever; namely, by conscience of his duty and faithfulness in it to his life's end; his interest therefore it will be now to receive him. So God often brings gain to his out of their losses. And beside interest, a 10th Argument is taken from the capacity under which Onesimus now would return, and must be received by Philemon.

"Not now as a servant;" that is, not merely or so much, "but above a servant," namely in a spiritual respect, "a brother beloved;" one to be owned as a brother in Christ, and to be loved as such, upon this holy change that is wrought in him, and one, therefore, that will be useful unto thee upon better principles, and in a better manner than before; that will love and promote the best things in thy family, and be a blessing in it, and help to keep up "the church that is in thy house." Observe, 1. There is a spiritual brotherhood between all true believers; however differenced in civil and outward respects, they are all children of the same heavenly Father, have right to the same spiritual privileges and benefits, must love and do all good offices to and for one another as brethren, though still in the same rank, and degree, and station wherein they were called. Christianity doth not annul or confound respective civil duties, but strengthens the obligation to them, and directs to a right discharge of them. 2. Religious servants are more than mere ordinary servants; they have a grace in their hearts, and have found grace in God's sight, and so will in the sight of religious masters. "Mine eyes are upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me; he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me," Ps. ci. 6. Onesimus being now become such, receive and affect him as one that is partaker of the same common faith, and so "a brother beloved, specially to me," who have been the instrument of his conversion. Good ministers love not so much according to the outward good which they receive, as the spiritual good which they do. Paul called Onesimus his "own bowels," and other converts his "joy and crown." A brother beloved specially to me, but how much more to thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord? by a double tie, therefore; namely, both civil and religious. Thy servant, thy property, one of thy house and family, and in a spiritual respect now thy brother in Christ, which heightens the engagement; he is God's servant and thine too. Here are more ties than he is under unto me; how readily therefore should he be received and loved by thee, as one of thy family, and one of the true faith, one of thy house, and one of the church in thy house?

(On this important verse, in relation to the use which is so often made of this epistle by the advocates of slavery, to shew that Paul sanctioned it, and that it is a duty to send back those who have escaped from their masters, that they may again be held in bondage, we may remark, 1. There is no certain evidence that Onesimus was ever a slave at all. 2. At all events, even supposing that he had been a slave, Paul did not mean that he should return as such, or to be regarded as such. 3. Paul did not send him back in order that he might be a slave. 4. It is clear that, even if Onesimus had been a slave before, it would have been contrary to the wishes of Paul that Philemon should now hold him as such. Paul wished him to regard him "not as a servant," but as a "beloved brother." 5. This passage, therefore, may be regarded as full proof that it is not right to send a slave back against his will, to his former master, to be a slave. It is right to help one if he wishes to go back; to give him a letter to his master, as Paul did to Onesimus; to furnish him money to help him on his journey, if he desires to return; and to commend him as a Christian brother, if he is such; but beyond that the example of the apostle Paul does not go. 6. In confirmation of this, and as a guide in duty now, it may be observed that Paul had been educated as a Hebrew, that he was thoroughly imbued with the doctrines of the Old Testament, and that one of the elementary principles of that system of religion was, that a runaway slave was in no circumstances to be returned by force to his former master. "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant that is escaped from his master unto thee," Deut. xxiii. 15. 7. It may be added, that if the principles here acted on by Paul were carried out, slavery would speedily cease in the world. Very soon would it come to an end if masters were to regard those whom they hold, "not as slaves," but "as beloved Christian brothers;" not as chattels and things, but as the redeemed children of God. Thus regarding them, they would no longer feel that they might chain them, and task them, and sell them as property. They would feel that as Christians and as men they were on a level with themselves, and that they who were made in the image of God, and who had been redeemed with the blood of his Son, ought to be free.)

And this argument is strengthened by another; namely,

11th Argument, from the communion of saints.

17 If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself.

There is a fellowship among saints, they have interest one in another, and must love and act accordingly. Now, shew thy love to me, and the interest I have in thee, by loving and receiving one so near and dear to me, even as myself; own and treat him as thou wouldst me, with a like ready and true, though perhaps not equal, affection.

But, Question, Why such concern and earnestness for a servant, a slave, and such an one as had miscarried? Answer. Onesimus being now penitent, it was doubtless to encourage him, and to support him against the fears he might have in returning to a master whom he had so much abused and wronged, to keep him from sinking in despondency and dejection, and hearten him to his duty. Wise and good ministers will have great and tender care of young converts, to encourage and hearten them what they can to and in their duty. Objection.

ness which he might have used—"Being such an one who would rather beseech thee for love's sake, than avail myself of boldness to enjoin." "Aged;" the apostle is conjectured by some to have been about sixty years of age. Broken as he was with cares and anxieties, his premature old age might entitle him to call himself an old man, even if we adopted the calculation which makes him to have been not more than fifty at this time.

11. "Profitable;" the play on the words here is generally

But Onesimus had wronged as well as offended his master. The answer to this makes a 12th Argument; a promise of satisfaction to Philemon.

18 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account; 19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it: albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides.

Here are three things, namely,

1. A confession of Onesimus's debt to Philemon; "If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought." It is not an "if" of doubting, but of illation and concession; "seeing he hath wronged thee," and thereby is become indebted to thee: such an "if" as Col. iii. 1, and 2 Pet. ii. 4, &c. Observe, True penitents will be ingenuous in owning their faults, as doubtless Onesimus had been to Paul, upon his awakening and being brought to repentance; and especially is this to be done in cases of injury to others. Onesimus by Paul owns the wrong. And,

2. Paul here engages for satisfaction; "Put that on my account, I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it." Whence observe, 1st. The communion of saints does not destroy distinction of property. Onesimus now converted and become "a brother beloved," yet is Philemon's servant still, and indebted to him for wrongs that he had done, and not to be discharged but by free and voluntary remission, or on reparation made by himself or some other in his behalf, which part, rather than fail, the apostle undertakes for him. Upon which observe, 2nd. Suretyship is not in all cases unlawful, but in some is a good and merciful undertaking. Only know the person and case: be not surety for a stranger, Pr. xi. 15, and go not beyond ability; help thy friend thou mayest, as far as will stand with justice and prudence. And how happy for us that Christ would be made the surety of a better covenant, Heb. vii. 22, that he would be made "sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him!" And, 3rd. Formal securities by writing, as well as by word and promise, may be required and given. Persons die, and words may be forgotten or mistaken; writing better preserves right and peace, and hath been in use with good persons, as well as others, in all ages, Jer. xxxii. 9, &c.; Lu. xvi. 5-7. It was much that Paul, who lived on contributions himself, would undertake to make good all loss by an evil servant to his master; but hereby he expresses his real and great affection for Onesimus, and his full belief of the sincerity of his conversion; and he might have hope, notwithstanding this generous offer, Philemon would not insist on it, but freely remit all, considering,

3. The reason of things between him and Philemon; "Albeit, I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides," that is, thou wilt remember, without my minding thee, thou art on other accounts more in debt to me than this comes to. Modesty in self-praises is true praise. The apostle glances at it, how beneficial he had been to Philemon: That thou art any thing in grace and acceptance with God, or enjoyest any thing in a right and comfortable manner, it is under God owing to my ministry; I have been the instrument in his hand of all that spiritual good to thee, and what thy obligation to me on this account is I leave thee to consider. Thy forgiving a pecuniary debt to a poor penitent for my sake, and on my request, and which, however, I now take upon myself to answer, thy remitting it to him, or to me, now his surety, thou wilt confess is not so great a thing; here is more, per contra,—on the contrary, "Thou owest to me even thine own self besides." Observe, How great the endearments are between ministers and those toward whom their endeavours have been blessed to their conversion or spiritual edification; "If it had been possible," said Paul to the Galatians, "ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me," Gal. iv. 15. On the other hand he calls them his children, "of whom he travailed again, till Christ was formed in them," that is, the likeness of Christ more fully. So, 1 Thes. ii. 8, "We were willing to have imparted to you not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us." By way of allusion, this may illustrate Christ's undertaking for us; we were revolted from God, and by sin had wronged him, but Christ undertakes to make satisfaction, "the just for the unjust, that he might bring us unto God." If the sinner owes thee ought, put it upon my account, I will pay the debt; let his iniquity be laid on me, I will bear the penalty. Farther, a 13th Argument, is from the joy and comfort the apostle hereby would have on Philemon's own account, as well as on Onesimus's, in such a seasonable and acceptable fruit of Philemon's faith and obedience.

20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refresh my bowels in the Lord.

• Philemon was Paul's "son in the faith," yet he entreats him as "a brother;" Onesimus a poor slave, yet he solicits for him as if he were seeking some great thing for himself. How pathetic is he! "Yea, brother," or "O my brother!" (it is an adverb of wishing or desiring,) "let me have joy of thee in the Lord." Thou knowest that I am now a prisoner of the Lord, that is, for his sake and cause, and need all the comfort and support that my friends in Christ can give me. Now this will be a joy to me, I shall have "joy of thee in the Lord," as seeing such an evidence and fruit of thy own Christian faith and love, and on Onesimus's account, who hereby will be relieved and encouraged. Observe, 1. Christians should do the things that may joy the hearts of one another, both people and ministers reciprocally, and ministers of their brethren: from the world they expect trouble, and where may they look for comfort and joy but in one another? 2. Fruits of faith and obedience in people are the minister's greatest joy, especially the more of love appears in them to Christ and his members, forgiving injuries, shewing compassion, being merciful, as their heavenly Father is merciful. "Refresh my bowels in the Lord." It is not any carnal, selfish respect I am acted by, but what is pleasing to Christ, and that he may have honour therein. Observe, 1st. The Lord's honour and service is a Christian's chief aim in all things. And, 2nd. It is meat and drink to a good minister to see people ready and zealous in what is good, especially in acts of charity and beneficence, as occasions occur, forgiving injuries, and remitting somewhat of their right, and the like. And once more, his last, which is the 14th Argument, lies in his good hope and opinion which he expresseth of Philemon.

21 Having confidence in thy obedience I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say.

recognised. "Onesimus" means profitable. He did not once answer to his name, for by running away, and (apparently) by theft (verse 18), he proved himself unprofitable, but now profitable in a higher sense than he could have been before his conversion. Philemon lost a servant to find a brother (verses 15, 16).

12. "Whom I have sent again," or better, "back." "To thee" is added in best MSS. Here, as in verse 7, "heart" conveys a better sense than "bowels."

Good thoughts and expectations of us more strongly move and engage to do the things expected from us. The apostle knew Philemon to be a good man, and was thence persuaded of his readiness to do good, and that not in a scanty and niggardly manner, but with a free and liberal hand. Observe, Good persons will be ready for good works, and not narrow and pinching, but abundant in them. "The liberal deviseth liberal things," Isa. xxxii. 8. The Macedonians "first gave themselves to the Lord," and then "to his apostles by the will of God," to do what good they could with what they had, according as occasions offered.

Thus far is the substance and body of the epistle. Now he comes, III. To the conclusion; where,

First. He signifies his good hope of deliverance through their prayers, and that shortly he might see them, desiring Philemon to make provision for him.

22 But withal prepare me also a lodging: for I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.

INTERIOR OF A GREEK HOUSE.

"But withal," or "moreover." He comes to another thing, yet, as may seem, not without some eye to the matter which he had been upon, that might be furthered by this intimation, that he hoped he should himself soon follow, and know the effect of his epistle, which Philemon would therefore be the more stirred up to see might be to his satisfaction. Now here is,

1. The thing requested. "Prepare me also a lodging;" under this, all necessities for a stranger are included. He wills Philemon to do it, intending to be his guest, as most to his purpose. Observe, Hospitality is a great Christian duty, especially in ministers, and towards ministers, such as the apostle was, coming out of such dangers and sufferings for Christ and his Gospel. Who would not shew the utmost of affectionate regards to such an one? It is an honourable title he gives Gaius; Rom. xvi. 23, "Mine host, and of the whole church." Onesiphorus is also affectionately remembered by the apostle on this account; 2 Tim. i. 16, 18, "The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus; for he often refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; and in how many things he ministered to me at Ephesus thou knowest."

2. Here is the ground of the apostle's request: "For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you." He did not know how God might deal with him, but the benefit of prayer he had often found, and hoped he should again, for deliverance, and liberty to come to them. Observe, 1st. Our dependence is on God for life, and liberty, and opportunity of service; all is by Divine pleasure. 2nd. When abridged of these, or any other mercies, our trust and hope must be in God, without fainting or succumbing, while our case is depending. But yet, 3rd. Trust must be with the use of means, prayer especially; though no other should be at hand, this hath unlocked heaven, and opened prison doors. "The fervent effectual prayer of the righteous availeth much." 4th. Prayer of people for ministers, especially when they are in distress and danger, is their great duty; ministers need and request it. Paul, though an apostle, did so with much earnestness, Rom. xv. 30; 2 Cor. i. 11; Eph. vi. 18, 19; 1 Thes. v. 25. The least may this way be helpful to the greatest. Yet, 5th. Though prayer obtains, yet it does not merit the things obtained. They are God's gifts, and Christ's purchase: "I trust that through your prayers," (χαρισθῆναι ὑμῖν), "I shall be freely bestowed on you." What God gives, yet he will be sought to for, that mercies may be valued the more, and known whence they come, and God may have the praise. Ministers' lives and labours are for the people's good; the office was set up for them: "He gave gifts for men, apostles," &c., Eph. iv. 8, 11, 12. Their gifts, and labours, and lives, all are for their benefit: "All things are yours, Apollos, Cephas," &c., 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. 6th. In praying for faithful ministers, people, in effect, pray for themselves. "I trust I shall be given unto you," that is, for your service, and comfort, and edification in Christ: see 2 Cor. iv. 15. 7th. The humility of the apostle. His liberty, should he have it, he would own to be through their prayers, as well as, or more, than his own; he mentions them only through the high thoughts he had of the prayers of many, and the regards God would shew to his praying people. Thus of the first thing in the apostle's conclusion.

Secondly. He sends salutations from one that was his fellow-prisoner, and four more that were his fellow-labourers.

23 There salute thee Epaphras, my fellowprisoner in Christ Jesus; 24 Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellowlabourers, 14, 15. "But without thy mind;" or consent, or approval. Thy "benefit;" or thy good service. "That the good or beneficence thou mayest do, whatever it be, may be of free will." "For a season," "for ever;" not merely perpetually, "but that thou mightest possess him eternally in the brotherhood of Christ."

20. "Joy;" rather, "Let me have profit of thee in the Lord: refresh my heart in Christ." So best MSS.

23, 24. "Epaphras" may be the same as Epaphroditus (compare Phil. ii. 25), but of this there is no certainty. Epaphras seems to have been a Colossian by birth (Col. iv. 12); he was a faithful teacher among the Colossians (Col. i. 7). He is called a "fellow-prisoner." This may either mean that he was actually imprisoned for the faith, or may be a graceful acknowledgment of the devotion

Saluting is wishing health and peace. Christianity is no enemy to courtesy, but enjoins it, 1 Pet. iii. 8. It is a meet expression of love and respect, and meant to preserve and nourish it; "There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus." He was of Colosse, and so countryman and fellow-citizen with Philemon; by office he seems to have been an evangelist, who laboured among the Colossians, if he was not the first converter of them, for whom he had special affection. "Our dear fellow-servant," said St. Paul, "and for you a faithful minister of Christ," Col. i. 7; and, ch. iv. 12, 13, "a servant of Christ, always labouring for you in prayers." I bear him record that he hath a great zeal for you," &c. A very eminent person therefore this was, who, being at Rome, perhaps accompanying Paul, and labouring in the same work of preaching and propagating the Gospel, was confined in the same prison, and for the same cause; both termed prisoners in Christ Jesus, intimating the ground of their imprisonment,—not any crime or wickedness, but for the faith of Christ, and their service to him. An honour it is to suffer shame for Christ's name. "My fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus" is mentioned as his glory, and the apostle's comfort; not that he was a prisoner, and so hindered from his work, that was matter of affliction, but that, seeing God thus permitted and called him to suffer, his providence so ordered it that they suffered together, and so had the benefit and comfort of one another's prayers, and help it may be in some things; this was a mercy. So God sometimes lightens the sufferings of his servants by the communion of saints, the sweet fellowship they have one with another in their bonds; never more enjoyment of God have they found than when suffering together for God. So Paul and Silas, when their feet were fast in the stocks, their tongues were at liberty, and their hearts tuned for the praises of God. "Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers." The mention of these seems in a sort to interest them in the business of the letter. How ill would it look by denial of the request of it to slight so many worthy names, as most of these (at least) were? Marcus, cousin of Barnabas, and son of Mary, who was so hospitable to the saints at Jerusalem, Col. iv. 10; Acts xii. 12, and whose house was the place of meeting for prayer and worship of God. Though some failing seems to have been in him when Paul and he parted, yet in conjunction with Barnabas he went on with his work, and here Paul and he, we see, were reconciled, and differences forgotten; 2 Tim. iv. 11, he bids Mark to be brought to him, "for he is profitable to me for the ministry," namely, of an evangelist. Aristarchus is mentioned with Marcus, Col. iv. 10, and called there by Paul his "fellow-prisoner;" and speaking there of Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, he adds, "touching whom ye received commandment, if he come unto you receive him," and evidence that himself had received him, and was reconciled to him. Next is Demas, who hitherto it seems appeared not faulty, though, 2 Tim. iv. 10, he is censured as having forsaken Paul from "love of this present world." But how far his forsaking was, whether total from his work and profession, or partial only, and whether he repented and turned to his duty, Scripture is silent, and so must we be. No mark of disgrace lay on him here, but he is joined with others that were faithful, as he is also in Col. iv. 14. Lucas is the last, that beloved physician and evangelist, who came to Rome, companion with Paul, Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11. He was Paul's associate in his greatest dangers, and fellow-labourer. The ministry is not a matter of carnal ease or pleasure, but of pain; if any are idle in it they answer not their calling. Christ bids to "pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers," not loiterers, "into his harvest," Mat. ix. 38. And the people are bid "to know them that labour among them, and are over them in the Lord, and to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake," 1 Thes. v. 12, 13. "My fellow-labourers," saith the apostle. Ministers must be helpers together of the truth; they serve the same Lord, in the same holy work and function, and are expectants of the same glorious reward, therefore must be assistants to each other in furthering the interest of their great and common Master. Thus of the salutations, and then,

Thirdly. Here is the apostle's closing prayer and benediction.

25 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

Here is, 1. What is wished and prayed for; namely, "grace," that is, the free favour and love of God, together with the fruits and effects of it in all good things, for soul and body, for time and eternity. Observe, Grace is the best wish for ourselves and others; with this the apostle begins and ends.

2. From whom; namely, "Our Lord Jesus Christ;" that is, the Son of God, second Person in the Trinity, Lord by natural right, "by whom and for whom all things were created," Col. i. 16; Jno. i. 1-3, "and who is heir of all things," and, as God-man and Mediator, who purchased us, and to whom we are given by the Father: Jesus, that is, the Saviour, Mat. i. 21. We were lost and undone, he recovers us, and repairs the ruin; he saves by merit, procuring pardon and life for us; and by power, rescuing us from sin, and Satan, and hell, and renewing us to the likeness, and bringing us to the enjoyment, of God. Thus is he Jesus, and Christ, the Messiah or Anointed, that is, consecrated and fitted to be king, priest, and prophet to his church. To all those offices were there anointings under the law with oil, and to them was the Saviour spiritually anointed with the Holy Ghost, Acts x. 38. In none but he were all these together, and in such eminence; "He was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows," Psa. xlv. 7. This Lord Jesus Christ is ours by original title to us, and by gospel offers and gift, his purchase of us, and our own acceptance of him, and resignation to him, and mystical union with him; "our Lord Jesus Christ." Observe, All grace to us is from Christ; he purchased and he bestowed it; "Of his fulness we all receive, and grace for grace," Jno. i. 16; "He filleth all in all," Eph. i. 23.

3. To whom; "Your spirit,"—μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν; not Philemon's only, but of all that were named in the inscription. "With your spirit;" that is, with you, the soul or spirit being the immediate seat of grace, whence it influences the whole man, and flows out in gracious and holy actings. All the house saluted are here joined in the closing benediction, the more to mind and quicken all to further the end of the epistle.

"Amen" is added, not only for strong and affectionate summing up the prayer and wish, "So let it be," but as an expression of faith that it will be heard, "So shall it be." And what need we more to make us happy than to have the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ with our spirit? This is the usual benediction, but it may be taken here to have some special respect also to the occasion; the grace of Christ with their spirits, Philemon's especially, would sweeten and mollify them, and take off too deep and keen resentments of injuries, and dispose to forgive others as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us.

to the apostle (compare Rom. xvi. 13). "Marcus;" probably John Mark, cousin to Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), and fellow-labourer with both St. Paul and St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 13). See Acts xii. 12, 25. He has been identified by some with the young man mentioned in Mark xiv. 51, 52. There seems little reason to doubt that he is the same as Mark the Evangelist. "Aristarchus," a Thessalonian (Acts xx. 4), a companion of St. Paul on his third missionary journey, was seized, together with Gaius, in the tumult at Ephesus (Acts xix. 29); said to have been afterwards Bishop of Apamea. "Demas," companion and fellow-worker, who afterwards deserted St. Paul (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 10), is always mentioned with "Lucas," the evangelist and beloved physician, who remained faithful when others forsook the apostle (2 Tim. iv. 11).

OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

CONCERNING this epistle, we must inquire, I. Into the Divine authority of it; for this has been questioned by some whose distempered eyes could not bear the light of it, or whose errors have been confuted by it; such as the Arians, who deny the Godhead and self-existence of Christ, and the Socinians, who deny his satisfaction. But after all the attempts of such men to disparage this epistle, the Divine original of it shines forth with those strong and unclouded rays that he that runs may read it as an eminent part of the canon of Scripture. The Divinity of the matter, the sublimity of the style, the excellency of the design, the harmony of this with other parts of Scripture, and its general reception in the church of God in all ages, these are the evidences of its Divine authority. II. As to the Divine amanuensis or penman of this epistle, we are not so certain; it beareth not the name of any in the front of it, as the rest of the epistles do; and there has been some dispute among the learned to whom they should ascribe it. Some have assigned it to Clemens of Rome, others to Luke, and many to Barnabas, thinking that the style and manner of expression is very agreeable to the zealous, authoritative, affectionate temper that Barnabas appears to be of, in the account we have of him in the Acts of the Apostles; and one ancient father quotes an expression out of this epistle as the words of Barnabas. But it is generally assigned to the apostle Paul; and some later copies and translations have put Paul's name in the title. In the primitive times it was generally ascribed to him; and the style and scope of it very well agrees with his spirit, who was a person of a clear head and a warm heart, whose main end and endeavour was to exalt Christ. And some think that the apostle Peter refers to this epistle, and proves Paul to be the penman of it, by telling the Hebrews, to whom he wrote, of Paul's having written to them, 2 Pet. iii. 15; and we read of no other epistle that he ever wrote to them but this. And though it has been objected that, since Paul put his name to all his other epistles, he would not have omitted it here, yet others have well answered, that he being the apostle of the Gentiles, who were odious to the Jews, might think fit to conceal his name lest their prejudices against him might hinder them from reading and weighing it as they ought to do. III. As to the scope and design of this epistle, it is very evident it was to inform the minds, and strongly to confirm the judgment, of the Hebrews, in the transcendent excellency of the Gospel above the laws, and so to take them off from the ceremonies of the law, to which they were so wedded, of which they were so fond, that they even doted on them. And those of them that were Christians retained too much of the old leaven, and wanted to be purged from it. The design of this epistle was to persuade and press the believing Hebrews to a constant adherence to the Christian faith, and perseverance in it, notwithstanding all the sufferings they might meet with in so doing. In order to this, he speaks much of the excellency of the author of the Gospel, the glorious Jesus, whose honour he advances, and whom he justly prefers before all others, shewing him to be all in all, and this in lofty strains of holy rhetoric. It must be acknowledged there are many things in this epistle hard to be understood; but the sweetness we shall find therein will make us abundant amends for all the pains we take to understand it. And indeed, if we compare all the epistles of the New Testament, we shall not find any of them more replenished with Divine heavenly matter than this to the Hebrews. [The Bible would have been incomplete without this book; and when I think of the relation between the Jewish and the Christian systems—when I look on the splendid rites of the ancient economy, and ask their meaning—when I wish a full guide to heaven, and ask for that which gives completeness to the whole, I turn instinctively to the epistle to the Hebrews. When I wish also that which shall give me the most elevated view of the Great Author of Christianity and of his work, and the most clear conceptions of the sacrifice which he made for sin; and when I look for considerations that shall be most effectual in restraining the soul from apostacy, and for considerations to enable it to bear trials with patience and with hope, my mind recurs to this book, and I feel that the book of revelation, and the hopes of man, would be incomplete without it.—Barnes.]

A.D. 64.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have a twofold comparison stated: I. Between the evangelical and legal dispensation; and the excellency of the Gospel above that of the law is asserted and proved, ver. 1—3. II. Between the glory of Christ and that of the highest creatures, the angels; where the pre-eminence is justly given to the Lord Jesus Christ, and clearly demonstrated to belong unto him, from ver. 4—12.

GOD, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, 2 Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; 3 Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;

A.D. 64.

Here the apostle begins with a general declaration of the excellency of the gospel dispensation above that of the law, which he demonstrates from the different way and manner of God's communicating himself and his mind and will to men in the one and in the other. Both these dispensations were of God, and both of them very good, but there is a great difference in the way of their coming from God.

First. Observe the way wherein God communicated himself and his will to men under the Old Testament. And we have here an account,

1. Of the persons by whom God spoke his mind under the Old Testament, and they were the prophets; that is, persons chosen of God, and qualified by him for that office of revealing the will of God to men. No man taketh this honour to himself unless called; and whoever are called of God are qualified by him.

2. The persons to whom God spake by the prophets to the fathers; that is, to all the Old Testament saints that were under that dispensation. God favoured and honoured them with much clearer light than that of nature, under which the rest of the world were left.

3. The order in which God spake to men in those times that went before the Gospel, those past times. He spake to his ancient people at sundry times, and in divers manners. 1st. At sundry times, or 'by several parts,' as the word signifies, which may refer either to the several ages of the Old Testament dispensation, the patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the prophetic, or to the several gradual openings of his mind piecemeal concerning the Redeemer. To Adam, that the Messiah should come of the seed of the woman; to Abraham, that he should spring from his loins; to Jacob, that he should be of the tribe of Judah; to David, that he should be of his house; to Micah, that he should be born at Bethlehem; to Isaiah, that he should be born of a virgin. 2nd. "In divers manners," according to the different ways in which God thought fit to communicate his mind to the prophets, sometimes by the illapses of his Spirit, sometimes by dreams, sometimes by visions, sometimes by an audible voice, sometimes by legible characters under his own hand, as when he wrote the ten commandments on tables of stone. Of some of these different ways God himself gave an account in Num. xii. 6—8, "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known to him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. Not so with my servant Moses. With him I will speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches."

* By the Rev. W. Tong, with additions from Commentary of Rev. David Dickson, professor of theology in the University of Glasgow, 1680.

Introductory Note.—The canonical authority of the epistle may be considered well established. By orthodox Christians it was universally admitted during the first century after it was written. Clement (A.D. 70 or 95) refers to this epistle in the same way as and more frequently than to any other canonical book. About the close of the second century, its canonical authority was questioned by some of the orthodox Christians of the North African Church; but no Greek or Syriac writer seems to have expressed a doubt. The question of authorship has been widely and warmly debated. It has been assigned to Barnabas, Apollos, Silas, Luke; among German writers the disposition has been to ascribe the epistle to some other writer than St. Paul. Alford has adopted the view that it was written by Apollos, about A.D. 69. On the other hand, the opinion that St. Paul was the author both of the language and the thoughts of the epistle has been maintained by many respectable authorities. The probable opinion is one which reconciles both Secondly. Observe God's method of communicating himself and his mind and will under the New Testament dispensation, these last days as they are called, that is, either towards the end of the world or the end of the Jewish state. The times of the Gospel are the last times. The gospel revelation is the last we are to expect from God. There was first the natural revelation; then the patriarchal by dreams, visions, and voices; then the Mosaic in the law given forth and written down; then the prophetic in explaining the law, and giving clearer discoveries of Christ; but now we must expect no new revelation, but only more of the Spirit of Christ to help us better to understand what is already revealed. Now the excellency of the gospel revelation above the former consists in two things.

1. It is the final, the finishing revelation, given forth in the last days of Divine revelation, to which nothing is to be added but the canon of Scripture, to be settled and sealed; so that now the minds of men are no longer kept in suspense by the expectation of new discoveries, but they rejoice in a complete revelation of the will of God, both perceptive and providential, so far as is necessary for them to know in order to their direction and comfort. For the Gospel includes a discovery of the great events that shall befall the church of God to the end of the world.

2. It is a revelation which God has made by his Son, the most excellent messenger that was ever sent into the world, far superior to all the ancient patriarchs and prophets, by whom God communicated himself to his people in former times. And here we have an excellent account of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

1st. The glory of his office, and that in three respects. First. God hath appointed him to be heir of all things. As God, he was equal to the Father, but as God-man and Mediator he was appointed by the Father to be the heir of all things, that is, the Sovereign Lord of all, the absolute disposer and director and governor of all persons and of all things, Ps. ii. 6, 7: "All power in heaven and earth is given to him; all judgment is committed to him," Mat. xxviii. 18; Jno. v. 22. Secondly. By him God made the worlds, both visible and invisible, the heavens and the earth, not as an instrumental cause, but as his essential word and wisdom. By him he made the old creation, and by him he makes the new creature, and by him he rules and governs both. Thirdly. He upholds all things by the word of his power. He keeps the world from dissolving; by him all things consist. The weight of the whole creation is laid upon Christ; he supports the whole and all the parts. When upon the apostasy the world was breaking to pieces under the wrath and curse of God, the Son of God, undertaking the work of redemption, has bound it up again and established it by his almighty power and goodness. None of the ancient prophets sustained such an office as this, none was sufficient for it.

2nd. From hence the apostle passes to the glory of the person of Christ, who was able to execute such an office. He was the brightness of his Father's glory, and "the express image of his person," ver. 2. This is a high and lofty description of the glorious Redeemer; this is an account of his personal excellency. First. He is in person the Son of God, the only begotten Son of God, and as such he must have the same nature. This personal distinction always supposes one and the same nature. Every son of man is man; were not the nature the same the generation would be monstrous. Secondly. The person of the Son is the glory of the Father shining forth with a truly Divine splendour. As the beams are effulgent emanations of the sun, the father and fountain of light, Jesus Christ in his person is God manifest in the flesh: he is Light of light, the true Shechinah. Thirdly. The person of the Son is the true image and character of the person of the Father; being of the same nature, he must bear the same image and likeness. In beholding the power, wisdom, and goodness of the Lord Jesus Christ, we behold the power, wisdom, and goodness of the Father, for he hath the nature and perfections of God in him. "He that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father," that is, he hath seen the same Being. He that hath known the Son hath known the Father, Jno. xiv. 7-9; for the Son is in the Father, and the Father in the Son; the personal distinction is no other than will consist with essential union. This is the glory of the person of Christ; the fulness of the Godhead dwells, not typically, but really in him.

3rd. From the glory of the person of Christ he proceeds to mention the glory of his grace; his condescension itself was truly glorious. The sufferings of Christ had this great honour in them, to be a full satisfaction for the sins of his people. By himself he purged away our sins, that is, by the proper innate merit of his death and bloodshed; by their infinite intrinsic value, as they were the sufferings of himself, he has made atonement for sin himself. The glory of his person and nature gave to his sufferings such merit as was a sufficient reparation of honour to God, who had suffered an infinite injury and affront by the sins of men.

4th. From the glory of his sufferings we are at length led to consider the glory of his exaltation; when by himself he had "purged away our sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high," at his Father's right hand. As Mediator and Redeemer he is invested with the highest honour, authority, and activity, for the good of his people. The Father now does all things by him, receives all the services of his people from him. Having assumed our nature, and suffered in it on earth, he has taken it up with him to heaven, and there it has the high honour to be next to God; and this was the reward of his humiliation.

Now it was by no less a person than this that God has in these last days spoken to men; and the dignity of the messenger gives authority and excellency to the message, and therefore the dispensations of the Gospel must needs exceed, and very far exceed, the dispensation of the law.

4 Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. 5 For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son? 6 And again, when he bringeth in the firstbegotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him. 7 And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. 8 But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. 9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

The apostle having proved the pre-eminence of the Gospel above the law, from the pre-eminence of the Lord Jesus Christ above the prophets, now proceeds to shew that he is not only much superior to the prophets, but to the angels themselves. In this he obviates an objection that the Jewish zealots would be ready to make, that the law was not only delivered by men, but "ordained by angels," Gal. iii. 19, that they attended at the giving forth of the law, the hosts of heaven being drawn forth to attend the Lord Jehovah on that awful occasion. Now the angels are very glorious beings, far more glorious and excellent than men; the Scripture always represents them as the most excellent of all creatures, and we know of no being but God himself that is higher than the angels; and therefore that law that was ordained by angels ought to be held in great esteem. To take off the force of this argument the penman of this epistle proceeds to state the comparison between Jesus Christ and the holy angels, both in nature and office, and to prove that Christ is vastly superior to the angels themselves. "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." Here observe,

First. The superior nature of Christ is proved from his superior name. The Scripture does not give high and glorious titles without a real foundation and reason in nature, nor would such great things have been said of our Lord Jesus Christ if he had not been as great and excellent as those words import. When it is said that Christ was made so much better than the angels, we are not to imagine that he was a mere creature as the angels are; the word γενόμενος, when joined with an adjective, is nowhere to be rendered created, and here may very well be rendered, 'being more excellent,' as the Syriac version hath it: we read γενέσθαι ὁ θεὸς ἀληθινός, 'let God be true,' not made so, but 'acknowledged' to be so.

Secondly. The superiority of the name and nature of Christ above the angels is declared in the holy Scriptures, and to be deduced from thence. We should have known little or nothing either of Christ or of the angels without the Scriptures, and we must therefore be determined by them in our conceptions of the one and the other. Now here are several passages of Scripture cited, in which those things are said of Christ that were never said of the angels.

1. It was said of Christ, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," Ps. ii. 7, which refers either to his eternal generation, or to his resurrection, or to his solemn inauguration into his glorious kingdom at his ascension and session at the right hand of the Father. Now this was never said concerning the angels, and therefore by inheritance he has a more excellent nature and name than they.

2. It is said concerning Christ, but never concerning the angels, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son," taken from 2 Sam. vii. 14. Not only, I am his Father, and he is my Son, by nature and eternal promanation, but I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, by wonderful conception, and this his sonship shall be the fountain and foundation of every gracious relation between me and fallen man.

3. It is said of Christ, "When God bringeth his first-begotten into the world, let all the angels of God worship him;" that is, either when he is brought into this lower world at his nativity let the angels attend and honour him, or when he is brought into the world above at his ascension, to enter upon his mediatorial kingdom, or when he shall bring him again into the world to judge the world, then let the highest creatures worship him. God will not suffer an angel to continue in heaven that will not be in subjection to Christ, and pay adoration to him, and he will at last make the fallen angels and wicked men to confess his Divine power and authority, and to fall before him; they that would not have him to reign must then be "brought forth and slain before him." The proof of this is taken out of Ps. cxvii. 7, "Worship him all ye gods," that is, all ye that are superior to men, own yourselves to be inferior to Christ in nature and power.

4. God hath said concerning Christ, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever," &c., ver. 8-12; but of the angels he hath only said that he hath made them "spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire," ver. 7. Now upon comparing what he here saith of the angels with what he saith to Christ, the vast inferiority of the angels to Christ will plainly appear.

1st. What doth God say here of the angels? "He maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." This we have in Ps. civ. 4, where it seems to be more immediately spoken of the winds and lightning, but is here applied to the angels, whose agency the Divine providence makes use of in the winds, and in thunder and lightnings. Here, First. The office of the angels; they are God's ministers or servants, to do his pleasure. It is the glory of God that he has such servants; it is yet more so that he does not need them. Secondly. How the angels are qualified for this service. He makes them spirits and a flame of fire, that is, he endows them with light and zeal, with activity and ability, readiness and resolution, to do his pleasure. They are no more than what God hath made them to be, and they are servants to the Son as well as to the Father. But,

2nd. Observe how much greater things are said of Christ by the Father. Here two passages of Scripture are quoted, one out of Ps. xlv. 6, 7, where God declares of Christ,

First. His true and real Divinity, and that with much pleasure and affection, not grudging him that glory; "Thy throne, O God." Here one Person calls another person God, "O God." And if God the Father declares him to be so, he must be really and truly so, for God calls persons and things as they are. And now let who will deny him to be essentially God at their peril, but let us own and honour him as God; for if he had not been God, he had never been fit to have done the Mediator's work, or to have worn the Mediator's crown.

Secondly. God declares his dignity and dominion, as having a throne, a kingdom, and a sceptre of that kingdom. He has all right, rule, authority, and power, both as the God of nature, grace, and glory, and as Mediator; and so he is adequate and sufficient to all the intents and purposes of his mediatorial kingdom.

Thirdly. God declares the eternal duration of the dominion and dignity of Christ, founded upon the Divinity of his person. "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever," from everlasting to everlasting, through all the ages of time, maugre all the attempts of earth and hell to undermine and overthrow it, and through all the endless ages of eternity, when time shall be no more. This distinguishes Christ's throne from all earthly thrones, which are tottering, and will at length tumble down; but the throne of Christ shall be as the days of heaven.

Fourthly. God declares of Christ the perfect equity of his administration, and of the execution of his power, through all the parts of his government. "A sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom," ver. 8. He came extreme theories, and is adopted in the main by the Alexandrian Fathers, and in later times by Davidson, Stuart, Wordsworth, and others. According to this opinion, the epistle was written by one of St. Paul's companions, under the apostle's own direction, not dictation, as in other epistles. There seem very fair grounds for the supposition that St. Luke was the writer, and that the epistle is St. Paul's in the same sense that the speech in Acts xiii. is St. Paul's. It was addressed to Jews, and in all probability to the Jews of Palestine—most likely before the destruction of Jerusalem. The date which best agrees with the views above is about A.D. 63.

i. 1. "Sundry times and in divers manners:" "times," literally "portions." Various portions of truth were revealed to the prophets, one receiving one portion, and another another. "Divers manners:" sometimes by visions, sometimes by word; at other times by inward impulse and teaching.

1. 3. "Brightness of his Father's glory:" the effulgence, the righteously to the sceptre, and he uses it in perfect righteousness; and the righteousness of his government proceeds from the righteousness of his person, from an essential eternal love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity, not merely from considerations of prudence or interest, but from an inward and immovable principle; "Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest iniquity," ver. 9. Christ came to fulfil all righteousness, to bring in an everlasting righteousness; and he was righteous in all his ways, and holy in all works. He has recommended righteousness to men, and restored it among them as a most excellent and amiable thing. He came to finish transgression, and to make an end of sin, as a hateful as well as hurtful thing.

Fifthly. God declares of Christ how he was qualified for the office of Mediator, and how he was installed and confirmed in it; ver. 9, "Therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." 1st. Christ hath the name Messiah from his being anointed. God's anointing of Christ signifies both his qualifying of him for the office of the Mediator with the Holy Spirit and all his graces, and likewise his inauguration of him into the office, as prophets, priests, and kings were, by anointing. "God, even thy God," imports the confirmation of Christ in the office of Mediator by the covenant of redemption and peace that was between the Father and the Son. God is the God of Christ, as Christ is man and Mediator. 2nd. This anointing of Christ was "with the oil of gladness," which signifies both the gladness and cheerfulness with which Christ undertook and went through the office of Mediator, finding himself so absolutely sufficient for it, and also that joy that was set before him as the reward of his service and sufferings, that crown of glory and gladness he should wear for ever after the suffering of death. 3rd. This anointing of Christ was above the anointing of his fellows. "God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Who are Christ's fellows? Has he any equals? Not as God, except the Father and Spirit, but these are not here meant. But as man he has his fellows, and as an anointed person, but his unction is beyond all theirs. (1.) Above the angels, who may be said to be his fellows, as they are the sons of God by creation, and God's messengers, whom he employs in his service. (2.) Above all prophets, priests, and kings, that ever were anointed with oil, to be employed in the service of God on earth. (3.) Above all the saints, who are his brethren, children of the same Father, as he was a partaker with them of flesh and blood. 4th. Above all those that were related to him as man, above all the house of David, all the tribe of Judah, all his brethren and kinsmen in the flesh. All God's other anointed ones had only the Spirit in a certain measure, Christ had the Spirit above measure, without any limitation. None therefore goes through his work as Christ did, none takes so much pleasure in it as Christ does; for he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows.

The other passage of Scripture, in which is the superior excellence of Christ to the angels, is taken out of Ps. cii. 25-27, and is thus recited here:—

10 And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands: 11 They shall perish; but thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; 12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

In these verses the omnipotency of the Lord Jesus Christ is declared, as it appears both in creating the world and in changing it.

First. In creating the world; ver. 10, "And thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands." The Lord Christ had the original right to govern the world, because he made the world in the beginning; his right as Mediator was by commission from the Father; his right as God with the Father was absolute, resulting from his creating power. This power he had before the beginning of the world, and he exerted it in giving a beginning and being to the world. He must therefore be no part of the world himself, for then he must give himself a beginning. He was πρὸ πάντων,—"before all things," and "by him all things consist," Col. i. 17. Not only above all things in condition, but before all things in existence; and therefore must be God and self-existent. He laid the foundations of the earth, did not only introduce new forms into pre-existent matter, but made out of nothing the foundations of the earth, the primordia rerum,—"the first principles of things." He not only founded the earth, but the heavens too are the work of his hands, both the habitation and the inhabitants, the hosts of heaven, the angels themselves, and therefore he must needs be infinitely superior to them.

Secondly. In changing the world that he has made; and here the mutability of this world is brought in to illustrate the immutability of Christ.

1. This world is mutable; all created nature is so. This world has passed through many changes, and shall pass through more: all these changes are by the permission, and under the direction, of Christ, that made the world; ver. 11, 12, "They shall perish, they shall all wax old as doth a garment; as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed." This our visible world, both the earth and visible heavens, are growing old. Not only men, and beasts, and trees grow old, but this world itself grows old, and is hastening to its dissolution; it changes like a garment, has lost much of its beauty and strength; it grew old betimes on the first apostacy, and it has been waxing older and growing weaker ever since; it bears the symptoms of a dying world. But then its dissolution shall not be its utter destruction, but its change. Christ will fold up this world as a garment, not to be abused any longer, not to be any longer used so as it has been. Let us not then set our hearts upon that which is not what we take it to be, and will not be what it now is. Sin has made a great change in the world for the worse, and Christ will make a great change in it for the better. We look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Let the consideration of this wean us from the present world, and make us watchful, diligent, and desirous of that better world, and let us wait on Christ to change us into a meetness for that new world that is approaching; we cannot enter into it till we be new creatures.

2. Christ is immutable. Thus the Father testifies of him, "Thou remainest, thy years shall not fail." Christ is the same in himself, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever, and the same to his people in all the changes of time. And this may well support all that have an interest in Christ under all the changes they meet with in the world, and under all they feel in themselves. Christ is immutable and immortal, his years shall not fail. This may comfort us under all decays of nature that we may observe in ourselves or in our friends, though our flesh and heart fail, and our days are hastening to an end. Christ lives to take care of us while we live, and of ours when we are gone, and this radiant beam. Some think there is an allusion to the Shekinah (Exod. xvi. 7, 10). "Express image of his person," or his substance, essence. "Express image;" the word strictly means the instrument for marking, or graving—e.g., the die by which the impression is made. Thence it came to be used for the stamp—the impression itself. Both are true of Christ, who not only expresses God (compare John i. 1 and xiv. 8) to us, but also impresses the image and super-scription of God upon those who receive him. (Compare John i. 12 should quicken us all to make our interest in him clear and sure, that our spiritual and eternal life may "be hid with Christ in God."

13 But to which of the angels said he at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool? 14 Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?

This concludes the comparison between Christ and the angels, and the preference of Christ to them; God never said to the angels what he has said to Christ.

First. What hath God said to Christ? He hath said, "Sit thou at my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool," Ps. cx. 1, that is, Receive thou glory, dominion and rest, and remain in the administration of thy mediatorial kingdom until all thine enemies shall either be made thy friends, by conversion, or thy footstool. Note,

1. Christ Jesus has his enemies; would one think it? Enemies even among men, enemies to his sovereignty, to his cause, to his people; such as will not have him to reign over them. Let us not think it strange then if we have our enemies. Christ never did any thing to make men his enemies; he has done a great deal to make them all his friends and his Father's friends, and yet he has his enemies.

2. All the enemies of Christ shall be made his footstool, either by humble submission and entire subjection to his will, casting themselves down at his feet, or by utter destruction; he shall trample upon those that continue obstinate, and shall triumph over them.

3. God the Father hath undertaken for this, and he will see it done, yea, he will himself do it; and though it be not done presently, it shall certainly be done, and Christ waits for it; and so must Christians wait till God has wrought all their works in them, for them, and by them.

4. Christ shall go on to rule and reign till this is done; he shall not leave any of his great designs unfinished, he shall go on conquering and to conquer. And it becomes his people to go on in their duty, being what he would have them to be, doing what he would have them to do, avoiding what he would have them to avoid, bearing what he would have them to bear, till he makes them conquerors, and more than conquerors, over all their spiritual enemies.

Secondly. What hath God said of the angels? He never said to them as he said to Christ, "Sit ye at my right hand;" but he has said of them here that they are "ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be the heirs of salvation." Note,

1. What the angels are as to their nature. They are "spirits," that is, without bodies, or inclination to bodies, and yet they can assume bodies, and appear in them when God pleases. They are spirits, incorporeal, intelligent, active substances; they excel in wisdom and strength.

2. What the angels are as to their office. They are "ministering spirits." Christ, as Mediator, is the great minister of God in the great work of redemption. The Holy Spirit is the great minister of God and Christ in the application of this redemption. Angels are ministering spirits under the blessed Trinity, to execute the Divine will and pleasure; they are the ministers of Divine Providence.

3. The angels are sent forth for this end, to minister to "them who shall be the heirs of salvation." Here observe, 1st. The description given of the saints. They are "heirs of salvation;" at present they are under age, heirs, not inheritors. They are heirs, because they are the children of God; "if children, then heirs." Let us make sure that we are children by adoption and regeneration, having made a covenant resignation of ourselves to God, and walking before him in a gospel conversation, and then we are "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." [And they shall surely get salvation, as a heritage never to be taken from them.] 2nd. The dignity and privilege of the saints—the angels are sent forth to minister for them. Thus they have done in attending and acting at the giving forth of the law, in fighting the battles of the saints, in destroying their enemies. They still minister for them in opposing the malice and power of evil spirits, in protecting and keeping their bodies, pitching their tents about theirs, instructing, quickening, and comforting their souls under Christ and the Holy Ghost; and thus they shall do in gathering all the saints together at the last day. Bless God for the ministration of angels, keep in God's way, and take the comfort of this promise, that he will "give his angels charge over you, to keep you in all your ways. They shall bear you up in their hands, lest you dash your feet against a stone," Ps. xci. 11, 12.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Makes some application of the doctrine laid down in the foregoing chapter concerning the excellency of the person of Christ, both by way of exhortation and argument, ver. 1-4. II. Enlarges farther upon the pre-eminence of Christ above the angels, ver. 5-9. III. He proceeds to remove the scandal of the cross, ver. 10-15. IV. To assert the incarnation of Christ, taking upon him not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham, and assigns the reason of his so doing, ver. 16-18.

HEREFORE we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip. 2 For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward; 3

How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; and 2 Cor. iii. 18.) "All things;" Alford renders "the universe." "When he had," &c.: the words "by himself" and "our" are wanting in oldest MSS. "Purged;" having made a purification from sins. The allusion to Levitical rites is too distinct to be overlooked. The word (purification) is used in the Septuagint (Exod. xxix. 36, xxx. 10). Christ made purification, thus enabling those who were unclean because of sins to draw near. (Compare Heb. x. 19).

i. 4. "Being made so much better;" or having become so much

4 God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?

The apostle proceeds in the plain, profitable method of doctrine, reason, and use through this epistle. Here we have the application of the truths before asserted and proved; this is brought in by the illative particle, "therefore," with which this chapter begins, and which shews its connexion with the former; where the apostle having proved Christ to be superior to the angels, by whose ministry the law was given, and therefore that the gospel dispensation must be more excellent than the legal, he now comes to apply this doctrine, both by way of exhortation and argument.

First. By way of exhortation; ver. 1, "Therefore we ought to give the more diligent heed to the things which we have heard." This is the first way by which we are to shew our esteem of Christ and of the Gospel. It is the great concern of every one under the Gospel to give the most earnest heed to all gospel discoveries and directions; that is, to prize them highly in our judgments as matters of the greatest importance, to hearken to them diligently in all the opportunities we have for that purpose, to read them frequently, to meditate on them closely, and to mix faith with them; to embrace them in our hearts and affections, to retain them in our memories, and finally to regulate our words and actions according to them.

Secondly. By way of argument, he adds strong motives to enforce the exhortation.

1. From the great loss we shall sustain if we do not take this earnest heed to the things we have heard; we shall "let them slip." They will leak and run out of our heads, lips and lives, and we shall be great losers by our neglect. Learn, 1st. That when we have received gospel truths into our minds, we are in danger of letting them slip. Our minds and memories are like a leaking vessel, they do not without much care retain what is poured into them; this proceeds from the corruption of our natures, the enmity and subtlety of Satan, he steals away the word; from the entanglements and snares of the world, the thorns that choke the good seed. 2nd. That those meet with an inconceivable loss who let gospel truths which they had received slip out of their minds; they have lost a treasure far better than thousands of gold and silver. The seed is lost, their time and pains in hearing lost, and their hopes of a good harvest lost; all is lost if the Gospel be lost. 3rd. This consideration should be a strong motive, both to our attention to the Gospel and retention of it; and, indeed, if we do not well attend, so we shall not long retain the word of God; inattentive hearers will soon be forgetful hearers.

2. Another argument is taken from that dreadful punishment we shall incur if we do not this duty, a more dreadful punishment than those fell under who neglected and disobeyed the law, ver. 2-4. Here observe,

1st. How the law is described. It was "the word spoken by angels," and declared to be "steadfast." It was the word spoken by angels; because given by the ministration of angels, they sounding the trumpet, and perhaps forming the words according to God's direction; and God, as Judge, will make use of the angels to sound the trumpet a second time, and gather all to his tribunal to receive their sentence, as they have conformed or not conformed to the law. And this law is declared to be steadfast; it is like the promise, "Yea, and amen;" it is truth and faithfulness, and it will abide and have its force whether men obey it or no; for "every transgression and disobedience will receive a just recompence of reward." If men trifle with the law of God, the law will not trifle with them; it has taken hold of the sinners of former ages, and will take hold of them in all ages. God, as a righteous Governor and Judge, when he had given forth the law, would not let the contempt and breach of it go unpunished; but he has from time to time reckoned with the transgressors of it, and recompensed them according to the nature and aggravation of their disobedience. Observe, The severest punishment God ever inflicted upon sinners is no more than what sin deserves; it is "just recompence of reward." Punishments are as just, and as much due to sin, as rewards are to obedience; yea, more due than rewards are to imperfect obedience.

2nd. How the Gospel is described. It is salvation, a great salvation; "so great salvation," that no other salvation can compare with it; so great that none can fully express, no, nor yet conceive how great it is. It is a great salvation that the Gospel discovers; for it discovers a great Saviour, one that has manifested God to be reconciled to our nature, and reconcilable to our persons. It shews how we may be saved from so great sin and so great misery, and be restored to so great holiness and so great happiness. The Gospel discovers to us a great Sanctifier, to qualify us for salvation, and to bring us to the Saviour. The Gospel unfolds a great and excellent dispensation of grace, a new covenant; the great charter, deed and instrument is settled and secured to all those that come into the bond of the covenant.

3rd. How sinning against the Gospel is described. It is declared to be a neglect of this great salvation, it is a contempt put upon the saving grace of God in Christ, making light of it, not caring for it, not thinking it worth their while to acquaint themselves with it, not regarding either the worth of gospel grace, or their own want of it, and undone state without it; not using their endeavours to discern the truth of it, and assent to it, nor to discern the goodness of it so as to approve of it, or apply it to themselves. In these things they discover a plain neglect of this great salvation. Let us all take heed that we be not found among those wicked, wretched sinners that neglect the grace of the Gospel.

4th. How the misery of such sinners is described, and it is declared to be unavoidable; ver. 3, "How shall we escape?" This intimates, First. That the despisers of this salvation are condemned already; under arrest, and in the hands of justice already. So they were by the sin of Adam; and they have strengthened their bonds by their personal transgression; Jno. iii. 18, "He that believeth not is condemned already." Secondly. There is no escaping out of this condemned state, but by accepting the great salvation discovered in the Gospel: as for those that neglect it, the wrath of God is upon them, and it abides upon them; they cannot disengage themselves, they cannot emerge, they cannot get from under the curse. Thirdly. That there is a yet more aggravated curse and condemnation waiting for all those that despise the grace of God in Christ, and that most heavy curse they cannot escape; they can neither conceal their persons at the great day, nor deny the fact, nor bribe the Judge, nor break the prison. There is no door of mercy left open for them, there shall "be no more sacrifice for sin," they are irrevocably lost. The unavoidableness of the misery of such is here expressed by way of question, "How shall we escape?" It is an appeal to universal reason, to the consciences of sinners themselves, it is a challenge to all their power and policy, to all their interest and alliances, whether they, or any for them, can find out, or can force out, a way of escape from the vindictive justice and wrath of God. It intimates that the neglecters of this great salvation will be left not only without power, but without plea and excuse, at the judgment-day. If they be asked what they have to say that the sentence should not be executed upon them, they will be speechless and self-condemned by their own consciences, even to a greater degree of misery than those fell under that neglected the authority of the law, or that sinned without the law.

3. Another argument to enforce the exhortation is taken from the dignity and excellency of the person by whom the Gospel began to be spoken; ver. 3, "It began at first to be spoken by the Lord," that is, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is Jehovah, the Lord of life and glory, Lord of all, and, as such, possessed of unerring and infallible wisdom, infinite and inexhaustible goodness, unquestionable and unchangeable veracity and faithfulness, absolute sovereignty and authority, and irresistible power. This great Lord of all was the first that began to speak it plainly and clearly without types and shadows, as it was before he came. Now surely it may be expected that all will reverence this Lord, and take heed to a Gospel that began to be spoken by one that "spoke so as never man spoke."

4. Another argument is taken from the character of those that were witnesses to Christ and the Gospel; ver. 3, 4, "It was confirmed to us by them that heard him, God also bearing them witness." Observe,

1st. The promulgation of the Gospel was continued and confirmed by those that heard Christ; by the evangelists and apostles, who were eye and ear-witnesses of what Jesus Christ "began both to do and to teach," Acts i. 1. These witnesses could have no worldly end or interest of their own to serve hereby. Nothing could induce them to give in their evidence but the Redeemer's glory, and their own and others' salvation; they exposed themselves by their testimony to the loss of all that was dear to them in this life, and many of them sealed it with their blood.

2nd. "God himself bore witness" to those that were witnesses for Christ; he testified that they were authorised and sent by him to preach Christ and salvation by him to the world. And how did he bear them witness? Not only by giving them great peace in their own minds, great patience under all their sufferings, and unspeakable courage and joy, though these were witnesses to themselves; but he bore them witness "by signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will." First. With "signs;" signs of his gracious presence with them, and of his power working by them. Secondly. "Wonders;" works quite beyond the power of nature, and out of the course of nature, filling the spectator with wonder and admiration, stirring them up to attend to the doctrine preached, and to inquire into it. Thirdly. "Divers miracles," or mighty works; in which an almighty agency did appear beyond all reasonable controversy. Fourthly. "Gifts of the Holy Ghost;" qualifying, enabling, and exciting them to do the work to which they were called; "Divisions or distributions of the Holy Ghost, diversities of gifts," 1 Cor. xii. 4, &c. And all this according to God's own will; it was the will of God that we should have sure footing for our faith, and a strong foundation for our hope in receiving the Gospel. As at the giving forth of the law there were signs and wonders by which God testified the authority and excellency of it, so he witnessed to the Gospel by more and greater miracles, as to a more excellent and abiding dispensation.

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak. 6 But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? 7 Thou madest him a little lower than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands: 8 Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. 9 But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man.

The apostle having made this serious application of the doctrine of the personal excellency of Christ above the angels, he now returns to that pleasant subject again, and pursues it farther; ver. 5, "For unto the angels hath he not put into subjection the world to come, whereof we speak."

First. Here the apostle lays down a negative proposition, including a positive one, that the state of the gospel church, which is here called "the world to come," is not subjected to the angels, but under the special care and direction of the Redeemer himself. Neither the state in which the church is at present, nor that more completely restored state to which it shall arrive, when the prince of this world is cast out, and the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdom of Christ, is left to the government of the angels, but Jesus Christ will take to him his great power, and will reign. He does not make that use of the ministration of angels to give the Gospel as he did the law, which was the state of the old or antiquated world.

[He calleth the world under the kingdom of the Messias "the world to come;" first to put a difference betwixt the estate of the world considered as under sin and under the Messias. It is called "the world to come" also, because, albeit this change began with the work of grace before Christ came, yet it was nothing in comparison of the world to come under the Messias. And that which is now under the Gospel is little or nothing in comparison of that glorious change of the nature and use of all things, under Christ's subjects, which is to be revealed at his last coming. Then whatsoever thing we have hitherto found to our good, since we knew Christ, it is but little to what shall be. Our world is but to come, 1 Cor. xv. 9.]

This new world is committed to Christ, and only put in absolute subjection to him in all spiritual and eternal concerns. Christ has the administration of the gospel church, which at once speaks Christ's honour, and the church's happiness and safety. It is certain that neither the first creation of the gospel church, nor its after-edification or administration, nor its final judgment and perfection, are committed to the angels, but to Christ. God would not put so great a trust in his holy ones; his angels were too weak for such a charge.

Secondly. We have a Scripture account of that blessed Jesus to whom the gospel world is put into subjection. It is taken from Ps. vii. 4-6, "But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of better. Christ was, originally and essentially, the brightness of his Father's glory, and so better, superior to angels. The force of being made so much better, &c., is to be found in chap. ii. 9, for he was made lower than the angels for the purposes of redemption.

i. 7. "Who maketh his angels spirits;" rather, "winds." This makes the double comparison clear—winds and flames. The Targum paraphrase of Psa. civ. 4 is, "Who maketh his messengers swift as winds, and his ministers strong as flaming fire."

i. 14. "To minister for them;" Alford renders, "Sent forth for ministry on account of them"—i.e., not necessarily to those who shall be heirs, but all the ministry of these angels tends to the welfare of God's children. (Compare Rom. viii. 28.)

ii. 1. "Let them slip;" rather, lest we should "flow past them," or "drift away from them," hence be diverted from them. The fear is lest we should drift from the anchorage.

ii. 2. "Steadfast;" or proved to be of authority. Alford renders him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him?" &c. These words are to be considered both as applicable to mankind in general and as applied here to the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. As applicable to mankind in general; where we have an affectionate, thankful expostulation with the great God concerning his wonderful condescension and kindness to the sons of men. 1st. In remembering them, or being mindful of them, when yet they had no being but in the counsels of Divine love. The favours of God to men all spring up out of his eternal thoughts and purposes of mercy for them; as all our dutiful regards to God spring forth from our remembrance of him. God is always mindful of us, let us never be forgetful of him. 2nd. In visiting him; God's purpose of favours for men is productive of gracious visits to them; he comes to see us, how it is with us, what we all, what we want, and by his visitation our spirit is preserved. Let us so remember God as daily to approach him in a way of duty. 3rd. In making him the head of all the creatures in this lower world, the topstone of this building, the chief of the ways of God on earth, and only "a little lower than the angels," in place and respect to the body while here, and to be made like the angels, and "equal to the angels at the resurrection of the just." Lu. xx. 36. 4th. In crowning him with glory and honour, the honour of having noble powers and faculties of soul, excellent organs and parts of body; whereby he is allied to both worlds, capable of serving the interests of both worlds, and of enjoying the happiness of both. 5th. In giving him right to, and dominion over, the inferior creatures, which did continue so long as he continued in his allegiance and duty to God.

2. This is here plainly applied to the Lord Jesus Christ; and the whole that is here said can only be applied to him, ver. 8, 9. And here you may observe, 1st. What is the moving cause of all the kindness God shews to men in giving Christ for them, and to them; and that is "the grace of God." For what is man? 2nd. What are the fruits of this free grace of God with respect to the gift of Christ for us and to us, as related in this Scripture testimony. First. That God was mindful of Christ for us in the covenant of redemption. Secondly. That God visited Christ on our account; and it was concluded between them that, in the fulness of time, Christ should come into the world as the great archetypal sacrifice. Thirdly. That God had made him "a little lower than the angels," in his being made man, that he might suffer and humble himself to death. Fourthly. That God crowned the human nature of Christ with glory and honour in his being perfectly holy, and having the Spirit without measure, and by an ineffable union with the Divine nature in the second person of the Trinity; "The fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him bodily," that by his sufferings he might make satisfaction, tasting death for every man, that is, sensibly feeling and undergoing the bitter agonies of that shameful, painful, and cursed death of the cross, hereby putting all mankind into a new state of trial. Fifthly. That as a reward of his humiliation in suffering death, he was "crowned with glory and honour;" advanced to the highest dignity in heaven, and having absolute dominion over all things; thus accomplishing that ancient Scripture in Christ, which never was so accomplished or fulfilled in any mere man that ever was upon earth.

10 For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings. 11 For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, 12 Saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. 13 And again, I will put my trust in him. And again, Behold I and the children which God hath given me.

Having mentioned the death of Christ, the apostle proceeds to prevent and remove the scandal of the cross; and this he does by shewing both how it became God that Christ should suffer, and how much man should be benefited by those sufferings.

First. How it became God that Christ should suffer; ver. 10. "For it became him, for whom are all things, and to whom are all things, in bringing many sons to glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Where,

1. God is described as the final end and first cause of all things; and, as such, it became him to secure his own glory in all that he did, not only to act so as that he might in nothing dishonour himself, but that he might from every thing have a revenue of glory.

2. He is declared to have acted up to this glorious character in the work of redemption; and that both as to the choice of the end and means.

1st. In the choice of the end; and that was to "bring many sons to glory," to present glory in enjoying the glorious privileges of the Gospel, and to future glory in heaven, which will be glory indeed, an exceeding, eternal weight of glory. Here observe, First. We must be the sons of God, both by adoption and regeneration, before we can be brought to the glory of heaven. Heaven is the inheritance, and only those that are the children are heirs of that inheritance. Secondly. All true believers are the children of God; "To them that receive Christ he has granted the power and privilege of being the children of God, even to as many as believe on his name," Jno. i. 12. Thirdly. That though the sons of God are but a few in one place, and at one time, yet, when they shall be all brought together, it will appear that they are many. Christ is "the first-born among many brethren." Fourthly. That all the sons of God, how many soever they are, or however dispersed and divided, shall at length be brought together to glory.

2nd. In the choice of the means. First. In finding out such a person as should be "the Captain of our salvation." Those that are saved must come to that salvation under the conduct of a Captain and leader sufficient for that purpose; and they must be all listed under the banner of this Captain. "They must endure hardship as good soldiers of Christ;" they must follow their Captain, and they that do so shall be brought safely off, and shall inherit great glory and honour. Secondly. In making this Captain of our salvation "perfect through sufferings." God the Father made the Lord Jesus Christ the Captain of our salvation; that is, he consecrated, he appointed him to that office, he gave him a commission for it, and he made him a perfect Captain. He had perfection of wisdom, and courage, and strength by the Spirit of the Lord, which he had without measure; he was made "perfect through sufferings," that is, he perfected the work of our redemption by shedding his blood, and was thereby perfectly qualified to be a Mediator between God and man. He found his way to the crown by the cross, and so must his people too. The excellent Dr. Owen observes, that the Lord Christ, being consecrated and perfected through suffering, hath consecrated the way of suffering for all his followers to pass through unto glory; and hereby their sufferings are made necessary and unavoidable, they are hereby made honourable, useful, and profitable.

Secondly. He shews how much they would be benefited by the cross and sufferings of Christ. As there was nothing unbecoming God and Christ, so there was that which would be very beneficial to men in these sufferings. Hereby they are brought into a near union with Christ, and into a very endearing relation.

1. Into a near union; ver. 11. "Both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one." Observe, Christ is he that sanctifieth, he hath purchased and sent the sanctifying Spirit; he is the head of all sanctifying influences. The Spirit sanctifieth as the Spirit of Christ. True believers are they who are sanctified, endowed with holy principles and powers, separated and set apart from mean and vile uses to high and holy uses and purposes; for so they must be before they can be brought to glory. Now Christ, that is the agent in this work of sanctification, and Christians that are the recipient subjects, are all of one. How? Why, 1st. They are all of one heavenly Father, and that is God. God is the Father of Christ by eternal generation, and by miraculous conception, &c.; of Christians by adoption and regeneration. 2nd. They are of one earthly father, Adam. Christ and believers have the same human nature. 3rd. Of one spirit, one holy and heavenly disposition. The same mind is in them that was in Christ, though not in the same measure. The same Spirit informs and actuates the head and all the members.

2. Into an endearing relation. This results from the union; and here first he declares what this relation is, and then he quotes three texts out of the Old Testament to illustrate and prove it.

1st. He declares what this relation is; he and believers being all of one, he therefore is not ashamed to call them brethren. Observe, First. Christ and believers are brethren; not only bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, but spirit of his spirit; brethren by the whole blood, in what is heavenly as well as in what is earthly. Secondly. Christ is not ashamed to own this relation; he is not ashamed to call them brethren, which is wonderful goodness and condescension in him, considering their meanness by nature, and vileness by sin; but he will never be ashamed of any that are not ashamed of him, and that take care not to be a shame and reproach to him and to themselves.

2nd. He illustrates this from three texts of Scripture. The first is out of Ps. xlii. 22. "I will declare thy name unto my brethren; in the midst of the church will I sing praises unto thee." This psalm was an eminent prophecy of Christ; it begins with his words on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Now here it is foretold, First. That Christ should have a church or congregation in the world, a company of volunteers, freely willing to follow him. Secondly. That these should not only be brethren to one another, but to Christ himself. Thirdly. That he would declare his Father's name to them, that is, his nature, attribute, his mind and will; and that he did in his own person while he dwelt among us, and by his Spirit poured out upon his disciples, enabling them to spread the knowledge of God in the world from one generation to another to the end of the world. Fourthly. That Christ would sing praise to his Father in the church. The glory of the Father was what Christ had in his eye; his heart was set upon it, he laid out himself for it, and he would have his people to join with him in it. The second Scripture is quoted from Ps. xviii. 2. "And again I will put my trust in him." That psalm sets forth the troubles that David, as a type of Christ, met with, and how he in all his troubles put his trust in God. Now this shews, that besides his Divine nature, which needed no supports, he was to take another nature upon him, that would want those supports that none but God could give. He suffered and trusted as our head and president.—Owen, in loc. His brethren must suffer and trust too. The third Scripture is taken from Isa. viii. 18. "Behold, I and the children which God hath given me." This proves Christ really and truly man, for parents and children are of the same nature with Christ. Children were given him of the Father in the counsel of his eternal love, and that covenant of peace that was between them; and they are given to Christ at their conversion. When they take hold of his covenant, then Christ receives them, rules over them, rejoices in them, perfects all their affairs, takes them up to heaven, and there presents them to his Father, "Behold, I and the children which thou hast given me."

14 Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; 15 And deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. 16 For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. 17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. 18 For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.

Here the apostle proceeds to assert the incarnation of Christ, as taking upon him not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham; and he shews the reason and design of his so doing.

First. The incarnation of Christ is asserted; ver. 16. "Verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham." He took part of flesh and blood: though as God he pre-existed from all eternity, yet in fulness of time he took one of our nature into union with his Divine nature, and became really and truly man. He did not lay hold of angels, but he laid hold of the seed of Abraham. The angels fell, and he let them go, and lie under the desert, deilement, and dominion of their sin, without hope or help. Christ never designed to be the Saviour of the fallen angels; as their tree fell, so it lies, and must lie to eternity, and therefore he did not assume their nature: the "binding." "Transgression and disobedience;" the first word refers to the actual breach of ascertained and known commandments, the second to neglect in ascertaining the rule of duty.

ii. 3. "Neglect;" if we have neglected, or if we have no care for, have been careless of a salvation which is so great. "Seeing that it, having begun to be spoken by the Lord, was confirmed," &c.

ii. 4. "Bearing them witness;" omit "them." The witness of God by signs, &c., is to the great salvation—the Gospel.

ii. 7. "And didst set him over the works of thy hands:" these words are omitted in some MSs.

ii. 9. The arrangement of this verse as given in Alford's translation gives a different turn to the thought. In the English version the train of thought suggested is that Jesus was made a little lower than the angels that he might suffer death. Alford's version brings out the real point, which is that Jesus, on account of his suffering death, is crowned, &c. His translation is, "But him that is made a little nature of angels could not be an atoning sacrifice for the sin of man. Now Christ resolving to recover the seed of Abraham, and raise them up from their fallen state, he took upon him the human nature from one descended from the loins of Abraham, that the same nature that had sinned might suffer to restore human nature to a state of hope and trial, and all that accepted of mercy to a state of special favour and salvation. Now there is hope and help for the chief of sinners in and through Christ. Here is a price paid sufficient for all, and suitable to all, for it was in our nature. Let us to all then know the day of our gracious visitation, and improve that distinguishing mercy which has been shewn to fallen men, not to the fallen angels.

Secondly. The reasons and designs of the incarnation of Christ are declared, 1. Because "the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he must take part of the same, and be made like his brethren," ver. 14, 15. For no higher nor lower nature than man's that had sinned could so suffer for the sin of man as to satisfy the justice of God, and raise man up to a state of hope, and make believers the children of God, and so brethren to Christ.

2. He became man, that he might die. As God, he could not die, and therefore he assumes another nature and state. Here the wonderful love of God appeared, that when Christ knew what he must suffer in our nature, and how he must die in it, yet he so readily took it upon him. The legal sacrifices and offerings God could not accept as a propitiation. A body was prepared for Christ, and he said, "Lo! I come, I delight to do thy will."

3. "That through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil," ver. 14. The devil was the first sinner, and the first tempter to sin, and sin was the procuring cause of death; and he may be said to have the power of death, as he draws men into sin, the ways whereof are death, and as he is often permitted to terrify the consciences of men with the fear of death, and as he is the executioner of Divine justice, haling their souls from their bodies to the tribunal of God, there to receive their doom; and then being their tormentor, as he was before their tempter; in these respects he may be said to have had the power of death. But now Christ has so far destroyed him that had the power of death that he can keep none under the power of spiritual death, nor can he draw any into sin, (the procuring cause of death,) nor require the soul of any from the body, nor execute the sentence upon any but those who choose and continue to be his willing slaves, and persist in their enmity to God.

4. That he might deliver his own people from that slavish fear of death that they are often subject to. This may refer to the Old Testament saints, who were more under a spirit of bondage, because life and immortality were not so fully brought to light as now they are by the Gospel; or, it may refer to all the people of God, whether under the Old Testament or the New, whose minds are often in perplexing fears about death and eternity. Christ became man, and died to deliver them from those perplexities of soul, by letting them know that death is not only a conquered enemy, but a reconciled friend; not sent to hurt the soul, or separate it from the love of God, but to put an end to all their grievances and complaints, and to give them a passage to eternal life and blessedness. So that death now to them is not in the hand of Satan, but in the hand of Christ; not Satan's servant, but Christ's servant; has not hell following it, but heaven to all that are in Christ.

5. Christ must be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in the things pertaining to the justice and honour of God, and to the support and comfort of his people. He must be faithful to God and merciful to men,

1st. In things pertaining to God, to his justice, and to his honour, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people, to make all the attributes of the Divine nature, and all the persons subsisting therein, harmonize in man's recovery, and fully to reconcile God and man. Observe, First. There was a great breach and quarrel between God and man by reason of sin. Secondly. Christ by becoming man, and dying, hath taken up the quarrel, and made reconciliation so far as that God is ready to receive all into favour and friendship that come to him through Christ.

2nd. In things pertaining to his people, to their support and comfort; ver. 18, "In that he suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted." Where observe, First. Christ's passion. He suffered being tempted, and his temptations were not the least part of his sufferings; "He was in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin," ch. iv. 15. Secondly. Christ's compassion. He is able to succour them that are tempted; he is touched with a feeling of our infirmities; a sympathising physician, tender and skilful, he knows how to deal with tempted sorrowful souls, because he has been himself sick of the same disease, not of sin, but of temptation and trouble of soul. The remembrance of his own sorrows and temptations makes him mindful of the trials of his people, and ready to help them. Here observe, 1st. The best of Christians are subject to temptations, to many temptations while in this world; let us never count upon an absolute freedom from temptations in this world. 2nd. Temptations bring our souls into such distress and danger as to need support and succour. 3rd. That Christ is ready and willing to succour those that under their temptations apply themselves to him, and that he became man, and was tempted, that he might be every way qualified to succour his people.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter the apostle applies what he had said in the foregoing chapter concerning the priesthood of Christ: 1. In a serious pathetic exhortation that this great High Priest, that was discovered to them, might be seriously considered by them, ver. 1-6. 2. And then adds many weighty counsels and cautions, ver. 7-19.

WHEREFORE, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus; 2 Who was faithful to him that appointed him, as also Moses was faithful in all his house. 3 For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house. 4 For every house is builded by some man; but he that built all things is God. 5 And Moses verily was faithful in all his house, as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after; 6 But Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

In these verses we have the application of that doctrine laid down in the close of the last chapter concerning the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And observe,

First. In how fervent and affectionate a manner the apostle exhorts Christians to have this High Priest much in their thoughts, and to make him the object of their close and serious consideration, and surely no one in earth or heaven deserves our consideration more than he. That this exhortation might be made the more effectual,

[As we get farther light of Christ, we are bound to farther use making of our light. And that as farther is revealed unto us of Christ, so must we set our minds on work to ponder and weigh what is revealed, that the matter may sink deeper in our mind and in our heart. Except we shall consider seriously what is spoken of Christ we can make no profitable use of the doctrine; for such high mysteries are not soon taken up, and the heart is not soon wrought upon, so as to receive impression of his excellency, except after due consideration.] Observe,

1. The honourable compellation used to those to whom he wrote. "Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling." 1st. Brethren, not only my brethren, but the brethren of Christ, and in him brethren to the saints; all the people of God are brethren, and should love and live like brethren. 2nd. Holy brethren, holy not only in profession and title, but in principle and practice, in heart and life. This has been turned by some into scorn,—"These, say they, are holy brethren; but it is dangerous jesting with such edge-tools: 'Be not mockers, lest your hands be made strong.'" Let those that are thus despised and scorned labour to be holy brethren indeed, and approve themselves so to God; and they need not be ashamed of the title, nor value the scoffs of the profane. The day is coming when those that make this a term of reproach would count it their greatest honour and happiness to be taken into this sacred brotherhood. 3rd. Partakers of the heavenly calling. Partakers of the means of grace, and of the Spirit of grace that came from heaven, and by which Christians are effectually called out of darkness into marvellous light; that calling that brings down heaven into the souls of men, and raises them up to a heavenly temper and conversation, and prepares them to live for ever with God in heaven.

2. The titles he gives to Christ, whom he would have them consider, 1st. As the apostle of our profession, the prime minister of the gospel church; a messenger, and a principal messenger of God to men, upon the most important errand, the great revealer of that faith which we profess to hold, and of that hope which we profess to have. 2nd. Not only the apostle, but the high priest too of our profession, the chief officer of the Old Testament as well as the New, the head of the church in every state, and under each dispensation, upon whose satisfaction and intercession we profess to depend for pardon of sin and acceptance with God. 3rd. As Christ the Messiah, anointed and every way qualified for the office both of apostle and high priest. 4th. As Jesus, our Saviour, our healer, the great physician of souls, typified by the brazen serpent that Moses lifted up in the wilderness, that those who were stung by the fiery serpents might look to him and be saved.

Secondly. We have the duty we owe to him who bears all these high and honourable titles, and that is to consider him as thus characterised. Consider what he is in himself, and what he is to us, and what he will be to us hereafter and for ever; consider him, fix your thoughts upon him with the greatest attention, and act towards him accordingly; look unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith. Here observe, 1. Many that profess faith in Christ have not a due consideration for him; he is not so much thought of as he deserves to be, and desires to be, by those that expect salvation from him. 2. Close and serious consideration of Christ would be of great advantage to us, to increase our acquaintance with, and to engage our love and our obedience to, him, and reliance on him. 3. Even those that are holy brethren, and partakers of the heavenly calling, have need to stir up one another to think more of Christ than they do, to have him more in their minds; the best of his people think too seldom and too slightly of him. 4. We must consider Christ as he is described to us in the Scriptures, and form our apprehensions of him from thence, not from any vain conceptions and fancies of our own.

Thirdly. We have several arguments drawn up to enforce this duty of considering Christ the Apostle and High Priest of our profession.

1. The first is taken from his fidelity, ver. 2. He was faithful to him that appointed him, as Moses was in all his house. 1st. Christ is an appointed lower than the angels, even Jesus, we behold, on account of his suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour."

ii. 14. "That through death;" or "through his death." "Him that had (rather "hath") the power of death;" not the power of putting to death, but the power of leading to sin, which gives death its sting (1 Cor. xv. 56.)

ii. 16. The verse does not refer to the incarnation. This idea is imported into the verse by the words supplied in italics in the English Version. The margin gives a more literal and truer rendering. Alford's translation is: "For as we know it is not angels that he helpeth, but it is the seed of Abraham that he helpeth." Verse 17 then follows naturally. As it is man that he is helping, so it is to man that it behoved him to be made like.

iii. 1. "Holy brethren, partakers of a (not the) heavenly calling;" they are partners in a calling which is heavenly, not earthly. "Consider;" the word may be paraphrased "consider attentively."

Mediator; God the Father hath sent and sealed him to that office, and therefore his mediation is acceptable to the Father. 2nd. He is faithful to that appointment, punctually observing all the rules and orders of his mediation, and fully executing the trust reposed in him by his Father and by his people. 3rd. That he is as faithful to him that hath appointed him as Moses was in all his house. Moses was faithful in the discharge of his office to the Jewish church in the Old Testament, and so is Christ under the New. This was a proper argument to urge upon the Jews who had so high an opinion of the faithfulness of Moses, and yet his faithfulness was but typical of Christ's.

2. Another argument is taken from the superior glory and excellence of Christ above Moses, ver. 3-6; therefore they were more obliged to consider Christ. 1st. Christ was a maker of the house, Moses but a member in it. By the house we are to understand the church of God, that is, the people of God incorporated together under Christ, their Maker and Head, and under subordinate officers, according to his law, observing his institutions. Christ is the maker of this house of the church in all ages. Moses was a minister in the house, he was instrumental under Christ in governing and edifying the house; but Christ is the maker of all things; for he is God, and no less than God could build the church, either lay the foundation or carry on the superstructure. No less power was requisite to make the church than to make the world. The world was made out of nothing, the church made out of materials altogether unfit for such a building. Christ, who is God, drew the platform of the church, provided the materials, and by almighty power disposed them to receive the reform. He has compacted and united this his house, and has settled the orders of it, and crowned all with his own presence, which is the true glory of this house of God. 2nd. Christ was the master of this house, as well as the maker, ver. 5, 6. This house is styled his house, as the Son of God. Moses was only a faithful servant for a testimony of those things that were to be spoken after Christ. As the eternal Son of God he is the rightful owner and sovereign ruler of the church; Moses was only a typical governor for a testimony of all those things relating to the church, which would be more clearly, completely, and comfortably revealed in the Gospel by the Spirit of Christ; and therefore Christ is worthy of more glory than Moses, and of greater regard and consideration. This argument the apostle concludes, First. With a comfortable accommodation of it to himself and all true believers; ver. 6, "Whose house are we." Each of us personally, as we are temples of the Holy Ghost, and Christ dwells in us by faith; all of us jointly, as we are united by the bonds of graces, truths, ordinances, gospel discipline, and devotions. Secondly. With a characteristic description of those persons that constitute this house; "If we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm to the end," that is, if we maintain a bold and open profession of the truths of the Gospel, upon which our hopes of grace and glory are built, and live upon and up to those hopes so as to have a holy rejoicing in them, which shall abide firm to the end, notwithstanding all that we may meet with in so doing.

[He expoundeth this house to be the company of true believers. Then, 1. The church of God under the law, and under the Gospel, are one church, one house of God in substance, and all the faithful, then and now, lively stones of this house. 2. The church have God dwelling, and conversing, and familiarly manifesting himself amongst them. He addeth a condition, whereby he neither importeth the possibility of final apostasy of the saints, nor yet mindeth he to weaken the confidence of believers, more than he doth of his own perseverance, or mindeth to weaken his own faith; for he joineth himself with them, saying, "If we hold fast." But, writing to the number of the visible church, of whom some, not being sound, might fall away, and by their example make some weak ones, though sound, stumble for a time, to the dishonour of the Gospel, he putteth a difference betwixt true believers, who do indeed persevere, and time-servers, who do not persevere, to whom he doth not grant, for the present, the privilege of being God's house.]

So that you see there must not only being a setting out well in the ways of Christ, but a steadfastness and perseverance therein unto the end. We have here a direction what those must do that would partake of the dignity and privileges of the household of Christ. 1st. They must take the truths of the Gospel into their heads and hearts. 2nd. They must build their hopes of happiness upon those truths. 3rd. They must make an open profession of these truths. 4th. They must live so up to them as to keep their evidences clear, and may rejoice in hope, and then they must in all persevere to the end. In a word, they must walk closely, comfortably, courageously and constantly in the faith and practice of the Gospel, that their Master when he comes may own and approve them.

7 Wherefore (as the Holy Ghost saith, To day if ye will hear his voice, 8 Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness: 9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years. 10 Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do alway err in their heart; and they have not known my ways. 11 So I swear in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest.) 12 Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God. 13 But exhort one another daily, while it is called To day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. 14 For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end; 15 While it is said, To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. 16 For some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses. 17 But with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? 18 And to whom swore he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? 19 So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief.

Here the apostle proceeds, pressing upon them serious counsels and cautions to the close of the chapter, and he recites a passage out of Ps. xcv. 7, &c. where observe.

First. What he counsels them to do; and that is, to give a speedy and present attention to the call of Christ. Hear his voice, assent to, approve of, and consider, what God in Christ speaks unto you, and apply it to yourselves with suitable affections and endeavours, and set about it this very day, for to-morrow it may be too late.

Secondly. What he cautions them against; namely, hardening their hearts, turning the deaf ear to the calls and counsels of Christ, when he tells you of the evil of sin, the excellency of holiness, the necessity of receiving him by faith as your Saviour; do not shut your ear and heart against such a voice as this.

Thirdly. Whose example he warns them by, even that of the Israelites their fathers in the wilderness, as in the provocation and day of temptation; this refers to that remarkable passage at Massah Meribah, Ex. xvii. 2-7. Observe,

1. Days of temptation are often days of provocation.

2. That to provoke God when he is trying us, and letting us see that we entirely depend and immediately live upon him, is a provocation with a witness.

3. That our hardening our hearts is the spring of all our other sins.

4. That the sin of others, especially our relations, should be a warning to us. Our fathers' sins and punishments should be remembered by us, to deter us from following their evil examples. Now as to the sin of the fathers of the Jews here reflected upon, observe, 1st. The state in which these fathers were when they thus sinned. They were in the wilderness, brought out of Egypt, but not got into Canaan, the thoughts whereof should have restrained them from sin. 2nd. The sin they were guilty of. They tempted and provoked God; they distrusted God, and murmured against Moses, and would not attend to the voice of God. 3rd. The aggravations of their sin. They sinned in the wilderness, where they had a more immediate dependence upon God; they sinned when God was trying them; they sinned when they saw his works,—works of wonder, wrought for their deliverance out of Egypt, and their support and supply in the wilderness from day to day. They continued thus to sin against God forty years. These were heinous aggravations. 4th. The source and spring of such aggravated sins; which were, First. They erred in their hearts; and these heart errors produced many other errors in their lips and lives. Secondly. They did not know God's ways, though he had walked before them. They did not know his ways; neither those ways of his providence in which he had walked towards them, nor those ways of his precept in which they ought to have walked towards God; they did not observe either his providences or his ordinances in a right manner. 5th. The just and great resentment God had at their sins, and yet the great patience he exercised towards them; ver. 10, "Wherefore I was grieved with that generation," &c. Note, First. All sin, especially sin committed by God's professing privileged people, does not only anger and affront God, but it grieves him. Secondly. God is loath to destroy his people in or for their sin; he waits long to be gracious to them. Thirdly. God keeps an exact account of the time that people go on in sinning against him, and in grieving him by their sins; but at length, if they by their sins continue to grieve the Spirit of God, their sins shall be made grievous to their own spirits, either in a way of judgment or mercy. 6th. The irreversible doom passed upon them at last for their sins. God swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest, either the rest of an earthly or heavenly Canaan. Observe, First. Sin, long continued in, will kindle the Divine wrath, and make it flame out against sinners. Secondly. That God's wrath will discover itself in its righteous resolution to destroy the impenitent. He will swear in his wrath, not rashly but righteously, and his wrath will make their condition a restless condition; there is no resting under the wrath of God.

Fourthly. What use the apostle makes of their awful example, ver. 12, 13, &c. He gives the Hebrews a proper caution, and enforces it with an affectionate compellation.

1. He gives the Hebrews a proper caution. The word is, "Take heed," Dénéte, look to it; look about you; be upon your guard against enemies both within and without; be circumspect. You see what kept many of your forefathers out of Canaan, and made their carcasses fall in the wilderness; take heed lest you fall into the same sin, and snare, and dreadful sentence. For you see Christ is Head of the church, a much greater person than Moses, and your contempt of him must be a greater sin than their contempt of Moses; and so you are in danger of falling under a severer sentence than they. Observe. The ruin of others should be warnings to us to take heed of the rock they split upon. Israel's fall should for ever be a warning to all that come after them; for "all these things happened to them for ensamples," 1 Cor. x. 11, and should be remembered by us. Take heed; all that would get safe to heaven must look about them.

2. He enforces the admonition with an affectionate compellation. "Brethren," not only in the flesh, but in the Lord; brethren whom I love, and for whose welfare I labour and long. And here he enlarges upon the matter of the admonition; "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God;" where observe, 1st. That a heart of unbelief is an evil heart. Unbelief is a great sin; it vitiates the heart of man. 2nd. That an evil heart of unbelief is at the bottom of all our sinful departures from God. It is a leading step to apostasy; if we once allow ourselves to distrust God, we may soon desert him. 3rd. That Christian brethren have need to be cautioned against apostasy; "Let them that think they stand take heed lest they fall."

3. He subjoins good counsel to the caution, and advises them to that which would be a remedy against this evil heart of unbelief; namely, that they should "exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day," ver. 13. Observe, 1st. We should be doing all the good we can to one another while we are together, which will be but a short and uncertain time. 2nd. Since to-morrow is none of ours, we must make the best improvement of this day. 3rd. If Christians do not exhort one another daily, they will be in danger of being hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. Note, 1st. There is a great deal of deceitfulness in sin. It appears fair, but is filthy; it appears pleasant, but is pernicious; it promises much, but performs nothing. 2nd. The deceitfulness of sin is of a hardening nature to the soul. One sin allowed prepares for another; every act of sin confirms the habit. Sinning against conscience is the way to sear the conscience; and therefore it should be the great concern of every one to exhort himself and others to beware of sin.

4. He comforts those that not only set out well, but hold on well, and hold out to the end; ver. 14, "We are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast to the end." Here observe, 1st. The

It denotes the turning of the mind to a subject for a practical end, not merely theoretically. "Apostle and High Priest of our profession;" Alford renders, "of our confession"—i.e., Christ is the Apostle and High Priest belonging to the faith which we confess. The term Apostle is appropriate, and would be understood by the Hebrew Christians, inasmuch as it was the word used of the delegates sent by the high priest to collect the Temple tribute from Jews residing in foreign countries. (Compare Matt. xxi. 37.)

iii. 2. Introduces the particular feature which we are to consider, viz., his faithfulness. Translate, "that he is faithful."

iii. 3, 4. For "builded," in these verses, Alford translates "established."

iii. 5. "As a servant;" this is not the word used by St. Paul (Rom. i. 1) of himself, and which signifies "a slave," but one which denotes one who "occupied a more confidential position; that a freer service, a higher dignity was his, than that merely of a slave, saints' privilege. They are made partakers of Christ, that is, of the spirit, nature, graces, righteousness, and life of Christ; they are interested in all that is Christ's, in all that he is, in all that has done or can do. 2nd. The condition on which they hold that privilege, and that is, their perseverance in the bold and open profession and practice of Christ and Christianity unto the end. Not but they shall persevere, being kept by the mighty power of God through faith to salvation, but to be pressed thus to it is one means by which Christ helps his people to persevere. This tends to make them watchful and diligent, and so keeps them from apostasy. Here observe, First. The same spirit with which Christians set out in the ways of God they should maintain and evidence to the end. They that begin seriously, and with lively affections, and holy resolutions, and humble reliance, should go on in the same spirit. But, Secondly. There are a great many, who, in the beginning of their profession, shew a great deal of courage and confidence, but do not hold it fast to the end. Thirdly. Perseverance in faith is the best evidence of the sincerity of our faith.

5. The apostle resumes what he had quoted before from Ps. xcv. 7, &c.; and he applies it close to those of that generation, ver. 15, 16, &c., while it is said, "To-day if ye will hear," &c. As if he should say, What was recited before from that Scripture belonged not only to former ages, but to you now, and to all that shall come after you; that you take heed you fall not into the same sins, lest you fall under the same condemnation. The apostle tells them that, though some who had heard the voice of God did provoke him, yet all did not so. Observe, 1st. Though the greatest part of hearers provoked God by unbelief, yet some there were that believed the report. 2nd. That though the hearing of the word be the ordinary means of salvation, yet, if it be not hearkened to, it will expose men more to the anger of God. 3rd. God will have a remnant that shall be obedient to his voice, and he will take care of such, and make mention of them with honour. 4th. That if these should fall into a common calamity, yet they shall partake of eternal salvation, while disobedient hearers perish for ever.

6. And, lastly, The apostle puts some queries upon what had been before mentioned, and gives proper answers to them; ver. 17—19, "But with whom was he grieved forty years? With them that sinned. And to whom did he swear?" &c. From whence observe, 1st. That God is only grieved with those of his people that sin against him, and continue in sin. 2nd. That God is grieved and provoked most by sins publicly committed, by the generality of a nation; when sin becomes epidemic it is most provoking. 3rd. That God grieves long and bears long when pressed with the weight of general and prevailing wickedness, yet he will at length ease himself of public offenders by public judgments. 4th. That unbelief, and rebellion, which is the consequent of it, is the great damning sin of the world, especially of those that have a revelation of the mind and will of God. This sin shuts up the heart of God, and shuts up the gate of heaven against them; it lays them under the wrath and curse of God, and leaves them there, so that, in truth and justice to himself, he is obliged to cast them off for ever.

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle having in the foregoing chapter set forth the sin and punishment of the ancient Jews, proceeds in this, I. To declare that our privileges by Christ under the Gospel exceed the privileges of the Jewish church under Moses, as a reason why we should make a right improvement of them, ver. 1—4. II. Assigns the cause why the ancient Hebrews did not profit by their religious privileges, ver. 2. Then, III. Confirms the privileges of those that believe, and the misery of those that continue in unbelief, ver. 3—10. Then, IV. Concludes with proper and powerful arguments and motives to faith and obedience, ver. 11—16.

LET us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. 2 For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. 3 For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. 4 For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works. 5 And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest. 6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that some must enter therein, and they to whom it was first preached entered not in because of unbelief: 7 Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, To day, after so long a time; as it is said, To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. 8 For if Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day. 9 There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. 10 For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.

Here, First. The apostle declares that our privileges by Christ under the Gospel are not only as great, but greater, than those enjoyed under the Mosaic law. And he instances this, that we have a promise left us of "entering into his rest," that is, of entering into a covenant relation to Christ, and a state of communion with God through Christ, and of growing up therein, till we are made perfect in glory. We have discoveries of this rest, and proposals, and the best directions how we may attain unto it. This promise of spiritual rest is a promise left us by the Lord Jesus Christ in his last will and testament; as a precious legacy. Our business is to see to it that we be the legatees; that we lay our claim to that rest and freedom from the dominion of sin, Satan, and the flesh, by which the souls of men are kept in servitude, and deprived of the true rest of the soul, and may be also set free from the yoke of the law, and all the toilsome ceremonies and services of it, and may enjoy peace with God, in his ordinances, providences, and in our own consciences, and so have the prospect and earnest of perfect and everlasting rest in heaven.

Secondly. He demonstrates the truth of his assertion that we have as great advantages as they; "For," says he, ver. 2, "unto us was the Gospel preached as well as unto them." The same Gospel for substance was preached under both Testaments, though not so clearly, not in so comfortable a manner under the Old as under the New. The best privileges the ancient Jews had were their gospel privileges, the sacrifices and ceremonies of the Old Testament were the Gospel of that dispensation, and whatever was excellent in it was respect it had to Christ. Now if this was their highest privilege, we are not inferior to them; for we have the Gospel as well as they, and in greater purity and perspicuity than they had.

Thirdly. He assigns the reason why so few of the ancient Jews profited by that dispensation of the Gospel which they enjoyed, and that was their want of faith; "The word preached did not profit them, because it was not mixed with faith in them that heard him," ver. 2. Observe, 1. The word is preached to us that we may profit by it, that we may gain spiritual riches by it; it is a price put into our hands to get wisdom, the rich endowment of the soul. 2. There have been in all ages a great many unprofitable hearers; many that seem to deal much in sermons, in hearing the word of God, but gain nothing to their souls thereby; and they that are not gainers by hearing are great losers. 3. That which is at the bottom of all our unprofitableness under the word is our unbelief. We do not mix faith with what we hear; it is faith in the hearer that is the life of the word. Though the preacher believes the Gospel, and endeavours to mix faith with his preaching, and to speak as one that has believed and so spoken, yet if the hearers have not faith in their souls to mix with the word, they will be never the better for it. This faith must mingle with every word, and be in act and exercise, while we are hearing; and when we have heard the word, assenting to the truth of it, approving of it, accepting the mercy offered, applying the word to ourselves, with suitable affections, then we shall find great profit and gain by the word preached.

Fourthly. On these considerations the apostle grounds his repeated and earnest caution and counsel, that they who enjoy the Gospel should maintain a holy fear and jealousy over themselves, lest latent unbelief should rob them of the benefit of the word, and of that spiritual rest that is discovered and tendered in the Gospel; ver. 1, "Let us fear lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it." Observe, 1. Grace and glory are attainable by all under the Gospel. There is an offer, and a promise to those that shall accept the offer. 2. Those that may attain them may also fall short. They that might have attained salvation by faith may fall short by unbelief. 3. That it is a dreadful thing so much as to seem to fall short of the gospel salvation; to seem so to themselves, to lose their comfortable hope, and to seem so to others, so losing the honour of their holy profession. But if it be so dreadful to seem to fall short of this rest, it is much more dreadful really to fall short; such a disappointment must be fatal. 4. One good means to prevent either our real falling short or seeming to fall short is to maintain a holy and religious fear, lest we should fall short. This will make us vigilant and diligent, sincere and serious; this fear will put us upon examining our faith, and exercising it; whereas presumption is the high road to ruin.

Fifthly. The apostle confirms the happiness of all those that truly believe the Gospel; and that he does,

1. By asserting so positively the truth of it, from the experience of himself and others; ver. 3, "We which have believed do enter into rest." We do enter into a blessed union with Christ, and into a communion with God through Christ, and in this state we do actually enjoy many sweet communications of pardon of sin, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and earnest of glory; resting from the servitude of sin, and reposing ourselves in God till we are prepared to rest with him in heaven.

2. He illustrates and confirms it, that they that believe are thus happy, and do enter into rest. 1st. From God's finishing his work of creation, and so entering into his rest, ver. 3, 4, appointing our first parents to rest the seventh day, to rest in God. Now, as God finished his work, and then rested from it, and acquiesced in it, so he will cause those that believe to finish their work, and then to enjoy their rest. 2nd. From God's continuing the observation of the sabbath after the fall and revelation of a Redeemer. They were to keep the seventh day a holy sabbath to the Lord, therein praising him who had raised them up out of nothing by creating power, and praying to him, that he create them anew by his Spirit of grace, and direct their faith to the promised Redeemer and Restorer of all things, by which faith they find rest in their souls.

3. From God's promising Canaan as a typical rest for the Jews that believed; and as those that did believe, namely, Caleb and Joshua, did actually enter into Canaan, so those that now believe shall enter into rest.

4. From the certainty of another rest besides that seventh day of rest instituted and observed both before and after the fall, and besides that typical Canaan rest which most of the Jews fell short of by unbelief; for the Psalmist hath spoken of another day, and another rest. From whence it is evident that there is a more spiritual and excellent sabbath remaining for the people of God than that into which Joshua led the Jews, ver. 6—8; and this rest remaining is, 1st. A rest of grace, and comfort, and holiness in the gospel state. This is the rest wherewith the Lord Jesus, our Joshua, causes weary souls and awakened consciences to rest, and this is the refreshing. 2nd. A rest in glory. The everlasting sabbatism of heaven, which is the repose and perfection of nature and grace, too, where the people of God shall enjoy the end of their faith, and the object of all their desires.

5. This is further proved from the glorious forerunners, who have actually taken possession of this rest, God and Christ. It is certain God, after the creating of the world in six days, entered into his rest; and it is certain that Christ, when he had finished the work of our redemption, entered into his rest; and these were not only examples but earnest, that believers shall enter into their rest; ver. 10, "He that hath entered into rest hath also ceased from his own works, as God did from his." Every true believer hath ceased from his own

"of his sin." But does not the warning rather refer to the sin of which their fathers had been guilty, viz., apostasy through unbelief? "Take heed lest among you any should fall after the same example." (Compare chap. iv. 11.) This harmonises with the remainder of the chapter.

iii. 16. Alford turns both clauses of this verse into a question: "For who were they that heard and provoked? Nay, was it not all that came out of Egypt by Moses?"

approaching more closely to that of a steward" (Trench, "New Testament Synonyms").

iii. 6. "The rejoicing of the hope;" rather, the matter or ground of our rejoicing, or of our glorying, boasting. It is the bold and resolute maintenance of the ground of our hope which is here urged.

iii. 12, 13. "In any of you," &c.: "lest there be among you any," &c. The warning is pointed to the Hebrew Christians. "Hardened through the deceitfulness of sin;" of what sin? Alford renders, works of sin, from relying on his own works of righteousness, and from the burdensome works of the law, as God and Christ have ceased from their works of creation and redemption.

Sixthly. The apostle confirms the misery of those that do not believe. They shall never enter into this spiritual rest, either of grace here or glory hereafter. This is as certain as the word and oath of God can make it; as sure as God is entered into his rest, so sure it is that obstinate unbelievers shall be excluded; as sure as the unbelieving Jews fell in the wilderness, and never reached the promised land, so sure it is that unbelievers shall fall into destruction, and never reach heaven; as sure as Joshua, the great captain of the Jews, could not give them possession of Canaan because of their unbelief, notwithstanding his eminent valour and conduct, so sure it is that even Jesus himself, the Captain of our salvation, notwithstanding all that fulness of grace and strength that dwells in him, will not, cannot, give to final unbelievers either spiritual or eternal rest; it only remains for the people of God, others by their sin abandon themselves to eternal restlessness.

11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief.

12 For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any twoedged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. 13 Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. 14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. 15 For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. 16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

In this latter part of the chapter the apostle concludes, first, with a serious, repeated exhortation, and then with proper and powerful motives.

First. Here we have a serious exhortation; ver. 11, "Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest." Observe, 1. The end proposed. Rest, spiritual and eternal; the rest of grace here, and glory hereafter; in Christ on earth, with Christ in heaven. 2. The way to this end prescribed, and that is labour, diligent labour. This is the only way to rest; they that will not work now shall not rest hereafter. After due and diligent labour sweet and satisfying rest shall follow, and labour now will make that rest more pleasant when it comes; "The sleep of the labouring man is sweet," Eccl. v. 12. Let us, therefore, labour, let us all agree, and be unanimous in this, and let us quicken one another, and call upon one another to this diligence. It is the truest act of friendship, when we see our fellow Christians loiter, to call upon them to mind their business, and labour at it in earnest. Come, sirs, let us all go to work; why do we sit still? why do we loiter? Come, let us labour, now is our working time, our rest remains. Thus should Christians call upon themselves, and one another, to be diligent in duty, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

Secondly. Here we have proper and powerful motives to make the advice effectual, which are drawn,

1. From the dreadful example of those that have already perished by unbelief; "lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief." To have seen so many fall before us will be a great aggravation of our sin, if we will not take warning by them: their ruin calls loudly upon us their lost and restless souls cry to us from their torments, that we do not, by sinning as they did, make ourselves miserable as they are.

2. From the great help and advantage we may have from the word of God to strengthen our faith and excite our diligence, that we may obtain this rest; ver. 12, "The word of God is quick and powerful," &c. By the word of God we may understand either the essential or the written word; the essential Word, that "in the beginning was with God, and was God," Jno. i. 1, the Lord Jesus Christ, and indeed what is said in this verse as concerning him; but most understand of the written word, the holy Scriptures, which are the word of God. Now of this word it is said,

1st. That it is quick. It is very lively and active in all its efforts in seizing the conscience of the sinner, in cutting him to the heart, and in comforting him and binding up the wounds of the soul. They know not the word of God that call it a dead letter, as the Papists and the Quakers do; it is quick, compared to the light—and nothing quicker than the light. It is not only quick, but quickening; it is a vital light; it is a living word, Gen. Saints die, and sinners die; but the word of God lives. "All flesh is grass, and all the glory thereof as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away, but the word of the Lord endureth for ever," 1 Pet. i. 24, 25. "Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live for ever? But my words, which I commanded the prophets, did they not take hold of your fathers?" Zec. i. 5, 6.

2nd. It is powerful. When God sets it home by his Spirit it convinces powerfully, converts powerfully, and comforts powerfully. It is so powerful as to pull down strongholds, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5; to raise the dead, to make the deaf to hear, and the blind to see, and the dumb to speak, and the lame to walk. It is powerful to batter down Satan's kingdom, and to set up the kingdom of Christ upon the ruins thereof.

3rd. It is "sharper than any two-edged sword." It cuts both ways; it is "the sword of the Spirit," Eph. vi. 17. It is the two-edged sword that cometh out of the mouth of Christ," Rev. i. 16. It is sharper than any two-edged sword, for it will enter where no other sword can, and make a more critical dissection; it pierceth to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, the soul and its habitual prevailing temper; it makes a soul that has been a long time of a proud spirit to be humble, of a perverse spirit to be meek and obedient. Those sinful habits that are become as it were natural to the soul, and radicately deeply in it, and become in a sort one with it, are separated and cut off by this sword. It cuts off ignorance from the understanding, rebellion from the will, enmity from the mind, which, when carnal, is enmity itself against God. This sword divides between "the joints and the marrow," the most secret, close, and intimate parts of the body; this sword can cut off the lusts of the flesh as well as the lusts of the mind, and make men willing to undergo the sharpest operation for the mortifying of sin.

4th. It is "a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart," even the most secret and remote thoughts and designs. It will discover to men the variety of their thoughts and purposes, the villeness of them, the bad principles they are actuated by, the sinister and sinful ends they act to. The word will turn the inside of a sinner out, and let him see all that is in his heart. Now such a word as this must needs be a great help to our faith and obedience.

3. From the perfections of the Lord Jesus Christ, both of his person and office.

1st. Person particularly. His omniscience; ver. 13, "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight, but," &c. This is agreeable to what Christ speaks of himself, Rev. ii. 23, "All the churches shall know that I am he that searcheth the reins and hearts." None of the creatures can be concealed from Christ, none of the creatures of God, for Christ is the creator of them all; none of the motions and workings of our heads and hearts, which may be called creatures of our own, but what are open and manifest to him with whom we have to do as the object of our worship, and the High Priest of our profession. He, by his omniscience, cuts up the sacrifice we bring to him, that it may be presented to the Father. Now, as the high priest inspected the sacrificed beasts, cut them up to the backbone, to see whether they were sound at heart, so all things are thus dissected, and lie open to the piercing eye of our great High Priest; and he that now tries our sacrifices will at length, as Judge, try our state; we shall have to do with him as one that will determine our everlasting state. Some read the words, to whom with us there is an account or reckoning. Christ hath an exact account of us all; he has accounted for all that believe on him, and he will account with all; our accounts are before him. This omniscience of Christ, and the account we owe of ourselves to him, should engage us to persevere in faith and obedience till he has perfected all our affairs.

2nd. We have an account of the excellency and perfection of Christ, as to his office, and this particular office of our High Priest. The apostle first instructs Christians in the knowledge of their High Priest, what kind of priest he is; and then puts them in mind of the duty they owe on this account.

First. What a kind of high priest Christ is; ver. 14, "Seeing we have such an High Priest;" that is, 1st. A great high priest, much greater than Aaron, or any of the priests of his order. The high priests under the law were accounted great and venerable persons; but they were but faint types and shadows of Christ. The greatness of our High Priest is set forth, (1.) By his being passed into the heavens. The high priest under the law once a year went out of the people's sight within the veil, into the holiest of all, where were the sacred signals of the presence of God; but Christ once for all is passed into the heavens, to take the government of all upon him, to send the Spirit to prepare a place for his people, and to make intercession for them. Christ executed one part of the priesthood on earth in dying for us; the other he executes in heaven by pleading the cause, and presenting the offerings, of his people. (2.) The greatness of Christ is set forth by his name Jesus, a Physician and a Saviour, and one of a Divine nature, the Son of God by eternal generation; and, therefore, having Divine perfection, able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him. 2nd. He is not only a great, but a gracious High Priest, merciful, compassionate, and sympathizing with his people; ver. 15, "We have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Though he is so great, and so far above us, yet he is very kind and tenderly concerned for us. He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities in such a manner as none else can be; for he was himself tried with all the afflictions and troubles that are incident to our nature in its fallen state, and this not only that he might be able to satisfy for us, but to sympathize with us. But then, 3rd. He is a sinless high priest. He was in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin. He was tempted by Satan, but he came off without sin. We seldom meet with temptations but they give us some shock. We are apt to give back, though we do not yield; but our great High Priest came off clear in his encounter with the devil; he could neither find any sin in him nor fix any stain upon him. He was tried severely by the Father. It pleased the Lord to bruise him; and yet he sinned not, either in thought, word, or deed. He had done no violence, neither was there any deceit in his mouth. He was holy, harmless, and undefiled; and such a high priest became us. Having thus told us what a one our High Priest is, the apostle proceeds to shew us,

Secondly. How we should demean ourselves towards him. "Let us hold fast our profession" of faith in him, ver. 14. Let us never deny him, never be ashamed of him before men. Let us hold fast the enlightening doctrines of

iv. 1. "Being left us;" or "being still left us." The promise of entering rest descends as a heritage, and still remains to the Israel of God (verses 3—9). "Should seem to come:" rather, "to have come short of it;" either should be found when the great trial of all shall take place to have come short (Alford), or "should seem"—i.e., lest there should be any appearance of having fallen short of the promise and the rest. Another view of the verse, favoured by Baugarten, Ebrard, &c., makes it a caution: "lest any should think that he has arrived too late, and so come short of the benefit of the promise." The former view seems more consonant with the apostle's argument.

iv. 2. "Not being mixed with faith:" by some this is understood to mean that the word preached was not mixed with or fraught with a power of faith—i.e., the word of the Old Testament possessed no power like that of the New to pierce the heart and work faith there. (Compare verse 12.) Against this is to be set the fact that Christianity in our heads, and the enlivening principles of it in our hearts, and the open profession of it in our lips, and our practical and universal subjection to it in our lives. Observe here, 1st. We ought to be possessed of the doctrines, principles, and practice of the Christian life. 2nd. When we are so we may be in danger of losing our hold, from the corruption of our hearts, the temptations of Satan, and the allurements of this evil world. 3rd. That the excellency of the High Priest of our profession would make our apostasy from him most heinous and inexcusable; it would be the greatest folly, and the basest ingratitude. 4th. Christians must not only set out well, but they must hold out; they that endure to the end shall be saved, and none but they.

3rd. We should encourage ourselves by the excellency of our High Priest to "come boldly to the throne of grace," ver. 16. Where observe, First. There is a throne of grace set up, a way of worship instituted, in which God may with honour meet poor sinners, and treat with them, and they may with hope draw nigh to him, repenting and believing. God might have set up a tribunal of strict and inexorable justice, dispensing death, the wages of sin, to all that are convicted before it; but he has chosen to set up a throne of grace. A throne speaks authority, and bespeaks awe and reverence; a throne of grace speaks great encouragement even to the chief of sinners: there grace reigns, and acts with sovereign freedom, power, and bounty. [The throne of grace, or the mercy-seat, was above the ark, within the sanctuary, and represented God in Christ reconciled to his people, gracious and merciful unto them. To this he alludeth, and by this means teacheth us that the substance of that typical mercy-seat is to be found in Christ under the Gospel. In him God is ever to be found on his throne of grace.] Secondly. It is our duty and interest to be often found before this throne of grace, waiting on the Lord in all the duties of his worship, secret, private, and public. It is good for us to be there. Thirdly. Our business and errand at the throne of grace should be, that we obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. Mercy and grace are the things we want; mercy to pardon all our sins, and grace to purify our souls. Fourthly. That besides the daily dependence we have upon God for present supplies, there are some seasons in which we shall most sensibly need the mercy and grace of God; and we should lay up prayers against such seasons, times of temptation, either by adversity or prosperity, and especially a dying time; we should every day put up a petition for mercy in our last day. The Lord grant unto us that we may find mercy of the Lord at that day, 2 Tim. i. 18. Fifthly. That in all our approaches to this throne of grace for mercy we should come with an humble freedom and boldness, with a liberty of spirit and a liberty of speech; we should ask in faith, nothing doubting; we should come with a spirit of adoption, as children, to a reconciled God and Father. We are indeed to come with reverence and godly fear, but not with terror and amazement; not as if we were dragged before the tribunal of justice, but kindly invited to the mercy-seat, where grace reigns, and loves to exert and exalt itself towards us. Sixthly. That the office of Christ, as being our High Priest, and such a high priest, should be the ground of our confidence in all our approaches to the throne of grace. Had we not a Mediator we could have no boldness in coming to God, for we are guilty and polluted creatures; all we do is polluted. We cannot go into the presence of God alone; we must either go in the hand of a Mediator or our hearts and our hopes will fail us. We have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus; he is our Advocate, and while he pleads for his people he pleads with the price in his hand, by which he has purchased all that our souls want or can desire.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter the apostle continues his discourse upon the priesthood of Christ, a sweet subject, which he would not too soon dismiss. And here, I. He explains the nature of the priestly office in general, ver. 1-3. II. The proper and regular call there must be to this office, ver. 4-6. III. The requisite qualifications for the work, ver. 7-9. IV. The peculiar order of the priesthood of Christ; it was not after the order of Aaron, but of Melchisedec, ver. 6-10. V. He reproves the Hebrews that they had not made those improvements in knowledge as might have made them capable of looking into the more abstruse and mysterious parts of Scripture, ver. 11-14.

OR every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins: 2 Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity. 3 And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins. 4 And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. 5 So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee. 6 As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. 7 Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared; 8 Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; 9 And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him;

SUPPLIANTS BEARING OLIVE BRANCHES.—ver. 7.

We have here an account of the nature of the priestly office in general, though with an accommodation to the Lord Jesus Christ, where we are told,

First. Of what kind of beings the high priest must be. He must be taken from among men; he must be a man, one of ourselves, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and spirit of our spirits, a partaker of our nature, and a standard-bearer among ten thousand. This implies, 1. That man had sinned. 2. That God would not admit sinful man to come to him immediately and alone without a high priest, who must be taken from among men. 3. That God was pleased to take one from among men by whom they might approach God in hope, and he might receive them with honour. 4. That every one shall now be welcome to God that comes to him by this high priest.

Secondly. For whom every high priest is ordained. "For men in things pertaining to God," that is, for the glory of God, and the good of men, that he might come between God and man. So Christ did; and therefore let us never attempt to go to God but through Christ, nor expect any favour from God but through Christ.

Thirdly. For what purpose was every high priest ordained. "That he might offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin."

1. "That he might offer gifts," or free-will offerings, brought to the high priest, so offered for the glory of God, and as an acknowledgment that our all is of him, and from him; we have nothing but what he is pleased to give us, and of his own we offer to him an oblation of acknowledgment. This intimates, 1st. That all we bring to God must be free, and not forced; it must be a gift, it must be given, and not taken away again. 2nd. That all we bring to God must go through the High Priest's hands, as the great agent between God and man.

2. "That he might offer sacrifices for sin;" that is, the offerings that were appointed to make atonement, that sin might be pardoned, and sinners accepted. Thus Christ is constituted a high priest for both these ends. Our good deeds must be presented by Christ to render ourselves and them acceptable; and our evil deeds must be expiated by the sacrifice of himself, that they may not condemn and destroy us. And now, as we value acceptance with God, and pardon, we must apply ourselves by faith to this our great High Priest.

Fourthly. How this High Priest must be qualified, ver. 2.

1. He must be one that can have compassion on two sorts of persons. 1st. "On the ignorant," or those that are guilty of sins of ignorance. He must be one that can find in his heart to pity them, and intercede with God for them; one that is willing to instruct them that are dull of understanding. 2nd. On those that are out of the way, out of the way of truth, duty, and happiness; and he must be one that has tenderness enough to lead them back from the by-paths of error, sin, and misery, into the right way. And this will require great patience and compassion, even the compassion of a God.

2. He must also be "compassed with infirmity," and so be able from himself, feelingly, to consider our frame, and to sympathize with us. Thus Christ was qualified; he took upon him our sinless infirmities; and this gives us great encouragement to apply ourselves to him under every affliction, for in all the afflictions of his people he is afflicted.

Fifthly. How the high priest was to be called of God; and he must have both an internal and an external call to his office; for "no man taketh the honour to himself," ver. 4; that is, no man ought to do it, no man can do it legally; if any does it, he must be reckoned an usurper, and treated accordingly. Here observe,

1. The office of the priesthood was a very great honour, to be employed to stand between God and man; one while representing God, and his will to men, at another time representing man and his case to God; and dealing between them about matters of the highest importance, intrusted on both sides with the honour of God, and the happiness of man, must render the office very honourable.

2. That the priesthood is an office and honour that no man ought to take to himself; if he does, he can expect no success in it, nor any reward for it, only from himself. He is an intruder who is not called of God, as was Aaron. Observe, 1st. God is the Fountain of all honour, especially true, spiritual honour. He is the Fountain of true authority, whether he calls any to the priesthood in an extraordinary way, as he did Aaron, or in an ordinary way, as he called his successors. 2nd. That those only can expect assistance from God, and acceptance with him, and his presence and blessing on them and their administrations, that are called of God; others may expect a blast instead of a blessing.

Sixthly. How this is brought home and applied to Christ; ver. 5, "So Christ the force of the warning (chap. iii. 17-19) turns not on the weakness of the promise, but the want of faith in those who heard it. The discussion of the weakness of the old covenant comes later (chap. viii. 7-9).

iv. 3. "Do enter;" or "are entering into rest." "Although the works," &c.: Ebrard understands the passage thus:—"Although the way of entering into rest by works was open from the foundation of the world—i.e. we are entering rest, but it is by faith; for though the way by works was open, God's word declared none should enter." "As I have sworn," &c.: but better is it to take it as declaring that the way of true rest was open from the beginning (the works finished surely refer to God resting on the seventh day), and that the only cause of failure was in man's unbelief. We are entering by the way of faith which existed from old time, and which Israel missed.

iv. 6, 7. These verses must be connected. Their drift seems to be, "Seeing that some must enter, for the promise of rest was not ex-glorified not himself. Observe here, though Christ reckoned it his glory to be made a High Priest, yet he would not assume that glory to himself. He could truly say, "I seek not mine own glory," Jno. viii. 50. Consider him as God; he was not capable of any additional glory, but as man and Mediator he did not run without being sent; and if he did not, surely others should be afraid to do it.

Seventhly. The apostle prefers Christ before Aaron, both in the manner of his call, and in the holiness of his person.

1. In the manner of his call, in which God said unto him, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," quoted from Ps. ii. 7, referring both to his eternal generation as God, his wonderful conception as man, and his perfect qualification as Mediator. Thus God solemnly declares his dear affection to Christ, his authoritative appointment of him to the office of a Mediator, his instalment and approbation of him in that office, his acceptance of him, and of all he had done or should do in the discharge of it. Now God never said thus to Aaron. Another expression that God used in the call of Christ we have in Ps. cx. 4, "Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec," ver. 6. God the Father appointed him a priest of a higher order than that of Aaron. The priesthood of Aaron was to be temporary, the priesthood of Christ was to be perpetual; the priesthood of Aaron was to be successive, descending from the fathers to the children; the priesthood of Christ, after the order of Melchisedec, was to be personal, and the High Priest immortal as to his office, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, as it is more largely described in the seventh chapter, and will be opened there.

2. Christ is here preferred to Aaron in the holiness of his person. Other priests were to offer up sacrifices, as for the sins of others, so for themselves, ver. 3. But Christ need not to offer for sins for himself, "for he had done no violence, neither was there any deceit in his mouth," Isa. liii. 9. And such a High Priest became us.

Eighthly. We have an account of Christ's discharge of this his office, and of the consequences of that discharge, ver. 7—9.

1. The discharge of his office of the priesthood; ver. 7, "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears," &c. Where observe, 1st. That he took to him flesh, and for some days he tabernacled therein; that is, he became a mortal man, and reckoned his life by days; herein setting us an example how we should reckon ours. Would we reckon our lives by days, it would be a means to quicken us to do the work every day in its day. 2nd. That Christ, in the days of his flesh, subjected himself to death; he was a hungered, tempted, bleeding, dying Jesus! His body is now in heaven, but it is a spiritual, glorious body. 3rd. God the Father was able to save him from death. He could have prevented his dying, but he would not; for then the great design of his wisdom and grace must have been defeated. What would have become of us if God had saved Christ from dying? The Jews reproachfully said, "Let him deliver him now, if he will have him," Mat. xxvii. 43. But it was in kindness to us that the Father would not suffer that bitter cup to pass away from him; for then we must have drunk the dregs of it, and been miserable for ever. 4th. Christ, in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications to his Father, as an earnest of his intercession in heaven. A great many instances we have of Christ's praying. This refers to his prayer in his agony, Jno. xvii. 39, and ch. xvii. 46, and to that before his agony, Jno. xvii., which he put up for his disciples, and all that should believe on his name. 5th. The prayers and supplications that Christ offered up were joined with strong cries and tears; herein setting us an example not only to pray, but to be fervent and importunate in prayer. How many dry prayers, how few wet ones, do we offer up to God! 6th. That Christ was heard in that he feared. How? Why, he was answered by present supports in and under his agonies, and in being carried well through death, and delivered from it by a glorious resurrection; he was "heard in that he feared." He had an awful sense of the wrath of God, of the weight of sin. His human nature was ready to sink under the heavy load, and would have sunk, had he been quite forsaken in point of help and comfort from God; but he was heard in this, he was supported under the agonies of death. He was carried through death, and there is no real deliverance from death but to be carried well through it. We may have many recoveries from sickness, but are never saved from death till we are carried well through it. And they that are thus saved from death shall be fully delivered at last by a glorious resurrection, of which the resurrection of Christ was the earnest and first-fruits.

2. The consequences of this discharge of his office, ver. 8, 9, &c. 1st. By his sufferings, he learned obedience, though he was a Son, ver. 8. Here observe, First. The privilege of Christ. He was a Son, the only begotten of the Father. One would have thought this might have exempted him from suffering, but it did not. Let none, then, who are the children of God by adoption, expect an absolute freedom from suffering; "What son is he whom the Father chasteneth not?" Secondly. Christ made improvement by his sufferings. He learned obedience; by his passive obedience he learned active obedience; that is, he practised that great lesson, and made it appear that he was well and perfectly learned in it. Though he never was disobedient, yet he never performed such an act of obedience as when he became obedient to death, even to the death of the cross. Here he hath left us an example that we should learn by all our afflictions a humble obedience to the will of God. We need affliction to teach us submission. 2nd. By these, his sufferings, he was made perfect, and became the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him, ver. 9. First. Christ, by his sufferings, was consecrated to his office, consecrated by his own blood. Secondly. By his suffering he consummated that part of his office which was to be performed on earth, making reconciliation for iniquity; and in this sense he is said to be made perfect, a perfect propitiation. Thirdly. Hereby he is become the Author of eternal salvation to men. He has, by his sufferings, purchased a full deliverance from sin and misery, and a full fruition of holiness and happiness for his people. Of this salvation he hath given notice in the Gospel; he has made a tender of it in the new covenant, and has sent the Spirit to enable men to accept this salvation. Fourthly. This salvation is actually bestowed on none but those that obey Christ. It is not sufficient that we have some doctrinal knowledge of Christ, or that we make a profession of faith in him, but we must hearken to his word, and obey him. He is exalted to be a Prince to rule us, as well as a Saviour to deliver us; and he will be a Saviour to none but to those to whom he is a Prince, and who are willing that he should reign over them; the rest he will account his enemies, and treat them accordingly. But to those that obey him, devoting themselves to him, denying themselves, and taking up their cross and following him, he will be the Author, aioros, the grand cause of their salvation, and they shall own him as such for ever.

10 Called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec. 11 Of whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing ye are dull of hearing. 12 For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. 13 For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. 14 But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

Here the apostle returns to what he had in ver. 6 cited out of Ps. cx., concerning the peculiar order of the priesthood of Christ, that is, "the order of Melchisedec." And here,

First. He declares he had many things which he could not say to them concerning this mysterious person called Melchisedec, whose priesthood was eternal; and therefore the salvation procured thereby should be eternal also. We have a more particular account of this Melchisedec in ch. vii. Some think the things which the apostle means, that were hard to be uttered, were not so much concerning Melchisedec himself as concerning Christ, of whom Melchisedec was the type. And doubtless this apostle had many things to say concerning Christ that were very mysterious, hard to be uttered; there are great mysteries in the person and offices of the Redeemer. Christianity is the great mystery of godliness.

Secondly. He assigns the reason why he did not say all those things concerning Christ, our Melchisedec, that he had to say, and what it was that made it so difficult for him to utter them, and that was the dullness of the Hebrews to whom he wrote; "Ye are dull of hearing." There is a difficulty in the things themselves, and there may be a weakness in the ministers of the Gospel to speak clearly about these things; but generally the fault is in the hearers. Dull hearers make the preaching of the Gospel a difficult thing; and even those that have some faith may be dull hearers, dull of understanding, and slow to believe: the understanding is weak, and does not apprehend these spiritual things; the memory is weak, and does not retain them.

Thirdly. He insists upon the faultiness of this infirmity of theirs. It was not a mere natural infirmity, but it was a sinful infirmity, and more in them than others, by reason of the singular advantages they had enjoyed for improving in the knowledge of Christ; ver. 12, "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." Where observe,

1. What proficiency might have been reasonably expected from these Hebrews; namely, that they might have been so well instructed in the doctrine of the Gospel as to have been teachers of others. Hence learn, 1st. That God takes notice of the time and helps we have for gaining Scripture knowledge. 2nd. That from those to whom much is given much is expected. 3rd. That those who have a good understanding in the Gospel should be teachers of others, if not in a public, yet in a private station. 4th. That none should take upon them to be teachers of others but those who have made a good improvement in spiritual knowledge themselves.

2. Observe the sad disappointment of those just expectations; "Ye have need that one should teach you again," &c. Here note, 1st. That in the oracles of God there are some first principles, plain to be understood, and necessary to be learned. 2nd. That there are also deep and sublime mysteries, which those should search into that have learned the first principles, that so they may stand complete in the whole will of God. 3rd. That some persons, instead of going forward in Christian knowledge, forget the very first principles that they had learned long ago; and, indeed, they that are not improving under the means of grace will be losing. 4th. It is a sin and shame for persons that are men for their age and standing in the church to be children and babes in understanding.

Fourthly. The apostle shews how the various doctrines of the Gospel must be dispensed to different persons. There are in the church babes and persons of full age, ver. 12—14; and there are in the Gospel milk and strong meat. Observe, 1. Those that are babes, unskilful in the word of righteousness, must be fed with milk; they must be entertained with the plainest truths, and these delivered in the plainest manner; "There must be line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little," Isa. xxviii. 10. Christ despiseth not his babes; he hath provided suitable food for them. It is good to be babes in Christ, but not always to continue in that childish state; we should endeavour to pass the infant state. We should always remain in malice children, but in understanding we should grow up to a manly maturity. 2. There is strong meat for those that are of full age, ver. 14. The deeper mysteries of religion belong to those that are of a higher class in the school of Christ, who have learned the first principles, and well improved them; so that by reason of use they have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil, duty and sin, truth and error. Observe, 1st. There have been always in the Christian state children, young men, and fathers. 2nd. Every true Christian, having received a principle of spiritual life from God, stands in need of nourishment to preserve that life. 3rd. That the word of God is food and nourishment to the life of grace; "As newborn babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." 4th. That it is the wisdom of ministers rightly to divide the word of truth, and to give to every one his portion; milk to babes, and strong meat to those of full age. 5th. That there are spiritual senses, as well as those that are natural. There is a spiritual eye, a spiritual appetite, a spiritual taste. The soul has its sensations as well as the body; these are much depraved and lost by sin, but they are recovered by grace. 6th. It is by use and exercise that these senses are improved, made more quick and strong to taste the sweetness of what is good and true, and the bitterness of what is false and evil. Not only reason and faith, but spiritual sense, will teach men to distinguish between what is pleasing and what is provoking to God, between what is helpful and what is hurtful to our own souls. [7th. To get a man's wits exercised requirerth frequent use of and acquaintance with the Scripture. And without this haunting our mind in the Scriptures, and observing the Lord's counsel therein, a man cannot be able, although he were versed in human writings, to discern false doctrine from true.]

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter the apostle proceeds to persuade the Hebrews to make a better proficiency in religion than they had done, as the best way to prevent apostasy, the dreadful nature and consequences of which sin he sets forth in a serious manner, ver. 1—8; and then expresses his good hopes concerning them, that they would persevere in faith and holiness, to which he exhorts them, and sets before them the great encouragement they have from God, both with respect to their duty and happiness, ver. 9—20.

haunted, though so many failed through unbelief, he again fixes (not 'again he limiteth') a certain day (to-day), saying in David, so long a time afterward, 'To-day, if ye hear,' &c.

iv. 12. "For the word of God is quick:" i.e., "living." Some have taken this "word of God" to refer to the Word (Logos) made flesh, others to the written word. The truth may well combine both, for as the word without the Word is a dead letter, so neither is the Word made known now but by the word.

v. 2. "Who can have compassion:" or deal tenderly with the ignorant and erring. "Infirmity:" "Here, as in chap. vii. 28, the word refers to that native moral weakness with which man is encompassed, not so much as by a garment as by light, or by the skin, so that he can in no condition of earthly life be conceived as separated from it."

v. 7. "Was heard in that he feared:" literally, "was heard from his fear." Some interpret, "Being graciously delivered from what AHEREFORE leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, 2 Of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. 3 And this will we do, if God permit. 4 For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, 5 And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, 6 If they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame. 7 For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God: 8 But that which beareth thorns and briers is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.

[He calleth the principles of religion the principles of the doctrine of Christ. Then, 1. The doctrine of Christ is the sum of religion. He that hath learned Christ well hath learned all. 2. Nothing to be taught in Christ's house but his doctrine, which cometh from him, and tendeth to him.]

First. We have here the apostle's advice to the Hebrews, that they would grow up from a state of childhood to the fullness of the stature of the new man in Christ, and he declares his readiness to assist them all he could in their spiritual progress; and for their greater encouragement he puts himself with them; "Let us go on." Here observe,

1. In order to their growth, Christians must leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ. How must they leave them? They must not lose them, they must not despise them, they must not forget them; they must lay them up in their hearts, and lay them as the foundation of all their profession and expectation. But they must not rest and stay in them; they must not be always laying the foundation, but they must go on and build upon it; there must be a superstructure, for the foundation is laid on purpose to support the building. Here it may be inquired, Why did the apostle resolve to set strong meat before the Hebrews, when he knew they were but babes? Answer, 1st. Though some of them were but weak, yet others of them had gained more strength, and they must be provided for suitably. And as those that are grown Christians must be willing to hear the plainest truths preached for the sake of the weak, so the weak must be willing to hear the more difficult and mysterious truths preached for the sake of those that are strong. 2nd. He hoped they would be growing in their spiritual strength and stature, and so be able to digest stronger meat.

2. The apostle mentions several foundation principles, which must be well laid at first, and then built upon; neither his time nor theirs must be spent in laying these foundations over and over again. These foundations are six:—

1st. Repentance from dead works; that is, conversion and regeneration, repentance from a spiritually dead state and course; as if he had said, Have a care of destroying the life of grace in your souls. Your minds were changed by conversion, and so were your lives; take care that you return not to sin again, for then you must have the foundation to lay again. There must be a second conversion, a repenting not only of but from dead works. Observe here, First. That the sins of persons unconverted are dead works; they proceed from persons spiritually dead, and they tend to death eternal. Secondly. That repentance for dead works, if it be right, is repentance from dead works; a universal change of heart and life. Thirdly. That repentance for and from dead works is a foundation principle, which must not be laid again, though we must renew our repentance daily.

2nd. Faith towards God; a firm belief of the existence of God, of his nature, attributes, and perfection, the trinity of persons in the unity of essence, the whole mind and will of God as revealed in his word, particularly what relates to the Lord Jesus Christ. We must by faith acquaint ourselves with these things, we must assent to them, we must approve of them, and apply all to ourselves with suitable affections and actions. Observe, First. That repentance from dead works, and faith towards God, are connected, and always go together; they are inseparable twins; the one cannot live without the other. Secondly. Both of these are foundation principles, which should be once well laid, and never pulled up, so as to need to be laid over again; we must not relapse into infidelity.

3rd. The doctrine of baptisms; that is, of being baptized by a minister of Christ with water, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, as the initiating sign or seal of the covenant of grace, strongly engaging the person so baptized to get acquainted with the new covenant, to adhere to it, and prepare to renew it at the table of the Lord, and sincerely to regulate himself according to it; and relying upon the truth and faithfulness of God for the blessings contained in it; and the doctrine of inward baptism, that of the Spirit sprinkling the blood of Christ upon the soul, for justification, and the graces of the Spirit for sanctification. This ordinance of baptism is a foundation to be rightly laid, and daily remembered, but not repeated.

4th. Laying on of hands, either on persons passing solemnly from their initiated state by baptism to the confirmed state, by returning the answer of a good conscience towards God, and sitting down at the Lord's table. This passing from incomplete to complete church membership was performed by the laying on of hands, which the extraordinary conveyance of the gift of the Holy Ghost continued. This once done, all are obliged to abide by, and not to need another solemn admission, as at first, but to go on and grow up in Christ. Or by this may be meant ordination of persons to the ministerial office, who are duly qualified for it, and inclined to it; and this by fasting and prayer, with laying on of the hands of the presbytery, and this is to be done but once.

5th. The resurrection of the dead, that is, of dead bodies, and their reunion with their souls, to be eternal companions together in weal or woe, according as their state was towards God when they died, and the course of life they led in this world.

6th. Eternal judgment, determining the soul of every one, when it leaves the body at death, and both soul and body at the last day, to their eternal state; every one to his proper society and employment to which they were entitled and fitted here on earth,—the wicked to everlasting punishment, the righteous to life eternal.

These are the great foundation principles which ministers should clearly and convincingly unfold and closely apply. In these the people should be well instructed and established, and from these they must never depart; without these, other parts of religion have no foundation to support them.

Secondly. The apostle declares his readiness and resolution to assist the Hebrews in building themselves up on these foundations till they arrive at perfection; ver. 3, "And this we will do, if God permit." And hereby he teaches them, 1. That right resolution is very necessary in order to progress and proficiency in religion. 2. That resolution is right which is not only made in the sincerity of our hearts, but in an humble dependence upon God, both for strength, for assistance and righteousness, for acceptance, and for time and opportunity. 3. That ministers should not only teach people what to do, but go before them and along with them in the way of duty.

Thirdly. He shews that this spiritual growth is the surest way to prevent that dreadful sin of apostasy here from the faith. And here,

1. He shews how far persons may go in religion, and after all fall away and perish for ever, ver. 4, 5. 1st. They may be enlightened. Some of the ancients understand this of their being baptized, but it is rather to be understood of notional knowledge and common illumination, of which persons may have a great deal, and yet come short of heaven. "Balaam was the man whose eyes were opened," Num. xxiv. 3; and yet with his eyes open he went down to utter darkness. 2nd. They may taste of the heavenly gift, feel something of the efficacy of the Holy Spirit in his operations upon their souls, causing them to taste something of religion, and yet be like persons in the market, that taste of what they will not come up to the price of, and so but take a taste and leave it. Persons may taste religion, and seem to like it, if they could have it upon easier terms than denying themselves, and taking up their cross and following Christ. 3rd. They may be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, that is, of his extraordinary and miraculous gifts; they may have cast out devils in the name of Christ, and done many other mighty works. Such gifts in the apostolic age were sometimes bestowed upon those that had no true saving grace. 4th. They may taste of the good word of God, they may have some relish of gospel doctrines, may hear the word with pleasure; they may remember much of it and talk well of it, and yet never be cast into the form and mould of it, nor have it dwell richly in them. 5th. They may have tasted of the powers of the world to come; they may have been under strong impressions concerning heaven and hell, some desires of heaven, and dread of going to hell. These lengths hypocrites may go, and after all turn apostates. Now hence observe, First. That those great things are spoken here of those that may fall away, yet it is not here said of them, that they were truly converted, or that they were justified. There is more in true saving grace than all that is here said of apostates. Secondly. This therefore is no proof of the final apostasy of true saints. These indeed may fall frequently and foully, but yet they shall not totally nor finally fall from God; the purpose and the power of God, the purchase and the prayer of Christ, the promise of the Gospel, the everlasting covenant that God has made with them, ordered in all things and sure, the indwelling of the Spirit, and the immortal seed of the word,—these are their security. But the tree that hath not these roots will not stand.

2. The apostle describes the dreadful case of such as fall away after they had gone so far in the profession of religion.

1st. The greatness of the sin of apostasy. It is crucifying the Son of God afresh, and putting him to open shame. They declare that they approve of what the Jews did in crucifying Christ, and that they would be glad to do the same thing again if it were in their power. They pour the greatest contempt upon the Son of God, and therefore upon God himself, who expects all should reverence his Son, and honour him as they honour the Father. They do what in them lies to represent Christ and Christianity as a shameful thing, and would have him to be a public shame and reproach. This is the nature of apostasy.

2nd. The great misery of apostates. First. It is impossible to renew them again unto repentance; it is extremely hazardous. Very few instances can be given of those that have gone so far and fallen away, and yet were brought to true repentance, such a repentance as is indeed a renovation of the soul. Some have thought this is sin against the Holy Ghost, but without ground. The sin here mentioned is plainly apostasy, both from the truth and ways of Christ. God can renew them to repentance, but he seldom does it; and with men themselves it is impossible. Secondly. Their misery is exemplified by a proper similitude, taken from the ground that after much cultivation brings forth nothing but briers and thorns, "and therefore is nigh unto cursing, and its end is to be burned" ver. 8. And, to give this the greater force, here is observed the difference that there is between the good ground and the bad, that these contraries, being set one over against the other, may illustrate each other. 1st. Here is a description of the good ground; it drinketh in the rain that cometh often upon it. Believers do not only taste of the word of God, but they drink it in; and this good ground bringeth forth fruit answerable to the cost laid out for the honour of Christ and the comfort of his faithful ministers, who are, under Christ, dressers of the ground; and this fruit-field or garden receives the blessing. God declares fruitful Christians blessed, and all wise and good men account them blessed. They are blessed with increase of grace, and with farther establishment and glory at last. 2nd. Here is the different case of the bad ground. "It beareth briers and thorns;" not only barren of good fruit, but fruitful in that which is bad, briers and thorns, fruitful in sin and wickedness, which is troublesome to all about them, and will be most so to sinners themselves at last; and then such ground is rejected. God will concern himself no more about such wicked apostates; he will let them alone, and cast them out of his care; he will command the clouds that they rain no more upon them. Divine influences shall be restrained; and that is not all, but such ground is "nigh unto cursing;" so far from receiving the blessing, that a dreadful curse hangs over it; though yet, through the patience of God, the curse is not fully executed. Lastly, its "end is to be burned." Apostasy will be punished with everlasting burnings, the fire that shall never be quenched. This is the he dreaded." Alford renders, "Being heard by reason of his reverent submission." The word rendered "fear," "submission," primarily meant the cautious handling of a precious or fragile vessel. It is used only twice in the New Testament, here and in chap. xii. 28.

v. 9. "Being made perfect:" or completed. "Brought to the end or goal of his learning and suffering through death" (Alford).

v. 11. "Ye are dull:" or, better, "ye have become dull of hearing."

v. 12. "Ye have need;" Alford renders, "Ye have need that some one teach you the rudiments," &c., not "which be the first," &c.

vi. 1. "Let us go on unto perfection;" this might refer to the intention of the writer to carry on his subject further, but it cannot be without application to the condition of the Hebrew Christians. "He (the writer) with his work of teaching, comes down to the level of learning, and regards that teaching and learning as all one work going on together, himself and them as bound up in one progress" and end to which apostasy leads, and therefore Christians should go on and grow in grace, lest, if they do not go forward, they should go backward, till they bring matters to this woful extremity of sin and misery. [They must not rest on illumination, or common gifts, how glorious soever, nor tastings and feelings, how sweet soever, but seek still into a more near communion with Christ, and still more to mortify our lusts, and still to abound in the fruits of love to Christ and his church.]

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak. 10 For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister. 11 And we desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end: 12 That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. 13 For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, 14 Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. 15 And so, after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise. 16 For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. 17 Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: 18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: 19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; 20 Whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

The apostle having applied himself to the fears of the Hebrews, for the exciting their diligence and preventing their apostasy, now proceeds to apply himself to their hopes, and candidly declares the good hope he had concerning them, that they would persevere, and proposes to them the great encouragements they had in the way of their duty.

First. He freely and openly declares the good hope he had concerning them, that they would endure to the end: ver. 9, "But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you." Observe, 1. There are things that accompany salvation, things that are never separated from salvation, things that shew the person to be in a state of salvation, and will issue in eternal salvation. 2. The things that accompany salvation are better things than ever any hypocrite or apostate enjoyed. They are better in their nature and in their issue. 3. That it is our duty to hope well of those in whom nothing appears to the contrary. 4. Ministers must sometimes speak by way of caution to those of whose salvation they have good hopes. And those that have in themselves good hopes as to their eternal salvation should yet consider seriously how fatal a disappointment it would be if they should fall short. Thus they are to work out their salvation with fear and trembling.

Secondly. He proposes arguments and encouragements to them to go on in the way of their duty. 1. That God had wrought a principle of holy love and charity in them which had discovered itself in suitable works which would not be forgotten of God; ver. 10, "God is not unrighteous to forget your labour of love," &c. Good works and labour proceeding from love to God are commendable, and what is done to any in the name of God shall not go unrewarded. What is done to the saints as such God takes as done to himself. 2. Those that expect a gracious reward for their labour of love must continue in it as long as they have ability and opportunity. "Ye have ministered to the saints, and ye do minister; and we desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence." 3. Those that persevere in a diligent discharge of their duty shall attain to the full assurance of hope in the end. Observe, 1st. Full assurance is a higher degree of hope, is full assurance of hope; they differ not in nature, but only in degree. 2nd. Full assurance is attainable by great diligence and perseverance to the end.

Thirdly. He proceeds to set before them caution and counsel how to attain this "full assurance of hope to the end." 1. That they should not be slothful—that will clothe a man with rags; they must not love their ease, nor lose their opportunities. 2. That they would follow the good examples of those that had gone before, ver. 12. Where learn, 1st. There are some who, from assurance, are gone to inherit the promises. They believed them before, now they inherit them; they are got safe to heaven. 2nd. The way by which they came to the inheritance was that of faith and patience. These graces were implanted in their souls, and drawn forth into act and exercise in their lives. And if we ever expect to inherit as they do, we must follow them in the way of faith and patience. And those that do thus follow them in the way shall overtake them at the end, and be partakers of the same blessedness.

Fourthly. The apostle closes the chapter with a clear and full account of the assured truth of the promises of God, ver. 13–20. They are all confirmed by the oath of God, and they are all founded in the eternal counsel of God, and therefore may be depended upon.

1. They are all confirmed by the oath of God. He has not only given his people his word, and his hand and seal, but his oath. And here you will observe, he instanteth the oath of God to Abraham, which being sworn to him as the father of the faithful, remains in full force and virtue to all true believers. "When God made a promise unto Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself." Observe, 1st. What was the promise? "Surely, blessing, I will bless thee, and multiplying, I will multiply thee." The blessing of God is the blessedness of his people; and those that he hath blessed indeed he will go on to bless, and will multiply blessings till he hath brought them to perfect blessedness. 2nd. What was the oath by which this promise was ratified? "He swore by himself." He staked down his own being and his own blessedness upon it; no greater security can be given or desired. 3rd. How was the oath accomplished? Abraham, in due time, obtained the promise. It was made good to him after he had "patiently endured." First. There is always an interval, and sometimes a long one, between the promise and the performance. Secondly. That interval is a trying time to believers, whether they have patience to endure to the end. Thirdly. Those that patiently endure shall assuredly obtain the blessedness promised, as sure as Abraham did. Fourthly. The end and design of an oath is to make the promise sure, and to encourage those to whom it is made to wait with patience till the time for performance comes, ver. 16. An oath with men is for confirmation, and is an end of all strife. This is the nature and design of an oath, in which men swear by the greater,—not by creatures, but by the Lord himself; and it is to put an end to all dispute about the matter, either to disputes within our own breasts, doubts and distrusts, or disputes with others, especially with the promiser. Now if God would condescend to take an oath to his people, he will surely remember the nature and design of it.

2. The promises of God are all founded in his eternal counsel, and this counsel of his is an immutable counsel. 1st. The promise of blessedness which God has made to believers is not a rash and hasty thing, but the result of God's eternal purpose. 2nd. That this purpose of God was agreed upon in counsel, and settled there between the eternal Father, Son, and Spirit. 3rd. These counsels of God can never be altered; they are immutable. God never needs to change his counsels, for nothing new can arise to him who sees the end from the beginning.

3. These promises of God, that are founded in the immutable counsel of God, and confirmed by the oath of God, may safely be depended upon; for here we have "two immutable things," the counsel and the oath of God, in which it is impossible for God to lie, contrary to his nature as well as to his will. Here observe,

1st. Who they are to whom God has given such full security of happiness. First. They are the heirs of the promise; such as have a title to the promises by inheritance, by virtue of their new birth and union with Christ. We are all by nature children of wrath. The curse is the inheritance we are born to; it is by a new and heavenly birth that any are born heirs to the promise. Secondly. They are such as have fled for refuge to the hope set before them. Under the law there were cities of refuge provided for those that were pursued by the avenger of blood. Here is a much better refuge prepared by the Gospel, a refuge for all sinners that shall have the heart to flee to it; yea, though they have been the chief of sinners.

2nd. What God's design towards them is in giving them such securities, that they might have strong consolation. Observe, First. God is concerned for the consolation of believers, as well as for their sanctification. He would have his children walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comforts of the Holy Ghost. Secondly. The consolations of God are strong enough to support his people under their strongest trials. The comforts of this world are too weak to bear up the soul under temptation, persecution, and death; but the consolations of the Lord are neither few nor small.

3rd. What use the people of God should make of their hope and comfort, that most refreshing and comfortable hope of eternal blessedness that God has given them. Why this, is, and must be unto them, for "an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast," &c., ver. 19. Here, First. We are in this world as a ship at sea, liable to be tossed up and down, and in danger of being cast away. Our souls are the vessels; the comforts, and expectations, and graces, and happiness of our souls are the precious cargo with which these vessels are laden; heaven is the harbour to which we sail; the temptations, persecutions, and afflictions that we encounter are the winds and waves that threaten our shipwreck. Secondly. We have need of an anchor to keep us sure and steady, or we are in continual danger. Thirdly. Gospel hope is our anchor. As in our day of battle it is our helmet, so in our stormy passage through this world it is our anchor. Fourthly. It is "sure and steadfast," or else it could not keep us so.

1st. It is sure in its own nature, for it is the special work of God in the soul; it is good hope through grace; it is not a flattering hope made out of the spider's web, but it is a true work of God,—it is a strong and substantial thing. 2nd. It is steadfast as to its object. It is an anchor that has taken good hold; it enters into that which is within the veil. It is an anchor that is cast upon the rock, the Rock of ages; it does not think to fasten in the sands, but enters within the veil, and fixes there upon Christ; he is the object, he is the anchor-hold, of the believer's hope. As an unseen glory within the veil is what the believer is hoping for, so an unseen Jesus within the veil is the great foundation of his hope; the free grace of God, the merits and mediation of Christ; and the powerful influences of his Spirit, are the grounds of his hope, and so it is a steadfast hope. Jesus Christ is the object and ground of the believer's hope in several respects. (1.) As he is entered within the veil to intercede with God in virtue of that sacrifice which he offered up without the veil, hope fastens upon his sacrifice and intercession. (2.) As he is the Forerunner of his people, gone within the veil to prepare a place for them, and to assure them that they shall follow him, he is the earnest and first-fruits of believers, both in his resurrection and ascension. (3.) As he abides there a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec, "a priest for ever," whose priesthood shall never cease, never fail, till it has accomplished its whole work and design, which is the full and vi. 1, 2. The Jewish character of the hearers must not be forgotten; the force of the passage depends much on this fact. There are three pairs of truths enumerated, and all of them are such that Jewish believers might have known something of from the Old Testament.

vi. 5, 6. "The powers of the world to come:" the miraculous powers of the expected age—i.e., of the Christian dispensation. "If they shall fall away:" or "and yet have fallen away"—i.e., "if with all these privileges they have fallen," &c. "To renew them again:" there is an accumulation of words denoting repetition: "again to make them new creatures." "Unto repentance:" "so as to effect again an entire change in the governing principle of the soul" (Webster and Wilkinson).

final happiness of all that have believed on Christ. Now this should engage us all to clear up our interest in Christ, that we may fix our hopes in him as our Forerunner, that is entered thither for us, for our sakes, for our safety, to watch over our highest interests and concerns. And then let us love heaven the more on his account, and long to be there with him, where we shall be for ever safe, and for ever satisfied.

CHAPTER VII.

The doctrine of the priestly office of Christ is so excellent in itself, and so essential a part of the Christian faith, that the apostle loves to dwell upon it. Nothing made the Jews so fond of their Levitical dispensation as the high esteem they had of their priesthood, and it was doubtless a sacred and most excellent institution. It was a very severe threatening denounced against the Jews, Hos. iii. 4, that the children of Israel should "abide many days without a prince or priest, and without a sacrifice, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." Now the apostle assures them that by receiving the Lord Jesus they would have a much better high priest, a priesthood of a higher order, and consequently a better dispensation or covenant, a better law and testament. This he shews in this chapter, where, I. We have a more particular account of Melchisedec, ver. 1—3. II. The excellency of the priesthood before that of Aaron, ver. 4—10. III. An accommodation of all to Christ, to shew the superior excellency of his person, office, and covenant, ver. 11—28.

OR this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; 2 To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; 3 Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually.

SALEM, APPROACH TO JERUSALEM.

The chapter foregoing ended with a repetition of what had been cited once and again before out of Ps. cx. 4, "Jesus, an High Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec." Now this chapter is as a sermon upon the text; here the apostle sets before them some of the strong meat he had spoken of before, hoping they would by greater diligence be better prepared to digest it.

First. The great question that first offers itself is, Who was this Melchisedec? All the account we have of him in the Old Testament is in Gen. xiv. 18, 19, &c., and in Ps. cx. 4. Indeed we are much in the dark about him; God has thought fit to leave us so, that this Melchisedec might be a more lively type of him whose generation none can declare. If men will not be satisfied with what is revealed, they must rove about in the dark in endless conjectures, some fancying him to have been an angel, others the Holy Ghost, but the opinions concerning him, that are best worthy our consideration, are these three:—

1. The Rabbins, and most of the Jewish writers, think he was Shem the son of Noah, who was king and priest to those they descended from, after the manner of the other patriarchs; but it is not probable he should thus change his name. Besides, we have no account of his settling in the land of Canaan.

2. Many Christian writers have thought him to be Jesus Christ himself, appearing by a special dispensation and privilege to Abraham in the flesh, and who was known to Abraham by the name Melchisedec, which agrees very well to Christ, and to what is said, Jno. viii. 56, "Abraham saw his day and rejoiced." Much may be said for this opinion, and what is said in ver. 3 does not seem to agree with any mere man; but then it seems strange to make Christ a type of himself.

3. The most received opinion is, that he was a Canaanite king, that reigned in Salem, and kept up religion and the worship of the true God; that he was raised to be a type of Christ, and was honoured by Abraham as such.

But we shall leave these conjectures, and labour to understand, as far as we can,

Secondly. What is here said of him by the apostle, and how Christ is represented thereby, ver. 1—3.

1. Melchisedec was a king, and so is the Lord Jesus,—a king of God's anointing. The government is laid upon his shoulders, and he rules over all for the good of his people.

2. That he was "King of righteousness;" his name signifies, the righteous King. Jesus Christ is a rightful and a righteous King, rightful in his title, righteous in his government. He is the Lord our righteousness, he has fulfilled all righteousness, and brought in an everlasting righteousness, and he loves righteousness and righteous persons, and hates iniquity.

3. He was "King of Salem," that is, "King of peace," "first King of righteousness, and after that also first King of peace." So is our Lord Jesus; he by his righteousness made peace; the fruit of righteousness is peace. Christ speaks peace, creates peace, he is our Peacemaker.

4. He was "priest of the most high God," qualified and anointed in an extraordinary manner to be his priest among the Gentiles. So is the Lord Jesus; he is the Priest of the most high God, and the Gentiles must come to God by him; it is only through his priesthood that we can obtain reconciliation and remission of sin.

5. "He was without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life," ver. 3. This must not be understood according to the letter, but the Scripture has chosen to set him forth as an extraordinary person, without giving us his genealogy, that he might be a fitter type of Christ, who as a man was without father, as God without mother; whose priesthood is without descent, did not descend to him from another, nor from him to another, but is personal and perpetual.

6. That he met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him. The story is recorded, Gen. xiv. 18; he brought forth bread and wine to refresh Abraham and his servants when they were weary; he gave as a king, and blessed as a priest. Thus our Lord Jesus meets his people in their spiritual conflicts, and refreshes them, and renews their strength, and blesses them.

7. That Abraham gave him "a tenth part of all," ver. 2; that is, as the apostle explains it, of all the spoils; and this Abraham did, either as an expression of his gratitude for what Melchisedec had done for him, or as a testimony of his homage and subjection to him as a king, or as an offering vowed and dedicated to God, to be presented by his priest. And thus are we obliged to make all possible returns of love and gratitude to the Lord Jesus for all the rich and royal favours we receive from him, and to pay our homage and subjection to him as our King, and to put all our offerings into his hands, to be presented by him to the Father, in the incense of his own sacrifice.

8. That this Melchisedec was "made like unto the Son of God, and abideth a priest continually." He bore the image of God in his piety and authority, and stands upon record as an immortal high priest,—the ancient type of him who is the eternal and only begotten of the Father, who abideth a priest for ever.

4 Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils. 5 And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham: 6 But he whose descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises. 7 And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better. 8 And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth. 9 And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham. 10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

Let us now consider, as the apostle advises, how great this Melchisedec was, and how far his priesthood was above that of the order of Aaron; ver. 4, 5, &c. "Now consider how great this man was," &c. The greatness of this man and his priesthood appear.

First. From Abraham's paying the tenth of the spoils unto him; and it is well observed that Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec in Abraham, ver. 10. Now Levi received the office of the priesthood from God, and was to take tithes of the people, yet even Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec, as to a greater and higher priest than himself; therefore that high priest who should afterwards appear, of whom Melchisedec was a type, must be much superior to any of the Levitical priests who paid tithes in Abraham to Melchisedec. And now by this argument, of persons doing things that are matters of right or injury in the loins of their predecessors, we have an illustration how we may be said to have sinned in Adam, and fallen with him in his first transgression. We were in Adam's loins when he sinned, and that guilt and pravity that was contracted by the human nature, when it was in our first parents, is equitably imputed and derived to the same nature as it is in all other persons naturally descended from them. It justly adheres to the nature, and it must be by an act of grace if ever it be taken away.

Secondly. From Melchisedec's blessing of Abraham, who "had the promises," ver. 6, 7. "And without contradiction the less is blessed of the greater." Where, 1. Observe Abraham's great dignity and felicity, that he had the promises. He was one in covenant with God, to whom God had given exceeding great and precious promises. That man is rich and happy indeed that hath an estate in bills and bonds, under God's own hand and seal. These promises are both of the life that now is and of that which is to come; this honour have all those who receive the Lord Jesus, in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen. 2. Melchisedec's greater honour, in that it was his place and privilege to bless Abraham; and it is an uncontested maxim, that the less is blessed of the greater, ver. 7. He that gives the blessing is greater than he that receives it, and therefore Christ, the antitype of Melchisedec, the meritor and mediator of all blessings to the children of men, must be greater than all the priests of the order of Aaron.

vi. 7. "For them by whom," &c.: rather as in the margin, "for whom it is dressed"—i.e., for them on whose account it is dressed.

vi. 8. "Rejected:" or proved to be worthless. The word implies that it has been tried and found worthless. Note the likeness of this allegory to the parable of the sower.

vi. 9. "Things that accompany salvation:" this answers to the expression "nigh unto cursing," in verse 8. The things bound to or linked with salvation.

vi. 12. "Not slothful:" "that ye become not slothful, but followers or imitators of them who inherit, or are inheriting, the promises."

vi. 16. "End of all strife:" or contradiction, or gainsaying,—i.e., so that those who take the oath cannot gainsay it. This suits the expression, "it was impossible for God to lie" (verse 18).

vi. 19, 20. "Veil:" i.e., the second veil, which shut in the holiest of all, "where, as forerunner for us (i.e., in our behalf) entered Jesus" (Alford).

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? 12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. 13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. 14 For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood. 15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life. 17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. 18 For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. 19 For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God. 20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest: 21 (For those priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath by him that said unto him, The Lord sware and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec:) 22 By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament. 23 And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: 24 But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. 25 Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. 26 For such an high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; 27 Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself. 28 For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated for evermore.

Observe the necessity there was of raising up another "priest after the order of Melchisedec," and not "after the order of Aaron," by whom that perfection should come that could not come by the Levitical priesthood, which therefore must be changed, and the whole economy with it, ver. 11, 12, &c. Here,

First. It is asserted, that perfection could not come by the Levitical priesthood and the law; they could not put those that came to them into the perfect enjoyment of the good things they pointed out unto them; they could only direct them to look farther,—they could only shew them the way.

Secondly. That therefore another priest must therefore be raised up after the order of Melchisedec, by whom, and his law of faith, perfection might come to all that obey him. And, blessed be God, that we may have perfect holiness and perfect happiness by Christ in the covenant of grace, according to the Gospel, for we are complete in him.

Thirdly. It is asserted that, the priesthood being changed, there must of necessity be a change of the law, there being so near a relation between the priesthood and the law. The dispensation could not be the same under another priesthood; a new priesthood must be under a new regulation, managed in another way, and by rules proper to its nature and order.

Fourthly. It is not only asserted, but proved, that the priesthood and law are changed, ver. 13, 14. That priesthood and law, by which perfection could not come, are abolished, and a Priest is risen, and a dispensation now set up, by which true believers may be made perfect. Now that there is such a change is obvious.

1. In the tribe of which the priesthood comes. Before, it was the tribe of Levi; but our great High Priest sprang out of Judah, of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning the priesthood, ver. 14. This change of the family shews a real change of the law of priesthood.

2. In the form and order of making the priests. Before, in the Levitical priesthood, they were made after the law of a carnal commandment; but our present High Priest was made after the power of an endless life. The former law appointed that the office should descend, upon the death of the father, unto his eldest son, according to the order of carnal or natural generation; for none of the high priests under that law were without father or mother, or without descent; they had not life and immortality in themselves. They had both beginning of days and end of life, and so the carnal commandment or law of primogeniture directed their succession, as it did in matters of civil right and inheritance. But the law by which Christ was constituted a priest after the order of Melchisedec was the power of an endless life. That life and immortality which he had in himself was his right and title to the priesthood, not his descent from former priests. This makes a great difference in the priesthood, and in the economy too, and gives the preference vastly to Christ and the Gospel. The very law which constituted the Levitical priesthood supposed the priests to be weak, frail, dying creatures, not able to preserve their own natural lives, but must be content and glad to survive in their posterity after the flesh; much less could they by any power or authority they had convey spiritual life and blessedness to those that came to them. But the High Priest of our profession holds his office by that innate power of endless life which he has in himself, not only to preserve himself alive, but to communicate spiritual and eternal life to all those that duly rely upon his sacrifice and intercession. Some think "the law of the carnal commandment" refers unto the external rites of consecration, and the carnal offerings that were made; but "the power of an endless life" to the spiritual living sacrifices proper to the Gospel, and the spiritual and eternal privileges purchased by Christ, who was consecrated by the eternal Spirit of life that he received without measure.

3. There is a change in the efficacy of the priesthood. The former was weak and unprofitable, made nothing perfect; the latter brought in "a better hope, by which we draw near to God," ver. 18, 19. The Levitical priesthood brought nothing to perfection; it could not justify men's persons from guilt; it could not sanctify them from inward pollution; it could not cleanse the consciences of the worshippers from dead works; all it could do was to lead them to the antitype. But the priesthood of Christ carries in it, and brings along with it, a better hope; it shews us the true foundation of all that hope we have towards God for pardon and salvation; and it more clearly discovers the great objects of our hope, and so it tends to work in us a more strong and lively hope of acceptance with God. And by this hope we are encouraged to draw nigh unto God, to enter into a covenant union with him, to live a life of converse and communion with him. We may now draw near with a true heart, and with the full assurance of faith, having our minds sprinkled from an evil conscience. The former priesthood rather kept men at a distance, and under a spirit of bondage.

4. There is a change in God's way of acting in this priesthood. He has taken an oath to Christ, which he never did to any of the order of Aaron. God never gave them any such assurance of their continuance, never engaged himself by oath or promise, that theirs should be an everlasting priesthood; and therefore gave them no reason to expect the perpetuity of it, but rather to look upon it as a temporary law. But Christ was made a priest with the oath of God; "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec," ver. 21. Here God has upon oath declared the immutability, excellency, efficacy, and eternity of the priesthood of Christ.

5. There is a change in that covenant, of which the priesthood was a security, and the priest a surety; that is, a change in the dispensation of that covenant. The gospel dispensation is more full, free, more perspicuous, more spiritual, and more efficacious, than that of the law. Christ is in this gospel covenant a surety for us to God, and for God to us, to see that the articles be performed on both parts. He as surely has tied the Divine and human nature together in his own person, and therein given assurance of reconciliation; and he has as surely tied God and man together in the bond of the everlasting covenant. He pleads with men to keep their covenant with God, and he pleads with God that he will fulfil his promises to men, which he is always ready to do in a way suitable to his majesty and glory, that is, through a Mediator.

6. There is a remarkable change in the number of the priests under these different orders. In that of Aaron, there was a multitude of priests, of high priests, not at once, but successively; but in this of Christ there is but one and the same. The reason is plain, the Levitical priests were many, because "they were not suffered to continue by reason of death." Their office, how high and honourable soever, could not secure them from dying; and as one died another must succeed, and after awhile must give place to a third, till the number was become very great. But this our High Priest continues for ever, and his priesthood is ἀκατάβατον, "an unchangeable one," that does not pass from one to another, as the former did; it is always in the same hand. There can be no vacancy in this priesthood, no hour or moment in which the people are without a priest to negotiate their spiritual concerns in heaven. Such a vacancy might be very dangerous and prejudicial to them; but this is their safety and happiness, that this ever-living High Priest is able to save to the utmost, in all times, in all cases, in every juncture, all "that come to God by him," ver. 25. So that here is a manifest alteration much for the better.

7. There is a remarkable difference in the moral qualifications of the priests. Those that were of the order of Aaron were not only mortal men, but sinful men, that had their sinful as well as natural infirmities; they needed to offer up sacrifices first for their own sins, and then for the people. But our High Priest, who was consecrated by the word of the oath, needed only to offer up once for the people, never at all for himself; for he has not only an immutable consecration to his office, but an immutable sanctity in his person. He is "such an High Priest as became us, holy, harmless, and undefiled," &c., ver. 26—28. Here observe,

1st. Our case as sinners needed a high priest to make satisfaction and intercession for us.

2nd. No priest could be suitable, or sufficient for our reconciliation to God, but one that was perfectly righteous in his own person; he must be righteous in himself, or he could not be a propitiation for our sin, or our advocate with the Father.

3rd. That the Lord Jesus was exactly such a high priest as we wanted; for he has a personal holiness, absolutely perfect. And observe the description we have of the personal holiness of Christ expressed in various terms, and some learned divines think they all of them relate to his perfect purity.

First. He is "holy;" that is, perfectly free from all the habits or principles of sin, not the least disposition to it in his nature; no sin dwells in him, though it does in the best of Christians, not the least sinful inclination.

Secondly. He is "harmless;" that is, perfectly free from all actual transgression, has done no violence, nor is there any deceit in his mouth, never did the least wrong to God or man.

Thirdly. He is "undefiled;" that is, was never accessory to other men's sins.

vii. 11—16. "Perfection . . . under it the people," &c. The whole of this passage is difficult to analyse. The opinion of De Wette, Bleek, and Delitzsch is, that it is to be considered as paving the way for what follows, and laying down the ground why, not without urgent cause, the priesthood is changed (De Wette, quoted in Lange). The word "another" ("another priest," verses 11, 15) points to a difference in kind. It is by some rendered in both verses "a different priest." For some remarks on the word, see Notes on Gal. i. 6, 7.

vii. 25. "Save them to the uttermost:" completely, unto perfection, to the consummation. The reference is not so much to time, as stating that Christ can always save, but to the completeness of that salvation which he gives to those who come unto God by him. "The perpetuity of his priesthood enables him to 'carry through' the salvation which he has commenced" (Kendrick, in Lange). (Compare Psa. cxxxviii. 8; 2 Tim. i. 12; Heb. xii. 2.)

viii. 1. "This is the sum:" the word does not refer to any summary

The best of Christians have need to pray that God would forgive them their other men's sins. It is a difficult thing to keep ourselves pure, so as not to partake in the guilt of other men's sins, by contributing some way towards them, or not doing what we ought to prevent them. Christ was undefiled; though he took upon him the guilt of our sins, yet he never involved himself in the fact and fault of them.

Fourthly. He is "separate from sinners," not only in his present state, having entered as our High Priest into the holiest of all, into which nothing defiled can enter; but in his personal purity he has no such union with sinners, either natural or federal, as can devolve upon him original sin. This comes upon us by virtue of our natural and federal union with the first Adam, we descending from him in the ordinary way. But Christ was, by his ineffable conception in the Virgin, separate from sinners; though he took a true human nature, yet the miraculous way in which he was conceived set him upon a separate footing from all the rest of mankind.

Fifthly. He is "made higher than the heavens." Most expositors understand this concerning his state of exaltation in heaven, at the right hand of God, to perfect the design of his priesthood. But Dr. Goodwin thinks this may be very justly referred to the personal holiness of Christ, that is greater and more perfect than the holiness of the hosts of heaven; that is, the holy angels themselves, who, though they are free from sin, yet are not in themselves free from all possibility of sinning. And therefore we read, "God putteth no trust in his holy ones, and he chasteth his angels with folly," Job iv. 18; that is, with weakness, peccability. They may be angels one hour, and devils another, as many of them were; and that the holy angels shall not now fall does not proceed from a defectibility of nature, but from the election of God; they are elect angels. It is very likely this explanation of the words, "made higher than the heavens," may be thought too much strained, and that it ought to be understood of the dignity of Christ's state, and not the perfect holiness of his person, and the rather because it is said he was "made higher," γενόμενος; but it is well known that word is used in a neutral sense, as where it is said, γενέσθαι ὁ Θεὸς ἄληθης, "Let God be true." [A priest meet for us behaved to have his residence in heaven, and have commandment over heaven to open it unto us, and give us entry. Then, none other but Christ could suffice us, on whom by nature the doors of heaven are closed. No priest out of heaven is meet for us.]

The other characters in the verse plainly belong to the personal perfection of Christ in holiness, as opposed to the sinful infirmities of the Levitical priests; and it seems congruous to think this must do so too, if it may be fairly taken in such a sense; and it appears yet more probable, since the validity and prevalence of Christ's priesthood, in ver. 27, is placed in the impartiality and disinterestedness of it. He needed not to offer up for himself; it was a disinterested mediation; he mediated for that mercy for others which he did not need for himself. Had he needed it himself he had been a party, and could not have been a Mediator—a criminal, and could not have been an advocate for sinners. Now, to render his mediation the more impartial and disinterested, it seems requisite not only that he had no present need of that favour for himself which he mediated for in behalf of others, but that he never could stand in need of it. Though he needed it not to-day, yet if he knew he might be in those circumstances as to need it to-morrow, or in any future time, he must have been thought to have had some eye upon his own interest, and therefore could not act with that impartial regard and pure zeal for the honour of God on one hand, and that tender, pure compassion for poor sinners on the other. I pretend not here to follow the notes of our late excellent expositor, into whose labours we have entered, but have taken the liberty to vindicate this notion of the learned Dr. Goodwin from the exceptions that I know have been made to it; and I have the rather done it because, if it will hold good, it gives us farther evidence how necessary it was that the Mediator should be God, since no mere creature is of himself possessed of that impeccability which will set him above all possible need of favour and mercy for himself.

[Observe, 1. That the Scripture knoweth no priest but the Levitical priests of Aaron's posterity for the time of the law; or else that one priest which was made by an oath for the time of the Gospel. 2. That to have priests now after the similitude of the priests under the law were to remove the difference which God hath made betwixt the law and the Gospel. 3. That to make a priest in the Gospel, who is not consecrated by an oath to abide for evermore in the office, but may be changed, and another come in his place, is contrary to the institution of the evangelical priesthood. 4. That to make plurality of priests in the Gospel is to alter the order of Melchisedec, sworn with an oath, and to renounce the mark set betwixt the law and the Gospel. 5. That to make a man priest now is to mar the Son of God's privilege, to whom the privilege only belongeth. 6. That to make a sinful and weak man a priest now is to weaken the priesthood of the Gospel, and make it like the law. 7. That as long as Christ's consecration lasteth none must meddle with his office. 8. That law instituting priests was not God's last will, but might suffer addition; but the evangelical oath is since the law, and God's last and unchangeable will. Therefore to add unto it, and bring in as many priests now as did serve in the temple of old, is to provoke God to add as many plagues as are written in God's book upon themselves and their priests also.]

CHAPTER VIII.

In this chapter the apostle pursues his former subject, the priesthood of Christ. And, I. He sums up what he had already said, ver. 1, 2. II. He sets before them the necessary parts of the priestly office, ver. 3—5. And, III. Largely illustrates the excellency of the priesthood of Christ, by considering the excellency of that new dispensation or covenant of which Christ is the Mediator, ver. 6—13.

OW of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; 2 A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.

Here is a summary recital of what had been said before concerning the excellency of Christ's priesthood, shewing both what we have in Christ, where he now resides, and what sanctuary he is the minister of.

or recital of the past argument, but to the fixing of the attention upon one salient point, so that the rendering might better be, "Now of the things which are being spoken, this is a chief or principal point."

viii. 2. "True tabernacle:" there are two Greek words rendered by the English word "true." "Of the one (ἀληθής) we may affirm that he fulfils the promise of his lips, but the other (ἀληθινός) the wider promise of his name. Whatever that name imports—taken in its

First. What we have in Christ. We have a High Priest, and such a high priest as no other people ever had, no age of the world, or of the church, ever produced; all others were but types and shadows of this high priest. He is adequately fitted and absolutely sufficient to all the intents and purposes of a high priest, both with respect to the honour of God and the happiness of men and himself; the great honour of all those that have an interest in him.

Secondly. Where he now resides; "He is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty" on high; that is, of the glorious God of heaven. There the Mediator is placed, and he is possessed of all authority and power both in heaven and upon earth; this is the reward of his humiliation; this authority he exerciseth for the glory of his Father, for his own honour, and for the happiness of all that belong to him; and he will by his almighty power bring every one of them in their own order to the right hand of God in heaven, as members of his mystical body, that where he is they may be also.

Thirdly. What is that sanctuary of which he is a minister. "Of the true tabernacle, which the Lord hath pitched, and not man," ver. 2. The tabernacle which was pitched by man, according to the appointment of God. There was an outer part, in which was the altar where they were to offer their sacrifices, and this typified Christ dying; and there was an interior part within the veil, which typified Christ interceding for the people in heaven. Now this tabernacle Christ never entered into; but, having finished the work of satisfaction in "the true tabernacle" of his own body, he is now a minister of the sanctuary, the holy of holies, the true tabernacle of heaven, there taking care of his people's affairs, interceding with God for them, that their sins may be pardoned, and their persons and services accepted through the merit of his sacrifice. He is not only in heaven enjoying great dominion and dignity, but, as the High Priest of his church, executing this office for them all in general, and every member of the church in particular.

3 For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer. 4 For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: 5 Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount.

Here the apostle sets before the Hebrews the necessary parts of Christ's priesthood, or what it was that belonged to that office, in conformity to what every high priest is ordained to.

First. "Every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices;" whatever was brought by the people to be presented to God, whether expiatory sacrifices, or peace offerings, or thank offerings. These must be offered by the priest, who was to expiate their guilt by the blood of the sacrifice, and perfume their gifts and services by his holy incense, to render their persons and performances typically acceptable; so then it necessarily belongs to the priesthood of Christ that he should have somewhat to offer; and he as the antitype had himself to offer, his human nature upon the altar of his Divine nature, as the great atoning sacrifice that finished transgression, and made an end of sin once for all; and he hath the incense of his own righteousness and merits too to offer with all that his people offer up to God by him, to render them acceptable. We must not dare to approach to God, or to present anything to him, but in and through Christ, depending upon his merits and mediation; for if we are accepted it is in the Beloved.

Secondly. Christ must now execute his priesthood in heaven, in the holy of holies, "the true tabernacle" which the Lord hath fixed. Thus the type must be fully answered; having finished the work of sacrificing here, he must go into heaven to present his righteousness, and to make intercession there. For, 1. "If Christ were on earth, he should not be a priest," ver. 4; that is, not according to the Levitical law, as not being of the line of that priesthood; and so long as that priesthood continued there must be a strict regard had to the Divine institution in every thing. 2. All the services of the priest, under the law, and every thing in that tabernacle which was framed according to the pattern in the mount, were only samples and "shadows of heavenly things," ver. 5. Christ is the substance and end of the law for righteousness. Something therefore there must be in Christ's priesthood that answers to the high priest's entering within the veil to make intercession, without which he could not have been a perfect priest; and what is that but the ascension of Christ into heaven, and his appearance there in the sight of God for his people, to present their prayers, and plead their cause? So that if he had still continued on earth he could not have been a perfect priest, and an imperfect one he could not be.

6 But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises. 7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. 8 For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: 9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the highest, deepest, widest sense—whatever according to that he ought to be, that he is to the full" (Trench). The latter is the word used here and in John xv. 1 (see Notes there). "The former excludes the untrue and unreal, the latter excludes that which does not correspond to its idea. The measure of the one is the actual, the measure of the other is the ideal" (Kahnis, in Lange). These explanations find their illustration in the language of verse 5. The true (ideal) is the heavenly real, of which but a copy or pattern is given to man.

Lord. 10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: 11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. 12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. 13 In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

In this part of the chapter the apostle illustrates and confirms the superior excellency of the priesthood of Christ above that of Aaron, from the excellency of that covenant, or that dispensation of the covenant of grace, of which Christ was the Mediator, ver. 6; his ministry is more excellent, by how much he is the Mediator of a better covenant. The body and soul too of all divinity (as some observe) consist very much in rightly distinguishing between the two covenants, the covenant of works and the covenant of grace, and between the two dispensations of the covenant of grace, that under the Old Testament and that under the New. Now observe,

First. What is here said of the old covenant, or rather of the old dispensation of the covenant of grace. Of this it is said,

1. That it was made with the fathers of the Jewish nation at mount Sinai, ver. 9; and Moses was the mediator of that covenant, when God took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, which speaks the great affection, condescension, and tender care of God towards them.

2. That this covenant was not found faultless, ver. 7, 8. It was a dispensation of darkness and dread, tending to bondage, and only a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; it was perfect in its kind, and fitted to answer its end, but very imperfect in comparison of the Gospel.

3. That it was not sure or steadfast, for the Jews continued not in that covenant, and the Lord regarded them not, ver. 9. They dealt ungratefully with their God, and cruelly with themselves, and fell under God's displeasure. God will regard those that remain in his covenant, but will reject those that cast away his yoke from them.

4. That it is decayed, grown old, and vanisheth away, ver. 13. It is antiquated, cancelled, out of date, of no more use in gospel times than candles are when the sun is risen. Some think the covenant of peculiarity did not quite decay until the destruction of Jerusalem, though it was forfeited at the death of Christ, and was made old, and was now to vanish and perish, and the Levitical priesthood vanished with it.

Secondly. What is here said of the New Testament dispensation to prove the superior excellency of Christ's ministry. It is said,

1. That it is "a better covenant," ver. 6; a more clear and comfortable dispensation and discovery of the grace of God to sinners, bringing in holy light and liberty to the soul; it is without fault, well ordered in all things; it requires nothing but what it promises grace to perform; it accepts of godly sincerity, accounting it gospel perfection. Every transgression does not turn us out of covenant; all is put into a good and safe hand.

2. That it is "established upon better promises," more clear and express, more spiritual, more absolute. The promises of spiritual and eternal blessings are in this covenant positive and absolute; the promises of temporal blessings with a wise and kind proviso, as far as shall be for God's glory and his people's good. This covenant contains in it promises of assistance and acceptance in duty, promises of progress and perseverance in grace and holiness, of bliss and glory in heaven, which were more obscurely shadowed forth by the promises of the land of Canaan, a type of heaven.

3. It is "a new covenant," even that new covenant that God long ago declared he would make with the house of Israel, that is, all the Israel of God. This was promised in Jer. xxxi. 31, 32, and accomplished in Christ. This will always be a new covenant, in which all that truly take hold of it shall be always found preserved by the power of God. It is God's covenant; his mercy, love, and grace moved for it, his wisdom devised it, his Son purchased it, his Spirit brings souls into it, and builds them up in it.

4. The articles of this covenant are very extraordinary, which are sealed between God and his people by baptism and the Lord's supper, whereby they bind themselves to their part, and God assures them he will do his part; and his is the main and principal part, on which his people depend for grace and strength to do theirs. Here,

1st. God articles with his people that he will "put his laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts," ver. 10. He once wrote his laws to them, now he will write his laws in them; that is, he will give them understanding to know and to believe his laws. He will give them memories to retain them; he will give them hearts to love them, consciences to recognise them; he will give them courage to profess them, and power to put them in practice; the whole habit and frame of their souls shall be a table and transcript of the law of God. This is the foundation of the covenant; and when this is laid, duty will be done wisely, sincerely, readily, easily, resolutely, constantly, and comfortably.

2nd. He articles with them to take them into a near and very honourable relation to himself. First. He will be to them a God; that is, he will be all that to them, and do all that for them, that God can be and do. Nothing more can be said in a thousand volumes than is comprehended in these few words, "I will be a God to them." Secondly. They shall be to him a people; to love, honour, observe, and obey him in all things; complying with his cautions, conforming to his commands, comporting with his providences, copying out his example, taking complacency in his favour. This those must do and will do that have God for their God; this they are bound to do as their part of the contract; this they shall do, for God will enable them to do it, as an evidence that he is their God, and that they are his people; for it is God himself that first founds the relation, and then fills it up with grace suitable and sufficient, and helps them in their measure to fill it up with love and duty, so that God engages both for himself and themselves.

3rd. He articles with them that they shall grow more and more acquainted with their God; ver. 11, "They shall all know me, from the least to the greatest," insomuch as that there shall not be so much need of one neighbour teaching another the knowledge of God. Here observe, First. That in the want of better instruction, one neighbour should be teaching another to know the Lord, as they have ability and opportunity for it. Secondly. That this private instruction shall not be so necessary under the New Testament as under the Old. The old dispensation was shadowy, dark, ritual, and less understood; their priests preached but seldom and but a few at a time, and the Spirit of God was more sparingly given out. But under the new dispensation there shall be such plenty of public qualified preachers of the Gospel, and dispensers of ordinances stately in the solemn assemblies, and so great a flocking to them, as doves to their windows, and such a plentiful effusion of the Spirit of God to make the ministration of the Gospel effectual, that there should be a mighty increase and spreading of Christian knowledge in persons of all sorts, of all sexes, and all ages. O that this promise might be fulfilled in our days; that the hand of God may be with his ministers, that a great number may believe, and be turned to the Lord!

[1. While he saith, "They shall not teach every one his neighbour," he doth not mean that his word and ordinances, and ministry appointed by him, or brotherly communion for mutual edification, shall be disregarded or not made use of, but, by the contrary, that he will himself be their teacher, in these his own means, first giving his children a greater measure of the Spirit, and a more near communion with himself, than of old. 2. Making his children so wise unto salvation as they shall not hang their faith upon man's authority, but search by all means till they understand the mind of God the infallible teacher, as he hath revealed himself in his word. 3. So clearing the truth which is outwardly taught unto them by his own instruments, after so sure and persuasive a manner, by his Spirit inwardly, that the outward teaching shall be no teaching, in comparison of the inward concurrence; according as we hear those Samaritans were taught, who believed indeed the woman's report, that they might go to Christ, but, when they were come to him, got so great satisfaction from himself, that they said unto her, "Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ," Jno. iv. 42. So will the Lord inwardly make his truth powerful unto salvation to his own, that they may say to those that are his instruments, "Now we believe, not because of your saying, but because we have heard him ourselves."]

4th. God articles with them about the pardon of their sins, as what always accompanies the true knowledge of God; ver. 12, "For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness," &c. Observe, First. The freeness of this pardon. It does not result from merit in man, but from mercy in God; he pardons for his own name's sake. Secondly. The fulness of this pardon. It extends to their unrighteousness, sins, and iniquities; to all kinds of sin, to sins highly aggravated. Thirdly. The fixedness of this pardon. It is so final and so fixed, that God will remember their sins no more; he will not recall his pardon; he will not only forgive their sins, but forget them, treat them as if he had forgot them. This pardoning mercy is connected with all other spiritual mercies. Unpardoned sin prevents mercy and pulls down judgments, but the pardon of sin prevents judgment, and opens a wide door to all spiritual blessing. It is the effect of that mercy that is from everlasting, and the earnest of that mercy that shall be to everlasting. This is the excellency of the new dispensation, and these the articles of it; and therefore we have no reason to repine, but great reason to rejoice, that that former dispensation is antiquated and vanished away.

[1. In saying, "For I will be merciful," 1st. He maketh his mercy, pardoning sin, the reason of his bestowing the former good things; his giving of one grace the reason of giving another, even grace for grace. 2nd. He maketh his mercy the ground of all this favour, and nothing in the man's person, or works, or worthiness of his faith. 3rd. The word "merciful" is in the original, "pacified," and doth import both God's respect to the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, which pacifieth him towards us and also our duty in looking towards it as the price of our reconciliation. 2. In that the Lord joineth the promise of putting his law in the mind, and writing it in our heart, with the promise of remission of sins, he teacheth us that he will have every confederate soul that seeketh the benefit of this covenant to join all these benefits together in their claim, with remission of sin, seeking to join the illumination of their mind, renovation of their heart and life, at least in their desires and endeavours, and not to sever one of them from another, but study in uprightness to have them all. 3. While he saith he will remember their sins no more, he teacheth, 1st. That he will never forgive sin nor forget it, but set it ever in his sight, till a man enter into this covenant with him through Christ. 2nd. That when he hath forgiven sin, he forgetteth sin also: whatsoever he remitteth he removeth from his remembrance. Ver. 13. From the name that the Lord giveth this covenant, in calling it new, he draweth two consequences: the first, that the former covenant, by this word, was declared old. Next, that as it was declared old, so was it declared shortly after to be abolished. Then, 1. The least word that proceedeth out of God's mouth is weighty and worthy of consideration. 2. Whatsoever God's word doth import, by due consequence, must be taken for God's truth and God's mind, as if it were expressed. 3. Seeing Christ is come, and the time is now of this new covenant, we know that by God's authority the Levitical ordinances and whole form of the legal covenant and ceremonial forms of worship are abrogated.]"

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle having declared the Old Testament dispensation antiquated and vanishing away, proceeds to let the Hebrews see the correspondence there was between the Old Testament and the New; and that whatever was excellent in the Old was typical and representative of the New; which therefore must as far excel the Old as the substance does the shadow. The Old Testament was never intended to be rested in, but to prepare for the institutions of the Gospel. And here he treats, I. Of the tabernacle, the place of worship, ver. 1—5. II. Of the worship and services performed in the tabernacle, ver. 6, 7. III. Delivers the spiritual sense and the main design of all, ver. 8—28.

HEN verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary. 2 For there was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the sanctuary. 3 And after the second veil, viii. 8. "Finding fault with them:" some insert "while" before "finding fault." "For while finding fault (not with them, but to them), he saith." The real blame falls on the people, but it is made clear that the old covenant was not able to secure righteousness among the people.

ix. 1. "Then verily:" or, as Alford, "now accordingly." The discourse is resumed from chap. viii. 4—6. "Divine service, and a worldly sanctuary:" the contrast between the worldly and the heavenly is taken up from verse 5 of the preceding chapter, and is brought forward again in verses 11 and 24 of this. The Jews, it seems, were accustomed to regard the outer tabernacle as the emblem of this world, and the inner, or most holy place, as the emblem of heaven.

ix. 2. "The shewbread:" or the setting forth of the loaves.

ix. 3, 4. "After the second veil . . . the holiest of all:" or, rather, "the holy of holies." "The golden censor:" there has been some division of opinion respecting this word. Some refer it to the altar covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; 5 And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercyseat; of which we cannot now speak particularly.

TEMPLE ARTICLES, FROM THE ARCH OF TITUS.—VER. 2.

The apostle gives an account here of the tabernacle, that place of worship which God appointed to be pitched on earth. It is called a worldly sanctuary, wholly of this world as to the materials of which it was built, and a building that must be taken down. Is called "a worldly sanctuary," because it was the court and palace of the king of Israel. God was their king, and, as other kings, had his court or place of residence, and attendants, furniture, and provision suitable thereto. This tabernacle, of which we have the model, Ex. xxv.—xxvii., was a moving temple, shadowing forth the unsettled state of the church militant, and the human nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom the fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily. Now of this tabernacle it is said,

First. That it was divided into two parts, called a first and second tabernacle, an inner and an outer part, representing the two states of the church, militant and triumphant, and the two natures of Christ, human and Divine.

Secondly. We are told what was placed in each part of the tabernacle.

1. In the outer part. And there were several things of which you have here a sort of schedule:—

1st. The candlestick; and, doubtless, not an empty and unlighted one, but where the lamps were always burning. And there was need of it, for there were no windows in the sanctuary; and this was to convince the Jews of the darkness and mysterious nature of that dispensation. Their light was only candle-light in comparison of the fulness of light which Christ the Sun of righteousness would bring along with him, and communicate to his people; for all our light is derived from him the fountain of light.

2nd. "The table, and the shewbread" set upon it. This table was set directly opposite to the candlestick, which shews, that by light from Christ we must have communion with him, and one with another. We must not come in the dark to his table, but by light from Christ must discern the Lord's body. On this table were placed twelve loaves for the twelve tribes of Israel, a loaf for a tribe, which stood from sabbath to sabbath, and on that day were renewed. This shewbread may be considered either as the provision of the palace, (though the king of Israel needed it not, yet, in resemblance of the palaces of earthly kings, there must be this provision laid in weekly,) or the provision made in Christ for the souls of his people, suitable to the wants and to the relief of their souls. He is the bread of life. In our Father's house there is bread enough and to spare. We may have fresh supplies from Christ, especially every Lord's day. This outer part is called the sanctuary, or holy, because erected to the worship of a holy God, to represent a holy Jesus, and to entertain a holy people for their farther improvement in holiness.

2. We have an account of what was in the inner part of the sanctuary, which was within the second veil, and is called "the holiest of all." This second veil, which divided between the holy and the most holy place, was a type of the body of Christ; by the rending whereof, not only a view, but a way, was opened for us into the holiest of all, the type of heaven itself. Now in this part were,

1st. "The golden censer," which was to hold the incense, or the golden altar set up to burn the incense upon. Both the one and the other were typical of Christ, of his pleasing and prevailing intercession which he makes in heaven, grounded upon the merits and satisfaction of his sacrifice, upon which we are to depend for acceptance and the blessing from God.

of incense, and others, as in the English Version, to the golden censer. The fact that the "altar of incense" did not form part of the furniture of the holy of holies, but stood (not after) but before the second veil, seems to favour the latter view; for although the censer was kept in the outer sanctuary, yet it was used within the holiest of all on the great day of atonement.

ix. 6 "These things being thus" is Alford's rendering. He keeps the present tense in this and the following verse: "the priests

2nd. "The ark of the covenant overlaid round about with pure gold," ver. 4. This typified Christ and his perfect obedience to the law, and fulfilling all righteousness for us. Now here we are told both what was in this ark and what was over it.

First. What was in it. 1st. "The golden pot that had manna," which, when preserved by the Israelites in their own houses, contrary to the command of God, presently putrefied and stank; but now, being by God's appointment deposited here in his house, was kept from putrefaction, always pure and sweet, and this to teach us that it is only in Christ that our persons, our graces, our performances, are kept pure. It was also a type of that bread of life we have in Christ, the true ambrosia that gives immortality. This was also a memorial of God's miraculously feeding his people in the wilderness, that they might never forget such signal favour, nor distrust God for the time to come. 2nd. "Aaron's rod that budded," and thereby shewed that God had chosen him of the tribe of Levi to minister before him of all the tribes of Israel, and so an end was put to the murmuring of the people, and to their attempt to invade the priests' office, Num. xvii. This was the rod with which Moses and Aaron wrought such wonders; and this was a type of Christ, who is styled "the Man, the Branch," Zec. vi. 12, by whom God has wrought wonders for the spiritual deliverance, defence, and supply of his people, and for the destruction of their enemies. It was a type of Divine justice, by whom Christ the Rock was smitten, and from whom the cool refreshing waters of life flow into our souls. 3rd. "The tables of the covenant," in which the moral law was written, signifying the regard God hath to the preservation of his holy law, and the care we all ought to have that we keep the law of God; that this we can only do in and through Christ by strength from him: nor can our obedience be accepted but through him.

Secondly. What was over the ark, ver. 5. "Over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat." 1st. The mercy-seat, which was the covering of the ark. It was called "the propitiatory," and it was of pure gold, as long and as broad as the ark in which the tables of the law were laid; it was an eminent type of Christ and of his perfect righteousness, ever adequate to the dimensions of the law of God, and covering all our transgressions, interposing between the Shechinah or symbol of God's presence and our sinful failures, and covering them. 2nd. The cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat, representing the holy angels of God, who take pleasure in looking into the great work of our redemption by Christ, and are ready to perform every good office under the Redeemer for those that are the heirs of salvation. The angels attended Christ at his birth, in his temptation, under his agonies, at his resurrection, and in his ascension, and will attend his second coming. God manifest in the flesh was seen, observed, visited by the angels.

6 Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. 7 But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people:

From the description of the place of worship in the Old Testament dispensation, the apostle proceeds to speak of the duties and services performed in those places, ver. 6: when the several parts and furniture of the tabernacle were thus settled, then what was to be done there? Why,

First. The ordinary priests "went always into the first tabernacle" to accomplish the service of God. Observe,

1. None but priests were to enter into the first part of the tabernacle; and this to teach us all that persons not qualified, not called of God, must not intrude into the office and work of the ministry.

2. The ordinary priests were only to enter into the first part of the tabernacle; it would have been fatal presumption in them to have gone into the holiest of all. And this teaches us that even ministers themselves must know and keep in their proper stations, and not presume to usurp the prerogative of Christ by offering up incense of their own, or adding their own inventions to the ordinances of Christ, or lording it over men's consciences.

3. That these ordinary priests were to enter into the first tabernacle always; that is, they were to devote themselves and all their time to the work of their office, and not alienate themselves at any time from it; and that they should be in an habitual readiness for the discharge of their office, and that at all stated appointed times they should actually attend to their work.

4. The ordinary priests must enter into the first tabernacle, that they might there accomplish the service of God. They must not do the work of God partially or by halves, but stand complete in the whole of his will and counsel, not only beginning well, but proceeding well, and persevering to the end, they fulfil the ministry they have received.

Secondly. Into the second, the interior part, "went the high priest alone," ver. 7. This part was an emblem of heaven, and Christ's ascension thither. Here observe,

1. None but the high priest must go into the holiest; so none but Christ could enter into heaven in his own name, and by his own right, and by his own merits.

2. In entering into the holiest, the high priest must first go through the outer sanctuary, and through the veil; signifying that Christ went to heaven through a holy life and a violent death; the veil of his flesh was rent asunder.

3. That the high priest entered but once a year into the holiest, and in this the antitype excels the type, (as in every thing else,) for he has entered once for all, during the whole dispensation of the Gospel.

4. The high priest must not enter without blood; signifying that Christ, having undertaken to be our High Priest, he could not have been admitted into heaven without shedding his blood for us; and that none of us can enter either into God's gracious presence here or his glorious presence hereafter but by the blood of Jesus.

5. That the high priest under the law, entering into the holiest, offered up that blood for himself and his own errors first, and then for the errors of the people, ver. 7. This teaches us that Christ is a more excellent person and high priest than any under the law, for he has no errors of his own to offer for. And it teaches us that ministers, when in the name of Christ they intercede for others, must first apply the blood of Christ to themselves for their pardon.

6. That when the legal high priest had offered for himself, he must not stop there, but must also offer for the errors of the people. Our High Priest, though he needs not to offer for himself, yet he forgets not to offer for his people; he pleads the merit of his sufferings for the benefit of his people on earth. Observe, 1st. Sins are errors, and great errors, both in judgment and practice. We greatly err when we sin against God; and who can understand all his errors? 2nd. They are such errors as leave guilt upon the conscience, not to be washed enter;" "the high-priest offereth for himself and for the ignorances (errors) of the people."

ix. 8, 9. "Was not yet open," or "was not yet manifest." The first tabernacle, the which is a figure (parable or image) for the time then (or now) present. The paraphrase of Webster and Wilkinson is, "which is a typical representation down to the present time;" or, as being that which was a parable (for) in reference to the present time.

away but by the blood of Christ; and the sinful errors of priests and people must be all done away by the same means, the application of the blood of Christ. We must plead this blood on earth, while he is pleading it in heaven for us.

8 The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: 9 Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; 10 Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation. 11 But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; 12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. 13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh: 14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?

In these verses the apostle undertakes to deliver to us the mind and meaning of the Holy Ghost, in all the ordinances of the tabernacle and legal economy, both place and worship. The Scriptures of the Old Testament are of inspiration of God; holy men of old spoke and wrote as the Holy Ghost directed them. And these Old Testament records are of great use and significance, not only to those that first received them, but even to Christians, who ought not to satisfy themselves to read the institutes of the Levitical law, but to learn what the Holy Ghost signifies and suggests to them thereby. Now here are several things mentioned, as the things that the Holy Ghost signified and certified to his people hereby.

First. That "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest," while the first tabernacle was standing, ver. 8. This was one lesson the Holy Ghost would teach us by these types; the way to heaven was not so clear and plain, nor so much frequented, under the Old Testament as under the New. It is the honour of Christ and the Gospel, and the happiness of those that live under it, that now life and immortality are brought to light. There was not that free access to God then as now; God has now opened a wider door, and there is room for more, yea, even for as many as are truly willing to return unto him by Christ.

Secondly. That the first tabernacle was only "a figure for the time then present," ver. 9. It was a dark dispensation, and but of short continuance, only designed for awhile to typify the great things of Christ and the Gospel, that were in due time to shine forth in their own brightness, and thereby cause all the shadows to flee away and disappear, as the stars before the rising sun.

Thirdly. That none of the gifts and sacrifices there offered could make the offerers perfect, "as pertaining to conscience," ver. 9. That is, they could not take away either the desert, or defilement, or dominion of sin; they could not deliver conscience from a dread of the wrath of God; they could neither discharge the debts nor resolve the doubts of him that did the service. A man might run through them all in their several orders and frequent returns, and continue to do so all his days, and yet neither find his conscience pacified nor purified by them; he might thereby be saved from corporal and temporal punishments that were threatened against non-observers, but he could not be saved by them from sin or hell, as all those are that believe in Christ.

Fourthly. The Holy Ghost hereby signifies that the Old Testament institutions were but external "carnal ordinances imposed upon them until the time of reformation," ver. 10. Their imperfection lay in three things,

1. Their nature. They were but external and carnal meats and drinks, and divers washings. All these were bodily exercises which profit little; they could only satisfy the flesh, or at best sanctify to the purifying of the flesh.

2. That they were not such as were left indifferent to them to use or disuse, but they were imposed upon them by grievous corporal punishments, and this was ordered on purpose to make them look more to the promised seed, and long more for him.

3. That these were never designed for a perpetuity, but only to continue till the time of reformation, till the better things provided for them were actually bestowed upon them. Gospel times are and should be times of reformation, of clearer light as to all things necessary to be known, of greater love, bearing ill-will to none and goodwill to all, and having complacency in all that are like unto God, of greater liberty and freedom both of spirit and speech, and of a more holy living according to the rule of the Gospel. We have far greater advantages under the Gospel than they had under the law, and we must either be better or we shall be worse than they. A conversation becoming the Gospel is an excellent way of living; nothing mean, or foolish, or vain, or servile, becomes the Gospel.

Fifthly. The Holy Ghost signifies to us hereby that we never make the right use of types but when we apply them to the antitype, and whenever they do so it will be very evident that the antitype, as in reason it should, does greatly excel the type, which is the main drift and design of all that is said. And as he writes to those that believed that Christ was come, and that Jesus was the Christ, so he very justly infers that he is infinitely above all the legal high priests, ver. 11, 12, and he illustrates it very fully. For,

1. "Christ is the high priest of good things to come;" by which may be understood, 1st. All the good things that were to come during the Old Testament, and now are come under the New. All the spiritual and eternal blessings the Old Testament saints had in their day, and under their dispensation, were owing to the Messiah to come, on whom they believed. The Old Testament set forth in shadows what was to come; the New Testament is the accomplishment of the Old. 2nd. All the good things yet to come and to be enjoyed in a gospel state, when the promises and prophecies made to the gospel church in the latter days shall be accomplished; all these depend upon Christ and his priesthood, and shall be fulfilled. 3rd. Of all the good things to come in the heavenly state, which will perfect both the Testaments, as the state of glory will perfect the state of grace. This state will be in a much higher sense the perfection of the New Testament than the New Testament was the perfection of the Old. Observe, All good things, past, present, and to come, were and are founded upon, and flowing from, the priestly office of Christ.

2. Christ is a High Priest by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, &c., ver. 11. "A tabernacle not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building;" that is, his own body, or rather, human nature, conceived by the Holy Ghost overshadowing the blessed Virgin. This was a new fabric, a new order of building, infinitely superior to all earthly structures, not excepting the tabernacle or the temple itself.

3. Christ our High Priest is entered into heaven, not as their high priest entered into the holiest, with the blood of bulls and of goats, but by his own blood typified by theirs, and infinitely more precious. And this,

4. Not for one year only, which shewed the imperfection of that priesthood, that it did but typically obtain a year's reprieve or pardon; but our High Priest entered into heaven once for all, and has obtained not a yearly respite but eternal redemption, and so needs not to make an annual entrance. In each of the types there was something that shewed it was a type, and resembled the antitype, and something that shewed it was but a type, and fell short of the antitype, and therefore ought by no means to be set up in competition with the antitype.

5. The Holy Ghost farther signified and shewed what was the efficacy of the blood of the Old Testament sacrifices, and from thence infers the much greater efficacy of the blood of Christ. 1st. The efficacy of the blood of the legal sacrifices extended to the purifying of the flesh, ver. 13; it freed the outward man from ceremonial uncleanness, and from temporal punishment, and entitled to, and fitted for, some external privileges. 2nd. He infers very justly from hence the far greater efficacy of the blood of Christ; ver. 14. "How much more shall the blood of Christ," &c. [Note, There are two sorts of sanctification; one external, of the flesh, which maketh man holy to the church, whatsoever he be within; another internal, of the conscience and inner man, which maketh a man holy before God.] Here observe, First. What it was that gave such efficacy to the blood of Christ. 1st. It was his offering himself to God, the human nature upon the altar of his Divine nature, he being both priest, altar and sacrifice, his Divine nature serving for the two first, and his human nature for the last. Now such a priest, altar, and sacrifice, could not but be propitiatory. 2nd. It was Christ's offering up himself to God "through the eternal Spirit," not only as the Divine nature supported the human, but the Holy Ghost, which he had without measure, helping him in all, and in this great act of obedience offering himself. 3rd. It was Christ's offering himself to God "without spot," without any sinful stain either in his nature or life. This was conformable to the law of sacrifices, which were to be without blemish. Now farther observe, Secondly. What the efficacy of Christ's blood is; it is very great. For, [1st. Sins are but dead works flowing from nature dead in sin; and not only deserving, but also drawing on death upon the sinner. 2nd. The conscience lieth polluted with the filthiness of dead works till the virtue of the blood of Jesus applied bring intimation of absolution.] 3rd. It is sufficient to "purge the conscience from dead works," it reaches to the very soul and conscience; the defiled soul, defiled with sin, which is a dead work, proceeds from spiritual death, and tends to death eternal. As the touching a dead body gave a legal uncleanness, so meddling with sin gives a moral and real defilement, fixes it in the very soul [and conscience]; but the blood of Christ has that efficacy as to purge it out. [4th. Christ's blood doth not purge the conscience from dead works that a man should go wallow in them again, but that he may serve the living God more acceptably.] 5th. It is sufficient to enable us to serve the living God, not only by purging away that guilt that separates between God and sinners, but by sanctifying and renewing the soul through the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, purchased by Christ for this purpose, that we might be enabled to serve the living God in a lively manner.

15 And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. 16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. 17 For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth. 18 Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood.

ix. 12. "Having obtained eternal redemption;" he entered once for all into the holy place, and obtained, &c.

ix. 13, 14. The contrast between the offerings of the law (verse 13) and the offering made by Christ is not to be overlooked. Christ offered himself; the act was purely voluntary; the offering was thus precious (compare John x. 17, 18). "Through the eternal Spirit," it seems best to take this as referring to "Christ's eternal Spirit," or "his own Divine personality." Some understand the expression of the Third Person of the Trinity; the absence of the definite article is against this.

ix. 15. This verse becomes clearer if we render, with Alford, "And for this cause he is the mediator of a new covenant, in order that, death having taken place, for the propitiation of transgressions under the first covenant, they," &c.

ix. 16-20. In these verses the word which has been hitherto translated "covenant" is rendered "testament." The reason for the 19 For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people, 20 Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. 21 Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry. 22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.

In these verses the apostle considers the Gospel under the notion of a will or testament, the new or last will and testament of Christ, and shews the necessity and efficacy of the blood of Christ to make this testament valid and effectual.

First, The Gospel is here considered as a testament; the new and last will and testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; It is observable, that the solemn transactions that pass between God and man are sometimes called a covenant, here a testament. A covenant is an agreement between two or more parties about things that are in their own power, or may be so, and this either with or without a mediator; and this agreement takes effect at such time and in such manner as is therein declared. A testament is a voluntary act and deed of a single person, duly executed and witnessed, bestowing legacies on such legatees as are described and characterised by the testator, and which can only take effect upon his death. Now observe, Christ is "the mediator of a new testament," ver. 15, and he is so for several ends and purposes here mentioned. 1. To redeem persons from their transgressions committed against the law or first testament, which makes every transgression a forfeiture of liberty, and makes men debtors, and slaves or prisoners, that need to be redeemed. 2. To qualify all those that are effectually called to receive the promise of an eternal inheritance. These are the great legacies that Christ by his last will and testament has bequeathed to the true characterised legatees.

Secondly, To make this new testament effectual, it was necessary that Christ should die; the legacies accrue by means of death. This he proves by two arguments.

1. From the general nature of every will or testamentary disposition; ver. 16, "Where a testament is," where it acts and operates, "there must of necessity be the death of the testator;" till then the property is still in the testator's hand, and he has power to revoke and cancel, or alter his will as he pleases; so that no estate, no right, is conveyed by will, till the testator's death hath made it unalterable and effectual.

2. From the particular method that was taken by Moses in the ratification of the first testament, which was not done without blood, ver. 18, 19, &c. All men by sin were become guilty before God, had forfeited their inheritance, their liberties, and their very lives, into the hands of Divine justice; but God, being willing to shew the greatness of his mercy, proclaimed a covenant of grace, and ordered it to be typically administered under the Old Testament, but not without the blood and life of the creature, and God accepted the blood of bulls and goats as typifying the blood of Christ; and by these means the covenant of grace was ratified under the former dispensation. The method taken by Moses, according to the direction he had received from God, is here particularly related.

1st, Moses "spoke every precept to all the people according to the law," ver. 19. He published to them the tenor of the covenant, both the duties required, the rewards promised to those that did their duty, and the punishment threatened against the transgressors; and he called for their consent to the terms of the covenant, and this in an express manner.

2nd, Then he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and applied this blood by sprinkling it. This blood and water signified the blood and water that came out of our Saviour's pierced side, for justification and sanctification, and also shadowing forth the two sacraments of the New Testament, baptism and the Lord's supper, with scarlet wool, signifying the righteousness of Christ with which we must be clothed, the hyssop signifying that faith by which we must apply all. Now with these Moses sprinkled, First, The book of the law and covenant; to shew that the covenant of grace is confirmed by the blood of Christ, and made effectual to our good. Secondly, The people; intimating that the shedding of the blood of Christ will be no advantage to us if it be not applied to us. And the sprinkling of both the book and the people signified the mutual consent of both parties, God and man, and their mutual engagements to each other in this covenant through Christ; Moses at the same time using these words, "This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you." This blood typifying the blood of Christ, is the ratification of the covenant of grace to all true believers. Thirdly, He sprinkled the tabernacle and all the utensils of it, intimating that all the sacrifices offered up, and services performed there, were accepted only through the blood of Christ, which procures the remission of that iniquity that cleaves to our holy things, which could not have been remitted but by that atoning blood. [He saith "almost" because of some purging which was done by washing, and yet even that washing also drew the virtue of ceremonial purging from the sacrifice whereunto the washing was annexed.]

23 It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. 24 For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us: 25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

26 For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. 27 And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: 28 So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

In this last part of the chapter the apostle goes on to tell us what the Holy Ghost has signified to us by the legal purification of the patterns of the things in heaven, inferring from thence the necessity of better sacrifices to consecrate the heavenly things themselves.

First, The necessity of purifying "the patterns of the things in heaven," ver. 23. This necessity arises both from the Divine appointment, which must always be obeyed, and from the reason of that appointment, which was to preserve a proper resemblance between the things typifying and the things typified. It is observable here, that the sanctuary of God on earth is a pattern of heaven, and communion with God in his sanctuary is to his people a heaven upon earth.

Secondly, The necessity that the heavenly things themselves should be purified with better sacrifices than of bulls and goats. The things themselves are better than the patterns, and must therefore be consecrated with better sacrifices. These heavenly things are the privileges of the gospel state, begun in grace, perfected in glory; these must be ratified by a suitable sanction or consecration, and that was the blood of Christ. Now it is very evident that the sacrifices of Christ are vastly better than those of the law.

1. From the places in which the sacrifices under the law and those under the Gospel were offered. Those under the law were the holy places made with hands, which are but figures of the true sanctuary, ver. 24. Christ's sacrifice, though offered upon earth, was by himself carried up into heaven, and is there presented in a way of daily intercession, for he appears in the presence of God for us. He is gone to heaven, not only to enjoy the rest and receive the honour due to him, but to appear in the presence of God for us, to present our persons and our performances, to answer and rebuke our adversary and accuser, to secure our interest, to perfect all our affairs, and to prepare a place for us.

2. From the sacrifices themselves, ver. 26. Those under the law were the lives and blood of other creatures of a different nature from the offerers, the blood of beasts, a thing of small value, and would have been of none at all in this matter had it not had a typical respect to the blood of Christ; but the sacrifice of Christ was the oblation of himself. He offered his own blood, truly called, by virtue of the hypostatical union, the blood of God, and therefore of infinite value.

3. From the frequent repetition of the legal sacrifices. This shewed the imperfection of that law; but it is the honour and perfection of Christ's sacrifice, that it being once offered was sufficient to all the ends of it; and indeed the contrary would have been absurd, for then he must have been still dying and rising again, and ascending, and then again descending and dying, &c., and the great work had been always in fieri,—always a doing, and always to do, but never finished, which would be as contrary to reason as it is to revelation and to the dignity of his person; but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. The Gospel is the last dispensation of the grace of God to men.

4. From the inefficacy of the legal sacrifice, and the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice. The legal sacrifices could not of themselves put away sin, neither procure pardon for it nor power against it,—sin would still have lain upon us, and had dominion over us; but Jesus Christ, by one sacrifice, has made an end of sin, he has destroyed the works of the devil.

Thirdly, The apostle illustrates the argument from the appointment of God concerning men, ver. 27, 28; and observes something like it in the appointment of God concerning Christ.

1. The appointment of God concerning man contains in it two things:—1st, That they must once die, or, however, undergo a change equivalent to death. It is an awful thing to die; to have the vital knot loosed or cut asunder, all relations here dropped at once, an end put to our probation and preparation state, to enter into another world. It is a great work; and it is a work that can be but once done, and therefore had need to be well done. This is matter of comfort to the godly, that they shall die well, and die but once; but it is matter of terror to the wicked, that die in their sins, that they cannot return again to do that great work better. 2nd, It is appointed to men that after death they shall come to judgment, to a particular judgment immediately after death; for the soul returns to God as to its judge, to be determined as to its eternal state; and men shall be brought to the general judgment at the end of the world. This is the unalterable decree of God concerning men: they must die, and they must be judged; it is appointed for them, and it is to be believed and seriously considered by them.

2. The appointment of God concerning Christ, bearing some resemblance to the other. 1st, He must be "once offered to bear the sins of many" of all the Father had given to him, of all that should believe in his name. He was not offered for any sin of his own; he was wounded for our transgressions. God laid on him the iniquity of all his people, and these are many; though not so many as the rest of mankind; yet when they are all gathered to him he will be the firstborn among many brethren. [2nd, It is as unreasonable that Christ should offer himself oftener than once, as it is to exact of him the laying down of his life oftener than once, for that is to exact more than the severity of God's justice requireth of him. Christ's death was not for any sin in him, but for our sins.] 3rd, It is appointed that Christ shall appear the second time without sin, to the salvation of those that look for him. First, He will then appear without sin. At his first appearance, though he had no sin of his own, yet he stood charged with the sins of many; he was the Lamb of God that bore upon him the sins of the world, and then he appeared in the form of sinful flesh. But his second appearance will be without any such charge upon him, he having fully discharged it before; and then his visage shall not be marred, but shall be exceeding glorious. Secondly, This will be to the salvation of all that look for him; he will then perfect their holiness, their happiness. Their number shall then be accomplished, and their salvation completed. Observe, It is the distinguishing character of true believers that they are looking for Christ; they look to him by faith; they look for him by hope and holy desires. They look for him in every duty, in every ordinance, in every providence now; and they expect his second coming, and are preparing for it; and though it will be sudden destruction to the rest of the world, that scoff at the report of it, it will be eternal salvation to those that look for it.

change is easily seen. The illustration in verses 16, 17 suggested the making of a will or testament rather than a covenant. Some, however, prefer the uniform translation of the word by "covenant." Archbishop Whateley says the idea of a will is familiar to us, but was unknown to the Hebrews, and regrets that the word "covenant" was not retained everywhere, especially in the words of Christ at the last supper. "After men are dead:" this is literally "over the dead," and is translated by Alford "in the case of the dead." The phrase "over the dead" is intelligible when the word "covenant" is used, for a covenant was ratified over the bodies of the slain victims. The above is the view held by many authorities. On the other hand, there seems a difficulty in the word "testator" (better "he who made it"), for this cannot be understood of the victim in a covenant. The word being somewhat ambiguous, it is not unlikely that the illustrations afforded by both meanings would be pressed into service by the apostle.

CHAPTER X.

The apostle knew very well the Hebrews, to whom he wrote, were strangely fond of the Levitical dispensation, and therefore he fills his mouth with arguments to wean them from it; and in order thereto proceeds in this chapter, I. To run down and lay low the whole of that priesthood and sacrifices, ver. 1-7. II. He raises and exalts the priesthood of Christ very high, that he might effectually recommend him and his Gospel to them, ver. 7-19. III. He shews to believers the honours and dignities of their state, and calls them to suitable duties, ver. 19-39.

OR the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect. 2 For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins. 3 But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year. 4 For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. 5 Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me: 6 In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure.

Here the apostle, by the direction of the Spirit of God, sets himself to run down and lay low the Levitical dispensation; for though it was of Divine appointment, and very excellent and useful in its time and place, yet when it was set up in competition with Christ, to whom it was only designed to lead the people, it was very proper and necessary to shew the weakness and imperfection of it, which the apostle does effectually from several arguments; as,

First. That the law had a shadow, and but "a shadow of good things to come." And who would dote upon a shadow, though of good things, especially when the substance is come? Observe, 1. The things of Christ and the Gospel are "good things." They are the best things; they are best in themselves, and the best for us; they are realities of an excellent nature. 2. These good things were under the Old Testament "good things to come," not clearly discovered, nor fully enjoyed. 3. That the Jews then had but the shadow of the good things of Christ, some adumbrations of them; we under the Gospel have the substance.

Secondly. That the law was not the very image of the good things to come. An image is an exact draught of the thing represented thereby; the law did not go so far, but was only a shadow, as the image of a person in a looking-glass is a much more perfect representation than his shadow upon the wall. The law was a very rough draught of the great design of Divine grace, and therefore not to be so much doted on.

Thirdly. The legal sacrifices, being offered year by year, could never make the comers thereunto perfect; for then there would have been an end of offering them, ver. 1, 2. Could they have satisfied the demands of justice, and made reconciliation for iniquity; could they have purified and pacified conscience, then they had ceased, as being no farther necessary; since the offerers would have had no more sin lying upon their consciences. But this was not the case; after one day of atonement was over the sinner would fall again into one fault or other, and so there would be need of another day of atonement, and of one every year, besides the daily ministrations. Whereas now, under the Gospel, the atonement is perfect, and not to be repeated; and the sinner once pardoned is ever pardoned as to his state, and only needs to renew his repentance and faith, that he may have a comfortable sense of a continued pardon.

Fourthly. As the legal sacrifices did not of themselves take away sin, so it was impossible they should, ver. 4. There was an essential defect in them. 1. They were not of the same nature with us that sinned. 2. They were not of sufficient value to make satisfaction for the affronts done to the justice and government of God, as they were not of the same nature that offended and so could not be suitable. They were much less of the same nature that was offended, and nothing less than the nature that was offended could make the sacrifice a full satisfaction for the offence. 3. The beasts offered up under the law could not consent to put themselves in the sinner's room and place. The atoning sacrifice must be one capable of consenting, and must voluntarily substitute himself in the sinner's stead: Christ did so.

Fifthly. There was a time fixed and foretold by the great God; and that time was now come when these legal sacrifices would be no longer accepted by him, or useful to men. God never did desire them for themselves, and now he abrogated them; and therefore to adhere to them now would be resisting God and rejecting him. This time of the repeal of the Levitical laws was foretold by David, Ps. xl. 6, 7, and is recited here as now come. Thus industriously does the apostle lay low the Mosaic dispensation.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God. 8 Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law: 9 Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O

God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. 10 By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. 11 And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: 12 But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God; 13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool. 14 For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified. 15 Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, 16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them; 17 And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. 18 Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

Here the apostle raiseth up and exalteth the Lord Jesus Christ as high as he had laid the Levitical priesthood low. He recommends Christ to them as the true High Priest, the true atoning sacrifice, the antitype of all the rest; and this he illustrates,

First. From the purpose and promise of God concerning Christ, which is frequently recorded in the volume of the book of God, ver. 7. God had not only decreed, but declared by Moses and the prophets that [when the legal sacrifices are found and declared unable to pacify] Christ should come and be the great High Priest of the church, and should offer up a perfect and a perfecting sacrifice. It was written of Christ in the beginning of the book of God, that "the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head;" and the Old Testament abounds with prophecies concerning Christ. Now since he is the person so often promised, so much spoken of, so long expected, by the people of God, he ought to be received with great honour and gratitude. [Note, That Christ did not think it due time for himself to come into the world till it should be found that without him neither God could be satisfied nor man saved by any other mean but by his obedience.]

Secondly. From what God had done in preparing a body for Christ, that is, a human nature, that he might be qualified to be our Redeemer and advocate. Uniting the two natures in his own person, he was a fit Mediator to go between God and man, a days-man to lay his hand upon both, a peacemaker to reconcile them, and an everlasting band of union between God and the creature; as Ps. xl. 6, "Mine ears hast thou opened," that is, thou hast fully instructed me, furnished and fitted me for the work, and engaged me in it. Now a Saviour thus provided and prepared by God himself in so extraordinary a manner ought to be received with great affection and gladness.

Thirdly. From the readiness and willingness that Christ discovered to engage in this work, when no other sacrifice would be accepted, ver. 7-9. When no lesser sacrifice would be a proper satisfaction to the justice of God than that of Christ himself, then Christ voluntarily came into it; "Lo, I come!" I delight "to do thy will, O God!" Let thy curse fall upon me, but let these go their way. Father, I delight to fulfil thy counsels, and my covenant with thee for them; I delight to perform all thy promises, to fulfil all the prophecies. This should endear Christ and our Bibles to us, that in Christ we have the fulfilling of the Scriptures.

Fourthly. From the errand and design upon which Christ came, and that was to do the will of God; not only as a Prophet to reveal the will of God, nor only as a King to give forth Divine laws, but as a Priest to satisfy the demands of justice, and to fulfil all righteousness. Christ came to do the will of God in two instances:—

1. In taking away the first priesthood, which God had no pleasure in. Not only taking away the curse of the covenant of works, and cancelling the sentence denounced against us as sinners, but taking away the insufficient typical priesthood, and blotting out the handwriting of ceremonial ordinances, and nailing it to his cross.

2. In establishing the second, that is, his own priesthood, and the everlasting Gospel, the most pure and perfect dispensation of the covenant of grace. This is the great design upon which the heart of God was set from all eternity. "The will of God centres and terminates in it; and it is not more agreeable to the will of God than it is advantageous to the souls of men;" "For it is by this will that we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all," ver. 10. Observe, 1st. What is the fountain of all that Christ has done for his people, the sovereign will and grace of God. [2nd. All those for whom Christ did offer himself are sanctified in God's decree, and in due time, by virtue of Christ's offering. 3rd. Those who are never sanctified, the body of Christ was never offered for them.] 4th. How we come to partake of what Christ has done for us; and that is, by being sanctified, converted, effectually called, wherein we are united to Christ, and so partake of the benefits of his redemption; and this sanctification is owing to that oblation he made of himself to God.

Fifthly. From the perfect efficacy of the priesthood of Christ; ver. 14, "By one offering he hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified." He has and will perfectly deliver those that are brought over to him, from all the guilt, and power, and punishment of sin, and will put them into the sure possession of perfect holiness and felicity. This is what the Levitical priesthood could never do; and if we indeed are aiming at a perfect state we must receive the Lord Jesus as the only High Priest that can bring us to that state.

Sixthly. From the place to which our Lord Jesus is now exalted, the honour he has there, and the farther honour he shall have; ver. 12, 13, "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down at the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." Here observe, 1st. To what honour Christ, as man and Mediator, is exalted—to "the right hand of God," the seat of power, and interest, and activity; the giving hand,—all the favours that God bestows on his people are handed to them by Christ;

x. 1. "The law having a shadow," &c.: the verse seems to take up the thought of the "figures" and "patterns" which the last chapter spoke of (see verses 23, 24). The emphasis in the original is marked by the order of the words: "For a shadow the law having of good things (or, rather, of the good things) to come." "Not the very image:" the contrast between "shadow" and "image" is not merely that between the "outline" and "the finished picture;" it is the difference between the statue and the shadow cast by it.

x. 2. The worshippers once (or "once for all") cleansed, would have no more conscience—i.e., consciousness, or moral consciousness of sin.

x. 5. "A body hast thou prepared me:" the Hebrew text in Ps. xl. 6, 7, has, "Ears hast thou dug for me." "Some take this to refer to the piercing or boring of the ear-lobe in the case of the servant who was willing to remain with his master, when he might have claimed his freedom (Exod. xxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17). With this reference, the the receiving hand,—all the duties that God accepts from men are presented by Christ; the working hand,—all the kingdoms of providence and grace are administered by Christ, and therefore this is the highest post of honour. 2nd. How did Christ come to this honour? Not merely by the purpose or donation of the Father, but by his own merit and purchase, as a reward due to his sufferings; and, as he can never be deprived of an honour so much his due, so he will never quit it nor cease to employ it for his people's good. 3rd. How does he enjoy this honour? even with the greatest satisfaction and rest. He is for ever sat down there. The Father acquiesces and is satisfied in him; he is satisfied in his Father's will and presence. This is his rest for ever: here he will dwell; for he has both desired and deserved it. 4th. He has farther expectations, which shall not be disappointed, for they are grounded upon the promise of the Father, who hath said unto him, "Sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool," Ps. cx. 1. One would think such a person as Christ could have no enemies except in hell; but it is certain he has enemies on earth, and very many, and very inveterate ones. Let not Christians, then, wonder that they have enemies, though they desire to live peaceably with all men. But Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool, some by conversion, others by confusion; and which way soever it be Christ will be honoured. Of this Christ is assured, and this he is expecting, and his people should rejoice in the expectation of it: for when his enemies are subdued their enemies that are so for his sake shall be subdued also.

Seventhly. The apostle recommends Christ from the witness the Holy Ghost has given in the Scriptures concerning him; and this relates chiefly to what should be the happy fruit and consequence of his humiliation and sufferings, which in general is that new and gracious covenant that is founded upon his satisfaction, and sealed by his blood; ver. 15, "Whereof the Holy Ghost is a witness," &c. [Where note that the Holy Ghost is author of the Scripture, and doth speak unto us thereby. He declareth the new covenant to be of the Holy Ghost's making, and calleth him the Lord. Wherein he teaches us, 1. That the Holy Ghost is a distinct person of the Godhead, bearing witness by himself to the church of the truth. 2. And one in essence with the Father and the Son, even the Lord Jehovah, author of the new covenant with the Father and the Son.] The passage is cited from Jer. xxxi. 31, in which covenant God promises, 1. That God would pour out his Spirit upon his people, so as to give them skill, and will, and power to obey his word; he will put his laws in their hearts, and write them in their minds, ver. 16; this will make their duty plain, easy, and pleasant. 2. Their sins and iniquities he will remember no more, ver. 17; which will alone shew the riches of Divine grace and the sufficiency of Christ's satisfaction, that it needs not to be repeated, ver. 18. For there shall be no more remembrance of sin against true believers, either to shame them now or to condemn them hereafter. This was much more than the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices could effect.

And now we have gone through the doctrinal part of the epistle, in which we have met with many things dark and difficult to be understood, which we must impute to the weakness and dullness of our own minds. The apostle now proceeds to apply this great doctrine, so as to influence their affections and direct their practice, setting before them the dignities and duties of the gospel state.

19 Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, 20 By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh; 21 And having an high priest over the house of God; 22 Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water. 23 Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; (for he is faithful that promised;) 24 And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works: 25 Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching. 26 For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27 But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. 28 He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses: 29 Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace? 30 For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge his people. 31 It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living

God. 32 But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions; 33 Partly, whilst ye were made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used. 34 For ye had compassion of me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance. 35 Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward. 36 For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. 37 For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. 38 Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. 39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

Here the apostle sets forth, First. The dignities of the gospel state. It is fit that believers should know the honours and privileges that Christ has procured them, that while they take the comfort they may give him the glory of all. The privileges are, 1. "Boldness to enter into the holiest." They have access to God, light to direct them, liberty of spirit and of speech to conform to the direction; they have a right to the privilege, and a readiness for it; assistance to use and improve it, and assurance of acceptance and advantage. They may enter into the gracious presence of God in his holy oracles, ordinances, providences and covenant, and so into communion with God, where they receive communications from him, till they are prepared to enter into his glorious presence in heaven. 2. "An high priest over the house of God;" even this blessed Jesus, who presides over the church militant and every member thereof on earth, and over the church triumphant in heaven. God is willing to dwell with men on earth, and to have them dwell with him in heaven; but fallen man cannot dwell with God without a high priest, who is the Mediator of reconciliation here, and of fruition hereafter.

Secondly. The apostle tells us the way and means by which Christians enjoy such privileges, and in general declares it to be "by the blood of Jesus," by the merit of that blood which he offered up to God as an atoning sacrifice. He has purchased for all that believe in him free access to God in the ordinances of his grace here, and in the kingdom of his glory. This blood being sprinkled on the conscience chases away slavish fear, and gives the believer assurance both of his safety and welcome into the Divine presence. Now the apostle having given this general account of the way by which we have access to God, he enters farther into the particulars of it, ver. 20. As, 1. It is the only way; there is no other left but this; the first way to the tree of life is and has been long shut up. 2. It is a new way; both in opposition to the covenant of works and to the antiquated dispensation of the Old Testament; it is via novissima,—the last way that will ever be opened to men. That way will not enter in the way exclude themselves for ever; it is a way that will always be effectual. 3. It is a living way; it would be death to attempt to come to God in the way of the covenant of works; but this way we may come to God and live. It is by a living Saviour, who, though he was dead, is alive; and it is a way that gives life and lively hope to those that enter into it. [As Elijah's chariot, so is Christ's manhood and sufferings. Get up here by faith in him, and thou shalt go up to God. This way is that of eagles' wings. Lay first hold upon Jesus Christ, God manifested in the flesh, and he will mount up with thee, and carry thee through the wilderness to Canaan, from the natural misery and sins which thou liest in, unto heaven.] 4. It is a way that Christ has consecrated for us through the veil, that is, his flesh. The veil in the tabernacle and temple signified the body of Christ; when he died, the veil of the temple was rent in sunder, and this was at the time of the evening sacrifice, and gave the people a surprising view into the holy of holies, which they never had before. Our way to heaven is by a crucified Saviour; his death is to us the way of life. To those that believe this he will be precious. This "way" leadeth through the veil, to teach us that we coming to Christ's manhood, must not subsist there, but by this mean seeking to God, who dwelleth in him, that our faith and hope may be in God. We enter by the man Christ, and do rest on God in Christ, on the fulness of the Godhead, which dwelleth bodily in Christ. This is to distinguish the natures of Christ, and to keep the unity of his person rightly.]

Thirdly. The apostle proceeds to shew the Hebrews the duties which they were obliged to upon the account of these privileges conferred upon them in such an extraordinary way, ver. 22, 23, &c.

1. They must draw near to God, and that in a right manner. They must draw near to God; since such a way of access and return to God is opened, it would be the greatest ingratitude and contempt of God and Christ still to keep at a distance from him. They must draw near by conversion and by taking hold of his covenant; they must draw near in all holy conversation, like Enoch walking with God. They must draw near in humble adorations, worshipping at his footstool; they must draw near in holy dependence, and in a strict observation of the Divine conduct towards them; they must draw near in conformity to God, and communion with him, living under his blessed influence; still endeavouring to get nearer and nearer, till they come to dwell in his presence. But they must see to it that they make their approach to God after a right manner. 1st. With a true heart; without any allowed guile or hypocrisy. God is the searcher of hearts, and he requires truth in the inward parts. Sincerity is our gospel perfection, though not our justifying righteousness. 2nd. "In full assurance of faith;" with a faith grown up to a full persuasion that when we come to God by Christ we shall have audience and acceptance. We should lay aside all sinful distrust; without faith we cannot please God, and the stronger our faith is, the more glory we give to God. And, 3rd. "Having voluntariness of Christ's self-surrender would be the drift of the clause. The reference to this Jewish custom is, however, not certain, and the Hebrew text is taken to be equivalent to 'Thou hast opened mine ears.' (Compare Isa. l. 4, 5.) The expression then would be equivalent to 'Thou hast made me obedient; thou hast imparted the spirit and disposition through which alone sacrifices can be acceptable' (Webster and Wilkinson). The drift of the passage is not materially different in either case.

x. 10. "By the which will," or "in pursuance of which will we have been sanctified," &c. (Alford). The will is not the will and obedience of Christ, but the will of God which Christ came to fulfil. "We have been sanctified" must clearly not be understood of that actual personal sanctification which is progressive, but of the bringing into a holy relation and state, the objective reception into 'true relationship to God.'

x. 14. "The 'once for all' of Christ's offering is the burden and our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience." By a believing application of the blood of Christ to our souls they may be cleansed from guilt, from filth, from sinful fear and torment, from all aversion to God and duty, from ignorance, and error, and superstition, and whatever evils the consciences of men are subject to by reason of sin. 4th. "Our bodies washed with pure water," that is, with the water of baptism; by which we are recorded among the disciples of Christ, members of his mystical body. Or, with the sanctifying virtue of the Holy Spirit reforming and regulating our outward conversation as well as our inward frame, cleansing from the filthiness of the flesh, as well as of the spirit. The priests under the law were to wash before they went into the presence of the Lord to offer before him. There must be a due preparation for making our approaches to God.

2. The apostle exhorts believers to "hold fast the profession of their faith," ver. 23, where we observe, 1st. The duty itself; "To hold fast the profession of our faith;" that is, to be well apprised in all the truths and ways of the Gospel, to get fast hold of them, and to keep that hold against all temptation and opposition. Our spiritual enemies will do what they can to wrest our faith, and hope, and holiness, and comfort out of our hands, but we must hold fast our religion as our best treasure. 2nd. The manner how we must do this; "Without wavering," without doubting, without disputing, without dallying with temptation to apostasy. Having once settled these great things between God and our souls, we must be steadfast and immovable. They that begin to waver in matters of Christian faith and practice are in danger of falling away. 3rd. The motive or reason enforcing this duty; "He is faithful that hath promised." God has made great and precious promises to believers, and he is a faithful God, true to his word; there is no falseness or fickleness with him, and there should be none with us. His faithfulness should excite and encourage us to be faithful, and we must depend more upon his promises to us than upon our promises made with him, and we must plead with him the promise of grace sufficient.

Fourthly. We have the means prescribed for preventing our apostasy, and promoting our fidelity and perseverance, ver. 24, 25, &c. He mentions several, as,

1. That we should "consider one another to provoke to love and to good works." Christians ought to have a tender consideration and concern for one another; they should affectionately consider what their several wants, and weaknesses, and temptations are, and they should do this not to reproach one another, not to provoke one another to anger, but to love and good works; calling upon ourselves and one another to love God and Christ more, to love duty and holiness more, to love our brethren in Christ more, and to do all the good offices of Christian affection both to the bodies and souls of each other. A good example given to others is the best and most effectual provocation to love and good works.

2. Not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, ver. 25. It is the will of Christ that his disciples should assemble themselves together; sometimes more privately for conference and prayer, and in public for hearing and joining in all the ordinances of gospel worship. There were in the apostles' times, and should be in every age, Christian assemblies for the worship of God, and for mutual edification. And it seems even in those times there were some that forsook these assemblies, and so began to apostatise from religion itself. The communion of saints is a great help and privilege, and a good means of steadiness and perseverance; hereby their hearts and hands are mutually strengthened.

3. To exhort one another; to exhort ourselves and each other, to warn ourselves and one another of the sin and danger of backsliding, to put ourselves and our fellow Christians in mind of our duty, of our failures and corruptions, to watch over one another, and be jealous of ourselves and one another with a godly jealousy. This managed with a true gospel spirit would be the best and most cordial friendship.

4. That we should observe the approaching of times of trial, and be thereby quickened to greater diligence; "So much the more as ye see the day approaching." Christians ought to observe the signs of the times, such as God has foretold them of. There was a day approaching, a terrible day to the Jewish nation, when their city should be destroyed, and the body of the people rejected of God for rejecting Christ. This would be a day of dispersion and temptation to the chosen remnant. Now the apostle puts them upon observing what signs there were of the approach of such a terrible day, and be the more constant in meeting together and exhorting one another, that they might be the better prepared for such a day. There is a trying day coming on us all, the day of our death, and we should observe all the signs of its approaching, and improve them to greater watchfulness and diligence in duty.

Fifthly. After having mentioned these means of establishment, the apostle proceeds, in the close of the chapter, to enforce his exhortations to perseverance, and against apostasy, by many very weighty considerations, ver. 26, 27, &c.

1. From the description he gives of the sin of apostasy. It is "sinning wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth," sinning wilfully against that truth we have had convincing evidence of. This text has been the occasion of great distress to some gracious souls; they have been ready to conclude that every wilful sin after conviction, and against knowledge, is the unpardonable sin. But this has been their infirmity and error. The sin here mentioned is a total and final apostasy,—when men with a full and fixed will and resolution despise and reject Christ, the only Saviour; despise and resist the Spirit, the only Sanctifier; and despise and renounce the Gospel, the only way of salvation, and the words of eternal life; and all this after they have known, owned, and professed the Christian religion, and continue to do so obstinately and maliciously: this is the great transgression. The apostle seems to refer to the law concerning presumptuous sinners, Num. xv. 30, 31; they were to be cut off.

2. From the dreadful doom of such apostates. 1st. There remains no more sacrifice for such sins; no other Christ to come to save such, they sin against the last resort and remedy. There were some sins under the law for which no sacrifices were provided. But yet if they that committed them did truly repent, though they must not escape temporal death, they might escape eternal destruction; for Christ would come and make atonement. But now those under the Gospel that will not accept of Christ, that they may be saved by him, have no other refuge left them. 2nd. There remains only for them "a certain fearful looking for of judgment," ver. 27. Some think this refers to the dreadful destruction of the Jewish church and state, but certainly it refers also to the utter destruction that waits for all obstinate apostates at death and judgment, when the Judge will discover a fiery indignation against them that will devour the adversaries. They will be consigned over to the devouring fire, and to everlasting burnings. Of this destruction God gives some notorious sinners, while on earth, a fearful foreboding in their own consciences, a dreadful looking for it, with a despair of ever being able either to endure or escape it.

3. From the methods of Divine justice with those that "despised Moses' law;" that is, sinned presumptuously, despising his authority, his threatenings, and power. These, when convicted, by two or three witnesses, were put to death: they died without mercy, a temporal death. Observe, Wise governors should be careful to keep up the credit of their government, and the authority of the laws, by punishing presumptuous offenders. But then, in such cases, there should be good evidence of the fact. Thus God ordained in Moses' law; and from hence the apostle infers the heavy doom that will fall upon those that apostatise from Christ. And here he refers himself to their own consciences, to judge how much sorer punishment the despisers of Christ (after they have professed to know him) are like to undergo; and they may judge of the greatness of the punishment by the greatness of the sin.

1st. They have "trodden under foot the Son of God." To trample upon an ordinary person shews intolerable insolence; to treat a person of honour in that vile manner is insufferable; but to deal thus with the Son of God, who himself is God, must be the highest provocation; to trample upon his person, denying him to be the Messiah; to trample upon his authority, and undermine his kingdom; to trample upon his members as the obscuring of all things, and not fit to live in the world,—what punishment can be too great for such men?

2nd. They have "counted the blood of the covenant," wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing. The blood of Christ, with which the covenant was purchased and sealed, and wherewith Christ himself was consecrated, or wherewith the apostate was sanctified, that is, baptised, visibly initiated into the new covenant by baptism, and admitted to the Lord's supper. Observe, There is a kind of sanctification which persons may partake of, and yet fall away. They may be distinguished by common gifts and graces, by an outward profession, by a form of godliness, a course of duties, and a set of privileges, and yet fall away finally. Men that have seemed before to have the blood of Christ in high esteem may come to account it an unholy thing; no better than the blood of a malefactor, though it was the world's ransom, and every drop of it of infinite value.

3rd. They have "done despite unto the Spirit of grace." The Spirit that is graciously given to men, and that works grace wherever it is; the Spirit of grace, that should be regarded and attended to with the greatest care. This Spirit they have grieved, resisted, quenched; yea, done despite to him, which is the highest act of wickedness, and makes the case of the sinner desperate, refusing to have the gospel salvation applied to him. Now he leaves it to the consciences of all, appeals to universal reason and equity, whether such aggravated crimes ought not to receive a suitable punishment, a sorer punishment than they had that died without mercy? But what punishment can be sorer than to die without mercy? I answer, To die by mercy, by that mercy and grace which they have despised. How dreadful is the case, when not only the justice of God, but his abused grace and mercy, call for vengeance!

4. From the description we have in the Scripture of the nature of God's vindictive justice, ver. 30. We know that he has said, "Vengeance is mine," &c. This is taken out of Ps. xciv. 1, "Vengeance belongs unto me," the terrors of the Lord are known both by revelation and reason. Vindictive justice is a glorious, though terrible attribute of God; it belongs to him, and he will use and execute it upon the heads of such sinners as despise his grace; he will avenge himself, and his Son, and Spirit, and covenant, upon apostates. And how dreadful then will their case be! The other quotation is from Deu. xxxii. 36, "The Lord will judge his people;" he will search and try his visible church, and will discover and detect those that say they are Jews, but are not; he will make them of the synagogue of Satan, and separate the precious from the vile, and will punish the sinners in Zion with the greatest severity. Now that they "know him who hath said, Vengeance belongeth to me, I will recompense," must needs conclude as the apostle does, ver. 31, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." They that know the joy that results from the favour of God can thereby judge of the power and dread of his vindictive wrath. Observe here what will be the eternal misery of impenitent sinners and apostates; they shall "fall into the hands of the living God." Their punishment shall come from God's own hand; he takes them into the hand of his justice. He will deal with them himself; their greatest misery will be the immediate impressions of Divine wrath on the soul. When he punishes them by creatures, the instrument abates something of the force of the blow; but when he does it by his own hand it is infinite misery. This they shall have at God's hand. They shall lie down in sorrow, their destruction shall come from his glorious, powerful presence. When they make their woful bed in hell, they will find that God is there, and his presence will be their greatest terror and torment. And he is a living God; he lives for ever, and will punish for ever.

5. He presses them to perseverance, by putting them in mind of their former sufferings for Christ; ver. 32, "But call to mind the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions." In the early days of the Gospel there was a very hot persecution raised up against the professors of the Christian religion; and the believing Hebrews had their share of it. He would have them to remember, 1st. When they had suffered. In former days, after they were illuminated; that is, as soon as God had breathed life into their souls, and caused Divine light to spring up in their minds, and taken them into his favour and covenant; then earth and hell combined all their force against them. Here observe, A natural state is a dark state, and those that continue in that state meet with no disturbance from Satan and the world; but a state of grace is a state of light, and therefore the powers of darkness will violently oppose it. They that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution.

2nd. What they suffered. They endured a great fight of afflictions. Many and various afflictions united together against them, and they had a great conflict with them. Many are the troubles of the righteous. First. They were afflicted in themselves. In their own person; they were made "gazing-stocks, spectacles to the world, angels and men," 1 Cor. iv. 9. In their names and reputation, ver. 33. By many reproaches Christians ought to value their reputation, and they do so especially because the reputation of religion is concerned; this makes reproach a great affliction. They were afflicted in their estates, by the spoiling of their goods by fines and forfeitures. Secondly. They were afflicted in the afflictions of their brethren; "Partly while ye became companions" of those that were so used. The Christian spirit is a sympathising spirit, not a selfish spirit but a compassionate spirit; it makes every Christian's suffering our own, puts us upon pitying them, visiting them, helping them, and pleading for them. Christians are one body, animated by one spirit, embarked in one common cause and interest, and are the children of that God who is afflicted in all the afflictions of his people. If one member of the body suffers, all the rest suffer with it. And the apostle takes particular notice how they had sympathised with him; ver. 34, "Ye had compassion on me in my bonds." We must thankfully acknowledge the compassions our Christian friends have shewed for us under our afflictions.

3rd. How they had suffered. They had been mightily supported under their former sufferings; they took their sufferings patiently, and not only so, but joyfully received it from God as a favour and honour conferred upon them, that they should be thought worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Christ. God can strengthen his suffering people with all might in the inner man, to all patience and long-suffering, and that with joyfulness, Col. i. 11.

4th. What it was that enabled them thus to bear up under their sufferings. They knew in themselves that they had in heaven a better and a more enduring substance. Observe, First. The happiness of the saints in heaven is substance, crown of the thought, verses 1—10; in verses 11—14 the ever-during throne, after a once for ever completed sacrifice, occupies the foreground" (Delitzsch, in Lange). "He hath perfected those who are being sanctified;" such is the force of the original. All those who are being from day to day brought into a holy relation to God have been perfected by the one offering of Christ; that is, they are in a perfect condition, though not perfected in that condition.

x. 20, 21. "Consecrated;" or "inaugurated for us," &c.

x. 34. "Compassion of me," &c.: some MSS. read, "For ye both had compassion of them that were in bonds, and took," &c. Most authorities omit "in heaven" from the last clause of the verse. Alford renders, "ye have of your own a better," &c.

x. 36. "Ye have need of patience," &c.: or, "Ye have need of endurance, that ye may do the will of God, and receive the promise." The English, "that after ye have done," does not yield so clear a sense. The sentence, however, will admit of either rendering.

something of real weight and worth; all things here are but shadows. Secondly. It is a better substance than any thing they can have or lose here. Thirdly. It is an enduring substance; it will outlive time, and run parallel with eternity. They can never spend it; their enemies can never take it from them as they did their earthly goods. Fourthly. This will make a rich amends for all they can lose and suffer here. In heaven they shall have a better life, a better estate, better liberty, better society, better hearts, better work, every thing better. Fifthly. That Christians should know this in themselves; they should get the assurance of it in themselves. The Spirit of God witnessing with their spirits for the assured knowledge of this will help them to endure any fight of afflictions they may be encountered with in this world.

6. He presses them to persevere from that recompence of reward that waited for all faithful Christians; ver. 35, "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompence of reward." Where, 1st. He exhorts them not to cast away their confidence, that is, their holy courage and boldness, but to hold fast that profession for which they had suffered so much before, and borne those sufferings so well. 2nd. He encourages them to this by assuring them that the reward of their holy confidence would be very great; it carries a present reward in it, in holy peace and joy, and much of God's presence and his power visiting upon them; and it shall have a great recompence of reward hereafter. 3rd. He shews them how necessary a grace the patience is in our present state; ver. 36, "Ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God ye might receive the promise;" that is, this promised reward. Observe, The greatest part of the saints' happiness is in promise; that they must first do the will of God before they receive the promise, and that after they have done the will of God they have need of patience to wait for the time when the promise shall be fulfilled; they have need of patience to live till God calls them away. It is a trial of the patience of Christians to be content to live after their work is done, and to stay for the reward till God's time to give it them is come. We must be God's waiting servants when we can be no longer his working servants; they that have had and exercised much patience already must have and exercise more till they die. 4th. To help their patience he assures them of the near approach of Christ's coming to deliver and to reward them; ver. 37, "For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." He will soon come to them at death, and put an end to all their sufferings, and give them a crown of life. He will soon come to judgment, and put an end to the sufferings of the whole church, (all his mystical body,) and give them an ample and glorious reward in the most public manner. There is an appointed time for both, and beyond that time he will not tarry, Hab. ii. 3. The Christian's present conflict may be sharp, but it will be soon over.

7. And lastly, he presses them to perseverance by telling them that this is the distinguishing character, and will be the happiness, whereas apostasy is the reproach, and will be the ruin, of all that are guilty of it; ver. 38, 39, "Now the just shall live by faith," &c. 1st. It is the honourable character of just men that, in times of the greatest afflictions, they can live by faith; they can live upon the assured persuasion they have of the truth of God's promises. Faith puts life and vigour into them; they can trust God, and live upon him, and wait his time; and as their faith maintains their spiritual life now, it shall be crowned with eternal life hereafter. 2nd. That apostasy is the mark of the brand of those in whom God takes no pleasure; and it is a cause of God's severe displeasure and anger. God never was pleased with the formal profession, and external duties and services, of such as do not persevere; he saw the hypocrisy of their hearts then, and he is greatly provoked when their formality in religion ends in an open apostasy from religion; he beholds them with great displeasure; they are an offence to him. 3rd. The apostle concludes with declaring his good hope concerning himself and these Hebrews, that they should not forfeit the character and happiness of the just, and fall under the brand and misery of the wicked; ver. 39, "But we are not," &c., as if he had said, I hope we are not of them who draw back, I hope you and I, who have met with great trials already, and have been supported under them by the grace of God strengthening our faith, shall not be at any time left to ourselves, to draw back to perdition; but that God will still keep us by his mighty power through faith unto salvation. Observe, First. Professors may go a great way, and after all draw back; and that drawing back from God is drawing on to perdition. The farther we depart from God, the nearer we approach to ruin. Secondly. Those that have been kept faithful in great trials for the time past have reason to hope that the same grace shall be sufficient to help them still to live by faith till they receive the end of their faith and patience, even the salvation of their souls. If we live by faith, and die in faith, our souls are safe for ever.

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle having in the close of the foregoing chapter recommended the grace of faith and a life of faith, as the best preservative against apostasy, he now enlarges upon the nature and fruits of this excellent grace. I. The nature of it, and the honour it reflects upon all that live in the exercise of it, ver. 1—3. II. The great examples we have in the Old Testament of those that lived by faith, and did and suffered extraordinary things by the strength of this grace, ver. 4—38. And, III. The advantages that we have in the Gospel for the exercise of this grace above what they had that lived in the times of the Old Testament, ver. 39, 40.

Here we have, First. A definition or description of the grace of faith in two parts.

1. It "is the substance of things hoped for." Faith and hope go together; and the same things that are the object of our hope are the object of our faith. It is a firm persuasion and expectation that God will perform all that he has promised to us in Christ; and this persuasion is so strong that it gives the soul a kind of possession and present fruition of those things, gives them a subsistence in the soul by the first-fruits and foretastes of them. So that believers in the exercise of faith are filled with joy unspeakable, and full of glory. Christ dwells in the soul by faith, and the soul is filled with the fulness of God; as far as his present measure will admit, he experiences a substantial reality in the objects of faith.

2. It is "the evidence of things not seen." Faith demonstrates to the eye of the mind the reality of those things that cannot be discerned by the eye of the body. Faith is the firm assent of the soul to the Divine revelation, and every part of it, and sets to its seal that God is true. It is a full approbation of all that God has revealed as holy, just, and good, and it helps the soul to make application of all to itself, with suitable affections and endeavours, and so it is designed to serve the believer instead of sight, and to be to the soul all that the senses are to the body; that faith is but opinion or fancy that does not realize invisible things to the soul, and excite the soul to act agreeably to the nature and importance of them.

[In describing faith, he ascribeth unto it the property of the word which faith layeth hold upon; for it is the word properly which is the substance of things not seen. Then there is such an union betwixt faith and the word, that what the word is in force and effect that faith is said to be in force and effect also. As faith honoureth the word, so God honoureth faith, in giving it the like commendation for force with the word. What is the original of the being and existence of any thing, but this? God willeth it to be, or promiseth that it shall come to pass, or commandeth that it may be. Therefore, let faith get a hold of the promise or word, and it taketh hold of the thing promised by the root thereof. And in the hand of faith doth truth bud out, and flourish unto the ripe fruit of full satisfaction in performance.]

Secondly. An account of the honour it reflects upon all those that have lived in the exercise of it; ver. 2. "By it the elders obtained a good report;" the ancient believers that lived in the first ages of the world. Observe,

1. That true faith is an old grace, and has the best plea to antiquity. It is not a new invention, a modern fancy; it is a grace that has been planted in the soul of man ever since the covenant of grace was published in the world; and it has been practised from the beginning of the revelation; the eldest and best men that ever were in the world were believers.

2. That their faith was their honour. It reflected honour upon them; they were an honour to their faith, and their faith was an honour to them. It put them upon doing the things that were of good report, and God has taken care that a record shall be kept, and report made, of the excellent things they did in the strength of this grace. The genuine actings of faith will bear to be reported, and deserve to be reported, and will, when reported, redound to the honour of true believers.

Thirdly. We have here one of the first acts and articles of faith, which has a great influence on all the rest, and which is common to all believers in every age and part of the world, and that is, the creation of the worlds by the word of God, not out of pre-existent matter, but out of nothing, ver. 3. The grace of faith has a retrospect as well as prospect; it looks not only forward to the end of the world, but back to the beginning of the world. By faith we understand much more of the formation of the world than ever could be understood by the naked eye of natural reason. Faith is not a force upon the understanding, but a friend and a help to it. Now what does faith give us to understand concerning the worlds, that is, the upper, middle, and lower regions of the universe? 1. That these worlds were not eternal, nor did they produce themselves, but they were made by another. 2. That the Maker of the worlds is God; he is the Maker of all things; and whoever is so must be God. 3. That he made the world with great exactness; it was a framed work, in every thing duly adapted and disposed to answer its end, and to express the perfections of the Creator. 4. That God made the world by his word; that is, by his essential wisdom, and eternal Son, and by his active will, saying, Let it be done, and it was done, Ps. xxxiii. 9. 5. That the world was thus framed out of nothing, out of no pre-existent matter, contrary to the received maxim, that out of nothing nothing can be made, which, though true of created power, can have no place with God, who can call things that are not as if they were, and command them into being. These things we understand by faith. The Bible gives us the truest and most exact account of the origin of all things, and we are to believe it, and not to wrest or run down the Scripture account of the creation because it does not suit with some fantastical hypotheses of our own, which has been in some learned, but conceited men, the first remarkable step towards infidelity, and has led them into many more. [6. The works of creation stand upon no better ground than God's word. This sentence, "God shall make our vile bodies like unto the glorious body of Christ Jesus," is as powerful to make us so as this sentence, "Let there be light," was powerful to create light when there was none before.]

4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh. 5 By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. 6 But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. 7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith. 8 By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he

x. 37. "He that shall come:" rather, "he that is coming," "the coming one."

xi. 1. "Substance:" the basis or foundation, the substantial ground, the confidence in blessings hoped for. "The evidence:" or "the conviction."

xi. 2. "By it:" or "in it," or "therein." "Obtained a good report" sounds somewhat ambiguous: "in this (i.e., faith) they were attested, or had testimony borne to them."

xi. 3. "We understand:" apprehend intellectually. "That things which," &c.: the best authorities have the singular number—"that that which is seen was not made," &c.

xi. 4. "Abel . . . a more excellent sacrifice" (compare Gen. iv. 7). The difference of spirit in which the two offerings were made caused the diversity of acceptance. Faith was the motive power in the case of Abel, and his offering may have been in consequence a better and fuller one. Some have thought that Abel brought both went. 9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: 10 For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. 11 Through faith also Sara herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised. 12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable. 13 These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. 14 For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. 15 And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. 16 But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city. 17 By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, 18 Of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called: 19 Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure.

The apostle, having given us a more general account of the grace of faith, now proceeds to set before us some illustrious examples of it in the Old Testament times; and these may be divided into two classes:—1. Those whose names are not only mentioned, but the particular exercise and actings of their faith specified. 2. Those whose names are barely mentioned, and an account given in general of the exploits of their faith, which it is left to the reader to accommodate, and apply to the particular persons, from what he gathers up in the sacred story.

We have here those whose names are not only mentioned, but the particular trials and actings of their faith subjoined; and in these verses are included the several instances, from Abel to Isaac.

First. The leading instance and example of faith here recorded is that of Abel. It is observable the Spirit of God has not thought fit to say anything here of the faith of our first parents; and yet the church of God has generally by a pious charity taken it for granted that God gave them repentance and faith in the promised seed; that he instructed them in the mystery of sacrificing, and that they instructed their children in it, and that they found mercy with God after they had ruined themselves and all their posterity. But God has left the matter still under some doubt, as a warning to all that have great talents given to them, and a great trust reposed in them, that they do not prove unfaithful, since God would not enrol our first parents among the number of believers in this blessed calendar. It begins with Abel, one of the first saints, and the first martyr for religion of all the sons of Adam; one that lived by faith and died for it, and therefore a fit pattern for the Hebrews to imitate. Observe,

1. What Abel did by faith. He offered up "a more excellent sacrifice than Cain," a "more full and perfect sacrifice," ἁλίστην θυσίαν. Hence learn, 1st. That after the fall God opened a new way for the children of men to return to him in religious worship. This is one of the first instances that is upon record of fallen men going in to worship God, and it was a wonder of mercy that all intercourse between God and man was not cut off by the fall. 2nd. That after the fall God must be worshipped by sacrifices, a way of worship which carries in it a confession of sin, and of the desert of sin, and a profession of faith in a Redeemer, who was to be a ransom for the souls of men. 3rd. That from the beginning of this kind there has been a remarkable difference between the worshippers. Here were two persons, brethren: both go in to worship God, and yet there was a vast difference; Cain was the elder brother, but Abel has the preference. It is not seniority of birth, but grace, that makes men truly honourable. The difference is observable in both their persons,—Abel was an upright person, a righteous man, a true believer; Cain was a formalist, had not a principle of special grace; and in their principles,—Abel acted under the power of faith, Cain only from the force of education or natural conscience; and there was a very observable difference in their offerings,—Abel brought a sacrifice of atonement, brought of the firstlings of the flock, acknowledging himself to be a sinner that deserved to die, and only hoped for mercy through the great sacrifice. Cain brought only a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a mere thank offering, the fruit of the ground, which might, and perhaps must, have been offered in innocence. Here was no confession of sin, no regard to the ransom; this was an essential defect in Cain's offering. There will always be a difference between those that worship the true God; some will compass him about with lies, others will be faithful with the saints. Some, like the Pharisee, will lean to their own righteousness; others, like the publican, will confess their sin, and cast themselves upon the mercy of God in Christ.

2. What Abel gained by his faith. The original record is in Gen. iv. 4, "God had respect to Abel and to his offering;" first to his person as gracious, then to his offering as proceeding from grace, especially from the grace of faith. In this place we are told that he obtained by his faith some special advantages; as, 1st. Witness that he was righteous, a justified, sanctified, and accepted person; this very probably was attested by fire from heaven kindling and consuming his sacrifice. 2nd. God gave witness to the righteousness of his person, by testifying his acceptance of his gifts. When the fire, an emblem of God's justice, accepted the offering, it was a sign that the mercy of God accepted the offer, for the sake of the great sacrifice. 3rd. By it he being dead yet speaketh. He had the honour to leave behind him an instructive speaking case, and what does it speak to us? What should we learn from it? First. That fallen man has leave to go in to worship God with hope of acceptance. Secondly. That if our persons and offerings be accepted, it must be through faith in the Messiah. Thirdly. That acceptance with God is a peculiar and distinguishing favour. Fourthly. That those who obtain this favour from God must expect the envy and malice of the world. Fifthly. That God will not suffer the injuries done to his people to remain unpunished, nor their sufferings unrewarded. These are very good and useful instructions, and yet the blood of sprinkling speaketh better things than that of Abel. Sixthly. That God would not suffer Abel's faith to die with him, but would raise up others, that should obtain like precious faith; and so he did in a little time, for in the next verse we read,

Secondly. Of the faith of Enoch, ver. 5. He is the second of those elders that through faith have obtained a good report. And observe,

1. What is here reported of him. Why, in this place and in Gen. v. 22, &c., we read, 1st. That he walked with God; that is, that he was really, eminently, actively, progressively and perseveringly religious in his conformity to God, communion with God, and complacency in God. 2nd. That "he was translated, that he should not see death," nor any part of him be found upon earth; for God took him, soul and body, into heaven, as he will do those of the saints that shall be found alive at his second coming. 3rd. That "before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God." He had the evidence of it in his own conscience, and the Spirit of God witnessed with his spirit. Those that by faith walk with God in a sinful world are pleasing to him, and he will give them marks of his favour, and put honour upon them.

2. What is here said of his faith, ver. 6. Why, it is said, that without this faith it is impossible to please God, without such a faith as helps us to walk with God, an active faith; and that we cannot come to God unless we "believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him." 1st. He must believe that God is, and that he is what he is, what he has revealed himself to be in the Scripture, that is, a Being of infinite perfections, subsisting in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Observe. The practical belief of the existence of God, as revealed in the word, would be a powerful awe-band upon our souls,—a bridle of restraint to keep us from sin, and a spur of constraint to put us upon all manner of gospel obedience. 2nd. That he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. Here observe, First. By the fall we have lost God. We have lost the Divine light, life, love, likeness, and communion. Secondly. God is again to be found of us through Christ, the second Adam. Thirdly. God has prescribed means and ways wherein he may be found; to wit, a strict attention to his oracles, attendance on his ordinances, and ministers duly discharging their office and associating with his people, observing his providential conduct, and in all things humbly waiting for his gracious presence. Fourthly. They that would find God in these ways of his must seek him diligently; they must seek early, earnestly, and perseveringly; then shall they seek him and find him, if they seek him with all their heart; and when once they have found him, as their reconciled God, they will never repent the pains they have spent in seeking after him.

Thirdly. The faith of Noah, ver. 7. Observe,

1. The ground of Noah's faith, and that was a warning he had received from God of things as yet not seen. He had a Divine revelation; whether by voice or vision does not appear, but it was such as carried in it its own evidence. He was forewarned of things not seen as yet, that is, of a great and severe judgment, such as the world had never yet seen, and of which in the course of second causes there was not yet the least sign. This secret warning he was to communicate to the world, who would be sure both to despise him and his message. God usually warns sinners before he strikes, and where his warnings are slighted the blow will fall the heavier.

2. The actings of Noah's faith, and the influence it had both upon his mind and practice. 1st. Upon his mind. It impressed his soul with a fear of God's judgments; he was proved with fear. Faith first influences our affections, then our actions; and faith works upon those affections that are suitable to the matter revealed. If it be some good thing, faith stirs up love and desire; if some evil thing, faith stirs up fear. 2nd. His faith influenced his practice. His fear thus excited by believing God's threatening, moved him to prepare an ark, in which, no doubt, he met with the scorn and reproaches of a wicked generation. He did not dispute with God why he should make an ark, nor how it should be capable of containing what was to be lodged in it, nor how such a vessel could possibly weather out so great a storm. His Father silenced all objections, and set him to work in earnest. 3rd. The blessed fruits and rewards of Noah's faith. First. Hereby himself and his house were saved, when a whole world of sinners were perishing about them. God saved his family for his sake; it was well for them that they were Noah's sons and daughters; it was well for those women that they married into Noah's family; perhaps they might have married to great estates in other families, but then they had been drowned. We used to say, It is good to be akin to an estate, but surely it is good to be akin to the covenant. Secondly. Hereby he judged and "condemned the world." His holy fear condemned their security and vain confidence, his faith condemned their unbelief, his obedience their contempt and rebellion. Good examples will either convert sinners or condemn them. There is something very convincing in a life of strict holiness and regard to God; it commends itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God, and they are judged by it. This is the best way the people of God can take to condemn the wicked; not by harsh and censorious language, but by a holy, exemplary conversation. Thirdly. Hereby he became "heir of the righteousness which is by faith." 1st. He was possessed of a true justifying righteousness; he was heir to it. And, 2nd. This his right of inheritance was through faith in Christ as a member of Christ, a child of God, and if a child then an heir. His righteousness was relative, resulting from his adoption through faith in the promised seed. As ever we expect to be justified and saved in "the great and terrible day of the Lord," let us now prepare an ark, secure an interest in Christ, and in the ark of the covenant, and do it speedily, before the door be shut, for there is not salvation in any other.

Fourthly. The faith of Abraham, the friend of God, and father of the faithful, in whom the Hebrews boasted, and from whom they derived their pedigree and privileges. And therefore the apostle, that he might both please and profit them, enlarges more upon the heroic achievements of Abraham's faith than any other of the patriarchs; and in the midst of his account of the faith of fruits of the ground and the firstlings of his flock. This seems at least doubtful. "The view so often expressed that Abel's bloody sacrifice resulted from a more profound religious apprehension than that of Cain, which was 'without shedding of blood,' seems to agree with the general bearing of the text" (Kurtz).

xi. 7. "Moved with fear:" the reference is rather to the foresight with which Noah, in faith, proceeded to his preparations. Alford translates, "taking forethought."

xi. 11. "Through faith also Sara herself:" the emphatic addition of the word "herself" serves to recall the fact that Sarah at first doubted the promise.

xi. 13. "And were persuaded of them:" these words are rejected by the unanimous testimony of the best MSS. "And embraced them:" or hailed, greeted, saluted them. The image is of saluting from a distance one's native land.

xi. 14. "That they seek a country:" Alford renders "a home"

Abraham he inserts the story of Sarah's faith, whose daughters those women are that continue to do well. Observe,

1. The ground of Abraham's faith; and that was the call and promise of God, ver. 8.

1st. This call, though it was a very trying call, yet it was the call of God, and therefore a sufficient ground for faith and rule of obedience. The manner in which he was called Stephen relates in Acts vii. 2, 3, "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee." This was an effectual call, by which he was converted from the idolatry of his father's house, Gen. xii. 1. This call was renewed after his father's death in Charran. Observe, First. The grace of God is absolutely free in taking some of the worst, and making them the best of men. Secondly. That God must come to us before we come to him. Thirdly. That in calling and converting sinners God appears as a God of glory, and works a glorious work in the soul. Fourthly. That that calls us not only to leave sin, but sinful company, and whatever is inconsistent with our devotedness to him. Fifthly. That we need not only to be called to set out well, but to go on well. Sixthly. That he will not have his people take up that rest any where short of the heavenly Canaan.

2nd. The promise of God. God promised Abraham that the place he was called to he should afterwards receive for an inheritance; after awhile he should have the heavenly Canaan for his inheritance, and in process of time his posterity should inherit the earthly Canaan. Observe here, First. God calls his people to an inheritance; by his effectual call he makes them children, and so heirs. Secondly. That this inheritance is not immediately possessed by them, but they must wait some time for it. But the promise is sure, and shall have its seasonable accomplishment. Thirdly. The faith of parents often procures blessings for their posterity.

2. The exercise of Abraham's faith. He yielded an implicit regard to the call of God. 1st. "He went out, not knowing whither he went." He put himself into the hand of God, to send him whithersoever he pleased: he subscribed to God's wisdom, as fittest to direct, and submitted to his will, as fittest to determine every thing that concerned him. Implicit faith and obedience are due to God, and to him only; all that are effectually called resign up their own will and wisdom to the will and wisdom of God, and it is their wisdom to do so; though they know not always their way, yet they know their guide, and that satisfies them. 2nd. "He sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country." This was an exercise of his faith. Observe, First. How Canaan is called the land of promise, because yet only promised, not possessed. Secondly. How Abraham lived in Canaan, not as heir and proprietor, but as a sojourner only. He did not serve an ejection or raise a war against the old inhabitants to dispossess them, but contented himself to live as a stranger, to bear their unkindnesses patiently, and to receive any favours from them thankfully, and to keep his heart fixed upon his home, the heavenly Canaan. 3rd. He dwelt in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, heirs with him of the same promise. He lived there in an ambulatory moving condition, living in a daily readiness for his remove. And thus should we all live in this world. He had good company with him, and they were a great comfort to him in his sojourning state. Abraham lived till Isaac was seventy-five years old, and Jacob fifteen. Isaac and Jacob were heirs of the same promise; for the promise was renewed to Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 3, and to Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 13. All the saints are heirs of the same promise; the promise is made to believers and their children, and to as many as the Lord our God shall call. And it is pleasant to see parents and children sojourning together in this world as heirs of the heavenly inheritance.

3. The supports of Abraham's faith; ver. 10. "He looked for a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Observe here, 1st. The description given of heaven. It is a city, a regular society, well established, well defended, and well supplied; it is a city that hath foundations, even the immutable purposes and almighty power of God, the infinite merits and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ, the promises of an everlasting covenant, its own purity, and the perfection of its inhabitants. And it is a city "whose builder and maker is God." He contrived the model; he accordingly made it, and he has laid open a new and living way into it, and prepared it for his people; and he puts them into possession of it, and prefers them in it, and is himself the substance and felicity of it. 2nd. Observe the due regard that Abraham had to this heavenly city. He looked for it; he believed there was such a state; he waited for it, and in the mean time he conversed in it by faith; he had raised and rejoicing hopes that in God's time and way he should be brought safely to it. 3rd. The influence this had upon his present conversation. It was a support to him under all the trials of his sojourning state, helped him patiently to bear all the inconveniences of it, and actively to discharge all the duties of it, persevering therein unto the end.

Fifthly. In the midst of the story of Abraham we have inserted an account of the faith of Sarah. Here observe,

1. The difficulties of Sarah's faith, which were very great. As, 1st. The prevalence of unbelief for a time; she laughed at the promise, as impossible to be made good. 2nd. She had gone out of the way of her duty through unbelief, in putting Abraham upon taking Hagar to his bed, that he might have a posterity. Now this sin of hers would make it more difficult for her to act by faith afterwards. 3rd. The great improbability of the thing promised, that she should be the mother of a child, when she was of sterile constitution naturally, and now past the prolific age.

2. The actings of her faith. Her unbelief is pardoned and forgotten, but her faith prevailed, and is recorded; "She judged him faithful who had promised," ver. 11. She received the promise as the promise of God; and, being convinced of that, she truly judged he both could and would perform it, how impossible soever it might seem to reason; for the faithfulness of God will not suffer him to deceive his people.

3. The fruits and rewards of her faith. 1st. "She received strength to conceive seed." The strength of nature as well as grace is from God; he can make the barren soul fruitful as well as the barren womb. 2nd. She "was delivered of a child," a man child, a child of the promise, the comfort of his parents' advanced years, and the hope of future ages. 3rd. From them, by this son, sprang a numerous progeny of illustrious persons, "as the stars of the sky," ver. 12; a great, powerful, and renowned nation above all the rest in the world; and a nation of saints, the peculiar church and people of God; and, which was the highest honour and reward of all, of these, according to the flesh, the Messiah came, who is over all, God blessed for evermore.

Sixthly. The apostle proceeds to make mention of the faith of the other patriarchs, Isaac and Jacob, and the rest of this happy family, ver. 13. Where observe, 1. The trial of their faith in the imperfection of their present state. They had not received the promises; that is, they had not received the things promised, they had not yet been put into possession of Canaan, they had not yet seen their numerous issue, they had not seen Christ in the flesh. Observe, 1st. Many that are interested in the promises do not presently receive the things promised. 2nd. That one imperfection of the present state of the saints on earth is, that their happiness lies more in promise and reversion than in actual enjoyment of possession. The gospel state is much more perfect than the patriarchal, because more of the promises are now fulfilled. The heavenly state will be most perfect of all; for there all the promises will have their full accomplishment.

2. The actings of their faith during this imperfect state of things. Though they had not received the promises, yet, 1st. They saw them afar off. Faith has a clear and a strong eye, and can see promised mercies at a great distance. Abraham saw Christ's day when it was afar off, and rejoiced, Jno. viii. 56. 2nd. They were persuaded of them that they were true, and should be fulfilled. Faith sets to its seal that "God is true," and thereby settles and satisfies the soul. 3rd. They embraced them. Their faith was a faith of consent. Faith has a long arm, and can lay hold of blessings at a great distance; can make them present, can love them, and rejoice in them, and thus antedate the enjoyment of them. 4th. They "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth." Observe, First. Their condition; "Strangers and pilgrims." They are strangers as saints, whose home is heaven; they are pilgrims as they are travelling towards their home, though oftentimes meanly and slowly. Secondly. Their acknowledgment of this their condition. They were not ashamed to own it; both their lips and their lives confessed their present condition; they expected little from the world, they cared not to engage much in it. They endeavoured to lay aside every weight, to gird up the loins of their minds, to mind their way, to keep company and pace with their fellow-travellers, looking for difficulties, and bearing them, and longing to get home. 5th. Hereby they declared plainly that they sought another country, ver. 14,—heaven, their own country; for their spiritual birth and breeding is from thence, and there are their best relations, and there is their inheritance. This country they seek; their designs are for it, their designs are after it, their discourse is about it; they diligently endeavour to clear up their title to it, to have their temper suited to it, to have their conversation in it, and to come to the enjoyment of it.

6th. They gave full proof of their sincerity in making such a confession; for, First. They were not "mindful of that country from whence they came," ver. 15. They did not hanker after the plenty and pleasures of it, nor regret and repent that they had left it; they had no desire to return to it. Note, Those that are once effectually and savingly called out of a sinful state have no mind to return into it again; they now know better things. Secondly. They did not take the opportunity that offered itself for their return. They might have had such an opportunity: they had time enough to return; they had natural strength to return; they knew the way; those with whom they sojourned would have been willing enough to have parted with them; their old friends would have been glad to receive them. They had sufficient to bear the charges of their journey; and flesh and blood, a corrupt counsellor, would be sometimes suggesting to them a return, but they steadfastly adhered to God and duty under all discouragements, and against all temptations to revolt from him; and so should all of us do. We shall not want opportunities to revolt from God; but we must shew the truth of our faith and profession by a steady adherence to him to the end of our days. Thirdly. Their sincerity appeared not only in not returning to their former country, but in desiring a better country, that is, a heavenly. Observe, 1st. The heavenly country is better than any upon earth. It is better situated, better stored with every thing that is good, better secured from every thing that is evil; the employments, the enjoyments, the society, and every thing in it, is better than the best in this world. 2nd. All true believers desire this better country. True faith draws forth sincere and fervent desires, and the stronger faith is the more fervent those desires will be. 7th. They died in the faith of those promises; not only lived by the faith of them, but died in the full persuasion that all the promises should be fulfilled to them and theirs, ver. 13. That faith held out to the last. By faith, when they were dying, they received the atonement; they acquiesced in the will of God; they quenched all the fiery darts of the devil; they overcame the terrors of death, disarmed it of its sting, and bade cheerful farewell to this world, and to all the comforts and crosses of it. These were the actings of their faith. Now observe,

3. The gracious and great reward of their faith, ver. 16. God is not ashamed to be their God, for he hath prepared for them a city. Note, 1st. God is the God of all true believers; faith gives them an interest in God, and in all his fulness. 2nd. He is called their God; he calls himself so; "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." And he gives them leave to call him so, and he gives them the Spirit of adoption to enable them to cry, "Abba, Father." 3rd. Notwithstanding their meanness by nature, vileness by sin, and the poverty of their outward condition, God is not ashamed to be called their God. Such is his condescension, such his love, to them; therefore let them never be ashamed of being called his people, nor of any of those that are truly so, how much soever despised in the world. Above all, let them take care that they be not a shame and reproach to their God, and so provoke him to be ashamed of them; but let them act so as to be to him for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory. 4th. As the proof of this, God has prepared for them a city, a happiness suitable to the relation into which he has taken them. For there is nothing in this world commensurate to the love of God, in being the God of his people; and if God neither could nor would give his people something better than this world affords he would be ashamed to be called their God. If he takes them into such a relation to himself he will provide for them accordingly. If he takes to himself the title of their God he will fully answer it, and act up to it. And he has prepared that for them in heaven that will fully answer this character and relation, so that it shall never be said to the reproach and dishonour of God that he has adopted a people to be his own children, and then taken no care to make a suitable provision for them. The consideration of this should inflame the affections, enlarge the desires, and excite the diligent endeavours of the people of God after this city that he has prepared for them.

Seventhly. Now, after the apostle has given this account of the faith of others, with Abraham, he returns to him again, and gives us an instance of the greatest trial and act of faith that stands upon record, either in the story of the father of the faithful or of any of his spiritual seed, and that was his offering up of Isaac; ver. 17, "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son." In this great example observe,

1. The trial and exercise of Abraham's faith. He was tried indeed. It is said, Gen. xxii. 1, "God in this tempted Abraham," not to sin, for so God tempteth no man, but only tried his faith and obedience to purpose. God had before this tempted or tried the faith of Abraham, when he called him away from his country and father's house; when by a famine he was forced out of Canaan into Egypt; when he was obliged to fight with five kings to rescue Lot; when Sarah was taken from him by Abimelech, and in many other instances. But this trial was greater than them all; he was commanded to offer up his son Isaac. Read the account of it, Gen. xxii. 2, and there you will find every word was a trial; "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Take thy son, not one of thy beasts or slaves, thine only son by Sarah, Isaac thy laughter, the child of thy joy and delight, whom thou lovest as thine own soul; take him away to a distant place, three days' journey, the land of Moriah; do not only leave him there, but offer in this verse and in verse 16. Some prefer "their country." The word is not simply expressive of any region or country, but that country with which their associations are united—"their fatherland."

xi. 19. "In a figure;" or "in a parable." "The true identification," says Alford, "of the parable is, I am persuaded, to be found in the figure under which Isaac was sacrificed, viz., the ram, as already hinted by Chrysostom. Abraham virtually sacrificed his son; God designated Isaac for the burnt-offering, but provided a ram in his stead. Under the figure of that ram Isaac was slain, being received back by his father in his proper person, risen from the death which he had undergone in and under the figure of the ram." This view is pronounced by some unnatural. Another view is to take "in a figure" as meaning "in a typical representation;" for Isaac was in a manner dead in his father's opinion and his own. "Abraham received him back from the altar on which he had virtually been

him for a burnt offering. A greater trial was never put upon any creature. The apostle here mentions some things that very much add to the greatness of this trial.

1st. He was put upon it after he had received the promises that this Isaac should build up his family, and that "in him his seed should be called," ver. 18, and that he should be one of the progenitors of the Messiah, and all nations blessed in him; so that in being called to offer up his Isaac he seemed to be called to destroy and cut off his own family, to cancel the promises of God, to prevent the coming of Christ, to destroy the whole world, to sacrifice his own soul and his hopes of salvation, and to cut off the church of God at one blow; a most terrible trial!

2nd. That this Isaac was his only begotten son by his wife Sarah, and the only one he was to have by her, and the only one that was to be the child and heir of the promise. Ishmael was to be put off with earthly greatness. Either the promises of a posterity, and of the Messiah, must be fulfilled by means of this son, or not at all; so that, besides his most tender affection to this his son, all his expectations were bound up in him, and if he perished, must perish with him. If Abraham had never so many sons, this was the only son that could convey to all nations the promised blessing; a son for whom he waited so long, received in so extraordinary a manner, upon whom his heart was set,—to have this son offered up as a sacrifice, and that by his own hand. It was a trial that would have overset the firmest and the strongest mind that ever informed a human body.

3. The actings of Abraham's faith in so great a trial. He obeyed; he offered up Isaac. He intentionally gave him up by his submissive soul to God, and was ready to have done it actually, according to the command of God; and he went as far in it as to the very critical moment, and would have gone through with it if God had not prevented him. Nothing could be more tender and moving than those words of Isaac, "My father, here is the wood, here is the fire, but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?" little thinking that he was to be the lamb; but Abraham knew it, and yet he went on with the great design.

4. The supports of his faith; and they must be very great, suitable to the greatness of the trial. He "accounted that God was able to raise him from the dead," ver. 19. His faith was supported by the sense he had of the mighty power of God, who was able to raise the dead; and he reasoned thus with himself, and so he resolved all his doubts. It does not appear that he had any expectation of being countermanded and prevented from offering up his son; the expectation of that would have spoiled the trial, and consequently the triumph, of his faith. But he knew that God was able to raise him from the dead; and he did believe that God would do so, since such great things depended upon this son, which must have failed if Isaac had not a farther life. Observe, 1st. God is able to raise the dead, to raise dead bodies, and to raise dead souls. 2nd. The belief of this will carry us through the greatest difficulties and trials that we can meet with. 3rd. It is our duty to be reasoning down our doubts and fears by the consideration of the almighty power of God.

4. The reward of his faith in this great trial, ver. 19. He received his son from the dead in a figure, in a parable. 1st. He received his son. He had parted with him to God, and God gave him back again. The best way to enjoy our comforts with comfort is, to resign them up to God; he will then return them, if not in kind, yet in kindness. 2nd. He received him from the dead, for he gave him up for dead; he was as a dead child to him, and the return was to him no less than a resurrection. 3rd. This was a figure or parable of something farther. It was a figure of the sacrifice and resurrection of Christ, of whom Isaac was a type. It was a figure and earnest of the glorious resurrection of all true believers, whose life is not lost, but hid with Christ in God. We come now to the faith of other Old Testament saints mentioned by name, and by the particular trials and actings of their faith.

20 By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come. 21 By faith Jacob, when he was a dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph; and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff. 22 By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones. 23 By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment. 24 By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; 25 Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; 26 Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompence of the reward. 27 By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible. 28 Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the firstborn should touch them. 29 By faith they passed through the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned. 30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days. 31 By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace.

In this roll of believers we have an account,

First. Of the faith of Isaac. Something of him we had before interwoven with the story of Abraham; here we have something of a distinct nature, that by faith he blessed his two sons, Jacob and Esau, "concerning things to come." Where observe,

1. The actings of his faith. He "blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come." He blessed them; that is, he resigned them up to God in covenant; he recommended God and religion to them; he prayed for them, and prophesied concerning them, what would be their condition, and the condition in times to come. The account we have of this in Gen. xxvii. Observe, 1st. Both Jacob and Esau were blessed as Isaac's children, at least as to temporal good things. It is a great privilege to be the offspring of good parents, and many times the wicked children of good parents fare the better in this world for their parents' sake, for things present are in the covenant; they are not the best things, and no man knoweth love or hatred by having or wanting such things. 2nd. That Jacob had the precedence and the principal blessing, which shews that it is grace and the new birth that exalts persons above their fellows, and qualifies them for the best blessings; and that it is owing to the sovereign free grace of God that in the same family one is taken and another left, one loved and the other hated, since all the race of Adam are by nature hateful to God; that if one has his portion in this world, and the other in the better world, it is God that makes the difference, for even the comforts of this life are more and better than any of the children of men deserve.

2. The difficulties Isaac's faith struggled with. 1st. He seemed to have forgotten how God had determined the matter at the birth of these his sons, Gen. xxv. 23. This should have been a rule to him all along, but he was rather swayed by natural affection and general custom, that gave the double portion of honour, affection, and advantage to the first-born. 2nd. He acted in this matter with some reluctance when he came to pronounce the blessing; Gen. xxvii. 33, "He trembled very exceedingly," and charged Jacob that he had subtly taken away Esau's blessing, ver. 33, 35. But for all this Isaac's faith recovered itself, and he ratified the blessing; "I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed." Rebecca and Jacob are not to be justified in the indirect means they used to obtain this blessing, but God will be justified in overruling even the sins of men to serve the purposes of his glory. Now, the faith of Isaac thus prevailing over his unbelief, it has pleased the God of Isaac to pass by the weakness of his faith, and commend the sincerity of it, and record him among the elders that "through faith have obtained a good report." We now go on to,

Secondly. The faith of Jacob, ver. 21, who "when he was dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph, and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff." There were a great many instances of the faith of Jacob; his life was a life of faith, and his faith met with great exercise. But it has pleased God to single two instances out of many of the faith of this patriarch, besides what has been already mentioned in the account of Abraham. Where observe,

1. The actings of his faith here mentioned, and they are two. 1st. He blessed both the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. First. He adopted them into the number of his own sons, and so into the congregation of Israel, though they were born in Egypt. And it is doubtless a great blessing to be joined to the visible church of God in profession and privilege, but more to be so in spirit and truth. Secondly. He made them both heads of different tribes, as if they had been his own immediate sons. Thirdly. He prayed for them, that they might both be blessed of God. Fourthly. He prophesied that they should be blessed; but, as before Isaac did, so now Jacob prefers the younger, Ephraim; and though Joseph had placed them so as that the right hand of his father should be laid on Manasseh the elder, Jacob wittingly laid it on Ephraim, and to this by Divine direction, for he could not see; to shew that the Gentile church, the younger, should have a more abundant blessing than the Jewish church, the elder. 2nd. "He worshipped, leaning on his staff;" that is, he praised God for what he had done for him, and for the prospect he had of approaching blessedness; and he prayed for those he was leaving behind him, that religion might live in his family when he was gone. He did this "leaning on the top of his staff;" not, as the papists dream, that he worshipped some image of God engraven on the head of his staff, but intimating to us his great natural weakness, that he was not able to support himself so far as to sit up in his bed without a staff, and yet that he would not make this an excuse for neglecting the worshipping of God; he would do it as well as he could with his body, as well as with his spirit, though he could not do it as well as he would. He shewed hereby his dependence upon God, and testified his condition here as a pilgrim with his staff, and his weariness of the world, and willingness to be at rest.

2. The time and season when Jacob thus acted his faith: "When he was dying." He lived by faith, and he died by faith and in faith. Observe, Though the grace of faith is of universal use throughout our whole lives, yet it is especially so when we come to die. Faith has its greatest work to do at last, to help the believers to finish well, to die to the Lord so as to honour him, by patience, hope, and joy, so as to leave a witness behind them of the truth of God's word, and the excellency of his ways, for the conviction and establishment of all that attend them in their dying moments. The best way in which parents can finish their course is, blessing their families, and worshipping their God. We are now come to,

Thirdly. The faith of Joseph, ver. 22. And here also we consider,

1. What he did by his faith. He "made mention of the departing of the children of Israel, and gave commandment concerning his bones;" the passage is out of Gen. l. 24, 25. Joseph was eminent for his faith, though he had not enjoyed the helps for it that the rest of his brethren had; he was sold into Egypt, he was tried by temptations, by sin, by persecution, for retaining his integrity; he was tried by preferment and power in the court of Pharaoh, and yet his faith held out, and carried him through to the last. 1st. He "made mention by faith of offered up" (Webster and Wilkinson, whose comment seems substantially to agree with the opinions of Bleek, Stier, De Wette, and Delitzsch).

xi. 21. "Leaning:" not expressed in the original. "He worshipped on the top of his staff." In Gen. xlvii. 31 we read that Jacob bowed himself upon the bed's head. "The Hebrew word, without the vowel points, means either 'bed' or 'staff.' The only distinction is in the vowel points, which do not exist in the more ancient MSS. . . .

It is quite possible that the meaning is, as the apostle quotes the passage, that after Joseph had sworn to bury him in Canaan, Jacob bowed himself upon the staff which had gone with him through all his wanderings (Gen. xxxii. 10), and so worshipped God. And this seems the more likely from the fact that it is not till after these things that one told Joseph, 'Behold, thy father is sick' (Gen. xlviii. 1), so that Jacob probably had not as yet taken to his bed" (Bishop Browne in "Speaker's Commentary"). May not, however, the words be the departing of the children of Israel," that the time should come when they should be delivered out of Egypt; and he did this both that he might ease them against the thoughts of settling in Egypt, which was now a place of misery and ease to them, and also that he might keep them from sinking under afflictivities and distresses which he foresaw were coming upon them there; and he does it to comfort himself, that though he should not live to see their deliverance, yet he could die in the faith of it. 2nd. He "gave commandment concerning his bones," that they should preserve them unburied in Egypt, till God should deliver them out of that house of bondage, and that then they should carry his bones along with them into Canaan, and deposit them there. Though the believers' chief concern is for their souls, yet they cannot wholly neglect their bodies, as being members of Christ, and parts of themselves, which shall at length be raised up, and be the happy companions of their glorified souls to all eternity. Now Joseph gave this order, not that he thought his being buried in Egypt would either prejudice his soul or prevent the resurrection of his body, (some of the rabbins fancied that all the Jews that were buried out of Canaan must be conveyed underground to Canaan before they could rise again;) but he gave this order to testify, First, That though he had lived and died in Egypt, yet he did not live and die an Egyptian, but an Israelite. Secondly, That he preferred a significant burial in Canaan before a magnificent one in Egypt. Thirdly, That he would go as far with his people as he could, though he could not go as far as he would. Fourthly, That he believed the resurrection of the body, and the communion that his soul should presently have with departed saints, as his body had with their dead bodies. Fifthly, To assure them that God would be with them in Egypt, and deliver them out of it in his own time and way.

2. When it was that the faith of Joseph acted after this manner, and that was, as in the case of Jacob, when dying, God often gives his people living comforts in dying moments, and, when he does, it is their duty, as they can, to communicate them to those about them for the glory of God, for the honour of religion, and for the good of their brethren and friends. We go on now to.

Fourthly. The faith of the parents of Moses, which is cited from Ex. ii. 3, &c. Where observe,

1. The acting of their faith. They hid their son three months. Though the mother of Moses is only mentioned in the history, yet, by what is here said, it seems his father not only consented to it, but consulted about it. It is a happy thing where yokefellow draw together in the yoke of faith, as the heirs of the grace of God; and when they do this in a religious concern for the good of their children, to preserve them not only from those that would destroy their lives, but corrupt their minds. Observe, Moses was persecuted betimes, and forced to be concealed; in this he was a type of Christ, who was persecuted almost as soon as he was born, and his parents forced to flee with him into Egypt for his preservation. It is a great mercy to be free from wicked laws and edicts; but when we are not, we must use all lawful means for our security. In this faith of Moses's parents there was a mixture of unbelief, but God was pleased to overlook it.

2. The reasons of their thus acting. No doubt natural affection could not but move them; but there was something farther, "They saw he was a proper child," "a goodly child," Ex. ii. 2, "exceeding fair," as in Acts vii. 20, ἀρετικὸν τέκνον, venustus Deo,—fair to God; there appeared in him something uncommon. The beauty of the Lord sat upon him, as a presage that he was born to great things, and that by conversing with God his face should shine, Ex. xxxiv. 29, and what bright and illustrious actions he should do for the deliverance of Israel, and how his name should shine in the sacred records. Sometimes, not always, the countenance is the index to the mind.

3. The prevalency of their faith over their fear. They were not afraid of the king's commandment, Ex. i. 22. That was a wicked and a cruel edict, that all the males of the Israelites should be destroyed in their infancy; and so the name of Israel must be destroyed out of the earth. But they did not so fear as presently to give up their child; they considered that if none of the males were preserved there would be an end and utter ruin of the church of God and the true religion, and that though in their present state of servitude and oppression one would praise the dead rather than the living, yet they believed God would preserve his people, and the time was coming when it would be worth the while for an Israelite to live. Somebody must hazard their own lives to preserve their children, and they were resolved to do it. They knew the king's commandment was evil in itself, contrary to the laws of God and nature, and therefore of no authority or obligation. Faith is a great preservative against the sinful, slavish fear of men, as it sets God before the soul, and shews the vanity of the creature, and its subordination to the will and power of God. The apostle next proceeds to,

Fifthly. The faith of Moses himself, ver. 24, 25, &c. Where observe,

1. An instance of his faith in conquering the world. 1st. He "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," whose founding he was, and her fondling too. She had adopted him for her son, and he refused it. Observe, First. How great a temptation Moses was under. Pharaoh's daughter is said to have been his only child, and was herself childless; and having found Moses, and saved him as she did, they resolved to take him and breed him up as her son; and so he stood fair to be in time king of Egypt, and he might thereby have been serviceable to Israel. He owed his life to this princess; and to refuse such kindness from her would look not only like ingratitude to her, but a neglect of providence, that seemed to intend his advancement, and his brethren's advantage. Secondly. How glorious was the triumph of his faith in so great a trial! He "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," lest he should undervalue the truer honour of being a son of Abraham, the father of the faithful; "He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," lest it should look like renouncing his religion as well as his relation to Israel; and no doubt both these he must have done if he had accepted this honour; he therefore nobly refuses it.

2nd. He chose rather "to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season," ver. 25. He was willing to take his lot with the people of God here, though it were a suffering lot, that he might have his portion with them hereafter, rather than to enjoy all the sensual, sinful pleasures of Pharaoh's court, which would be but for a season, and then punished with everlasting misery. Herein he acted rationally as well as religiously, and conquered the temptation to worldly pleasure, as he had done before to worldly preferment. Here observe, First. The pleasures of sin are and will be but short; they must either end in speedy repentance or ruin. Secondly. That the pleasures of this world, and especially those of a court, are too often the pleasures of sin; and they are always so when we cannot enjoy them without deserting God and his people; and a true believer will despise them when they are offered upon such terms. Thirdly. Suffering is to be chosen rather than sin, there being more evil in the least sin than there can be in the greatest suffering. Fourthly. It greatly alleviates the evil of suffering, when we suffer with the people of God, embarked in the same interest, and animated by the same spirit.

3rd. He esteemed "the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt," ver. 26. [Then, 1. Moses, and God's people in his time, did know Christ, else they could not have borne his cross and suffered for him. 2. Christianity is as old as true religion.] See how Moses weighed matters: in one scale he put the worst of religion, "the reproaches of Christ;" in the other scale the best of the world, "the treasures of Egypt;" and in his judgment, directed by faith, the worst of religion weighed down the best of the world. "The reproaches of the church of God are 'the reproaches of Christ,' who is and has ever been the head of the church. Now here Moses conquered the riches of the world, as before he had conquered its honours and pleasures. God's people are, and always have been, a reproached people. Christ accounts himself reproached in their reproaches; and while he thus interests himself in their reproaches they become riches, and greater riches than the treasures of the richest empire in the world; for Christ will reward them with a crown of glory that fades not away. Faith discerns this, and determines and acts accordingly.

Observe, First. That the circumstance of time is taken notice of when Moses, by his faith, gained this victory over the world, in all its honours, pleasures, and treasures; "When he was come to years," ver. 24; not only to years of discretion, but of experience, to the age of forty years, when he was great, or come to maturity. Some would take this as an extenuation of his victory, that he gained it so late, that he did not make this choice sooner; but it is rather an enhancement of the honour of his self-denial and victory over the world that he made this choice when he was grown ripe for judgment and enjoyment, able to know what he did, and why he did it. It was not the act of a child, that prefers counters to gold, but it proceeded from mature deliberation. It is an excellent thing for persons to be seriously religious when in the midst of worldly business and enjoyments; to despise the world when they are most capable of relishing and enjoying it.

Secondly. What it was that supported and strengthened the faith of Moses, to that degree as to enable him to gain such a victory of the world. "He had respect to the recompence of reward," that is, say some, the deliverance out of Egypt; but doubtless it means much more the glorious reward of faith and fidelity in the other world. Observe here, 1st. Heaven is a great reward, not only surpassing all our deservings, but all our conceptions. It is a reward suitable to the price paid for it, the blood of Christ, suitable to the perfections of God, and fully answering all his promises. It is a "recompence of reward," because given by a righteous Judge, for the righteousness of Christ, to righteous persons, according to the righteous rule of the covenant of grace. 2nd. Believers may and ought to have respect to this "recompence of reward." They should acquaint themselves with it, approve of it, and live in the daily and delightful expectation of it. And thus it will prove a landmark to direct their course, a loadstone to draw their hearts, a sword to conquer their enemies, and a spur to quicken them to duty; a cordial to refresh them under all the difficulties of doing and suffering work.

2. We have another instance of the faith of Moses, and that was in forsaking Egypt; ver. 27. "By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king." Twice Moses forsook Egypt, (1.) As a criminal, when the king's wrath was incensed against him for killing the Egyptian, where it is said he did fear, Ex. ii. 14, 15; not with a fear of despondency, but of discretion, to save his life. (2.) As a commander and ruler in Jeshurun, after God had employed him to humble Pharaoh, and make him willing to let Israel go. Observe here,

1st. The product of his faith. He forsook Egypt, and all its power and pleasure, and undertook the conduct of Israel out of it.

2nd. The prevalency of his faith. It raised him above the fear of the king's wrath; though he knew it was great, and levelled at him in particular that it marched at the head of a numerous host to pursue him, he was not dismayed, and he said to Israel, "Fear not," Ex. xiv. 13. Those that forsake Egypt must expect the wrath of men; but they need not fear it, for they are under the conduct of that God that is able to make the wrath of man to praise him, and restrain the remainder of it.

3rd. The principle upon which his faith acted in these his motions. "He endured, as seeing him that is invisible;" he bore up with invincible courage under all danger, and endured all the fatigue of his employment, which was very great, and this by seeing the invisible God. Observe, First. The God with whom we have to do is an invisible God; he is so to our senses, to the eye of the body; and this shews the folly of those that pretend to make images of God, whom no man hath seen or can see. Secondly. By faith we may see this invisible God; we may be fully assured of his existence, and of his providence, and of his gracious and powerful presence with us. Thirdly. Such a sight of God will enable believers to endure to the end, whatever they may meet with in the way.

3. We have yet another instance of the faith of Moses in keeping "the passover and sprinkling of blood," ver. 28. The account of this we have in Ex. xii. 13—23. Though all Israel kept this passover, yet it was by Moses that God delivered the institution of it; and, though it was a great mystery, Moses by faith both delivered it to the people and kept it that night in the house where he lodged. The passover was one of the most solemn institutions of the Old Testament, and a very significant type of Christ. The occasion of its first observation was extraordinary: it was in the same night that God slew the firstborn of the Egyptians; but though the Israelites lived among them, the destroying angel passed over their houses, and spared them and theirs. Now, to entitle them to this distinguishing favour, and to mark them out for it, a lamb must be slain, the blood of it must be sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop upon the lintel of the door, and on the two side-posts; and the flesh of the lamb must be roasted with fire, and it must be all of it eaten that very night with bitter herbs, in a travelling posture, their loins girt, their shoes on their feet, and their staff in their hand. This was accordingly done, and the destroying angel passed over them, and slew the first-born of the Egyptians. And this opened a way for the return of Abraham's posterity into the land of promise. The accommodation of this type is not difficult. 1st. Christ is that Lamb; he is our Passover, he was sacrificed for us. 2nd. His blood must be sprinkled; it must be applied to those who have the saving benefit of it. 3rd. It is only applied effectually to the Israelites, the chosen people of God. 4th. It is not owing to our inherent righteousness, or best performances, that we are saved from the wrath of God, but unto the blood of Christ and his imputed righteousness. If any of the families of Israel had neglected the sprinkling of this blood upon their doors, though they should have spent all the night in prayer, the destroying angel would have broken in upon them, and slain their first-born. 5th. Wherever this blood is applied, the soul receives a whole Christ by faith, and lives upon him. 6th. This true faith makes sin bitter to the soul, even while it receives the pardon and atonement. 7th. That all our spiritual privileges on earth should quicken us to set out early, and get forward in our way to heaven. 8th. Those that have been marked out must ever remember and acknowledge free and distinguishing grace.

Sixthly. The next instance of faith is that of the Israelites passing through the Red Sea, under the conduct of Moses their leader, ver. 29. The story we have in Ex. xiv.; where observe,

1. The preservation and safe passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, when there was no other way to escape from Pharaoh and his host, that were closely pursuing them; where we may observe, 1st. That Israel's danger was very great; an enraged enemy with chariots and horsemen behind them, steep expressive of the spiritual confidence of Jacob? His worshipped God, and that which sustained his faith was the recollection of the care of God through the long and evil years of his pilgrimage; and of this his staff was the emblem. (Compare Gen. xlviii. 16.)

xi. 23. "A proper child;" or that the child was beautiful, or comely, or bore marks of being designed for distinguished service. (Compare Acts vii. 20.) "This is mentioned as that which converted natural feeling into an act of faith" (Webster and Wilkinson).

xi 24. "When he was come to years;" "having become great" is the literal translation. Some have referred the expression to the wealth and rank which Moses had attained, but the majority of critics understand it of having reached a mature age. Verse 26 speaks of the worldly advantages he forsook.

xi. 31. "Believed not." Alford renders, "with them that were disobedient." The terms in which Rahab is described cannot be otherwise understood than as affirming her sinful life. It has, rocks and mountains on each hand, and the Red Sea before them. 2nd. That their deliverance was very glorious. By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land. The grace of faith will help us through all the dangers we meet with in our way to heaven.

2. The destruction of the Egyptians. They, presumptuously attempting to follow Israel through the Red Sea, being thus blinded and hardened to their ruin, were all drowned. Their rashness was great, and their ruin was grievous. When God judges, he will overcome; and it is plain that the destruction of sinners is of themselves.

Seventhly. The next instance of faith is that of the Israelites under Joshua their leader before the walls of Jericho. The story we have Jos. vi. 5; where observe,

1. The means prescribed of God to bring down the walls of Jericho; and that was, that they should compass the walls about once a day for seven days together, and seven times the last day, and that the priests should carry the ark when they compassed the walls about, and should blow with trumpets made of rams' horns, and sound a longer blast than before, and then all the people should shout, and the walls of Jericho should fall before them. Here was a great trial of their faith; the method prescribed seemed very improbable to answer such an end, and would doubtless expose them to the daily contempt of their enemies; the ark of God would seem to be in danger. But this was the way God commanded them to take, and he loves to do great things by small and contemptible means, that his own arm may be made bare.

2. The powerful success of the prescribed means. The walls of Jericho fell before them. This was a frontier town in the land of Canaan, the first that stood out against the Israelites. God was pleased, in this extraordinary manner, to slight and dismantle it, to magnify himself, to terrify the Canaanites, to strengthen the faith of the Israelites, and to exclude all boasting. God can and will, in his own time and way, cause all the powerful opposition that is made to his interest and glory to fall down; and the grace of faith is mighty, through God, for the pulling down of strongholds. He will make Babylon fall before the faith of his people; and when he has some great thing to do for them he raises up great and strong faith in them.

Eighthly. The next instance is the faith of Rahab, ver. 31. Among the noble army of believing worthies, bravely marshalled by the apostle, Rahab comes in the rear, to shew that God is no respecter of persons. Here consider,

1. Who this Rahab was. 1st. She was a Canaanite, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and had but little help for faith, and yet she was a believer. The power of Divine grace greatly appears when it works without the usual means of grace. 2nd. She was a harlot, and lived in a way of sin. She was not only a keeper of a public house, but a common woman of the town, and yet she believed. The greatness of sin, if truly repented of, shall be no bar to the pardoning mercy of God; Christ has saved the chief of sinners: "Where sin has abounded, grace has superabounded."

2. What she did by her faith. She "received the spies with peace," which were the men that Joshua had sent to spy out Jericho, Jos. ii. 6, 7. She not only bade them welcome, but she concealed them from their enemies that sought to cut them off, and she made a noble confession of her faith, ver. 9-11. She engaged them to covenant with her to shew favour to her and hers, when God should shew kindness to them, and that they would give her a sign, which they did,—a line of scarlet, which she was to hang forth out of the window. She sent them away with prudent and friendly advice. Learn here, 1st. That true faith will shew itself in good works, especially towards the people of God. 2nd. Faith will venture all hazard in the cause of God and his people. A true believer will sooner expose his own person than God's interest and people. 3rd. A true believer is desirous not only to be in covenant with God, but in communion with the people of God, and is willing to cast in his lot with them, and to fare as they fare.

3. Observe what Rahab gained by her faith. She escaped perishing with those that believed not. Observe, 1st. The generality of her neighbours, friends, and fellow-citizens perished; it was an utter destruction that befel that city, man and beast were cut off. 2nd. The cause of the people of Jericho's destruction, and that was unbelief. They believed not that Israel's God was the true God, and that Israel was the peculiar people of God, though they had evidence sufficient of it. 3rd. The signal preservation of Rahab. Joshua gave a strict charge that she should be spared, and none but she and hers; and she, taking care that the sign, the scarlet thread, should be hung out, her family were marked out for mercy, and perished not. Singular faith, when the generality are not only unbelievers, but against believers, will be rewarded with singular favours in times of common calamity.

32 And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gedeon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; of David also, and indeed, been proposed to translate the word in Josh. ii. 1 by "inn-keeper" or "hostess;" others have taken the term as equivalent to "an idolater," but neither suggestion is accepted by the majority of critics, and Rahab remains "an example under the law, similar to that under the Gospel, of a woman that was a 'sinner,' yet, because of her faith, was not only pardoned but exalted to the highest honour. Rahab was both admitted to be of the people of God, intermarried into a chief family of a chief tribe, and found a place deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection: 36 And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment: 37 They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword: they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented; 38 (Of whom the world was not worthy :) they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth. 39 And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: 40 God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.

The apostle, having given us a classis of many eminent believers, whose names are mentioned, and the particular trials and actings of their faith recorded, he now concludes his narrative with a more summary account of another set of believers, where the particular acts are not ascribed to particular persons by name, but left to be applied by those that are well acquainted with the sacred story; and, like a Divine orator, he prefaces this part of the narrative with an elegant expostulation; "What shall I more say? time would fail me;" as if he had said, It is in vain to attempt to exhaust this subject; should I not restrain my pen it would soon run beyond the bounds of an epistle, and therefore I shall but just mention a few more, and leave you to enlarge upon them. Observe, 1. After all our researches into the Scripture, there is still more to be learned from them. 2. That we must well consider in Divine matters what we should say, and suit it as well as we can to the time. 3. We should be pleased to think how great the number of believers was under the Old Testament, and how strong their faith, though the objects thereof were not then so fully revealed. And, 4. We should lament it, that now in gospel times, when the rule of faith is more clear and perfect, the number of believers should be so small, and their faith so weak.

amongst the best-remembered ancestors of King David and of Christ" ("Speaker's Commentary" on Josh. ii. 1).

xi. 35. "And others were tortured:" rather, "but others were." The word translated "torture" refers to "an engine of torture in the form of a wheel, upon which the tortured person was stretched out like the skin of a kettledrum, and frequently beaten to death."

xi. 37. "Being destitute, afflicted, tormented;" or "in misery." "Goat-skins:" skins of the animals with the hair still on. The First. In this summary account the apostle mentions,

1. Gideon, whose story we have in Jud. vi. 11, &c. He was an eminent instrument raised up of God to deliver his people from the oppression of the Midianites. He was a person of a mean tribe and family, called from a mean employment, thrashing wheat, and saluted by an angel of God in this surprising manner, "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of war." Gideon could not at first receive such honours, but humbly expostulates with the angel about their low and distressed state. The angel of the Lord delivered him his commission, and assured him of success, confirming it by fire out of the rock. Gideon is directed to offer sacrifice, and instructed in his duty, goes forth against the Midianites, when his army was reduced from thirty-two thousand to three hundred; yet by these, with their lamps and pitchers, God put the whole army of the Midianites to confusion and ruin. And the same faith that gave Gideon so much courage and honour enabled him to act with great meekness and modesty towards his brethren afterward. It is the excellency of the grace of faith that, while it helps men to do great things, it keeps them from having high and great thoughts of themselves.

2. Barak, another instrument raised up to deliver Israel out of the hand of Jabin, king of Canaan, Jud. iv.; where we read, 1st. That though he was a soldier yet he received his commission and instructions from Deborah, a prophetess of the Lord, and he insisted upon having this Divine oracle with him in his expedition. 2nd. He obtained a great victory, by his faith, over all the host of Sisera. 3rd. That his faith taught him to return all the praise and glory to God. This is the existent nature of faith; it has recourse unto God in all dangers and difficulties, and then makes grateful returns to God for all mercies and deliverances.

3. Samson, another instrument that God raised up to deliver Israel from the Philistines. His story we have in the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th chapters of Judges; and from it we learn that the grace of faith is the strength of the soul for great service. If Samson had not had a strong faith as well as a strong arm, he had never performed such exploits. 1st. That by faith the servants of God shall overcome even the roaring lion. 2nd. That true faith is acknowledged and accepted even when mingled with many failings. 3rd. That the believer's faith endures to the end, and in dying gives him victory over death and all his deadly enemies; his greatest conquest he gains by dying.

4. Jephthah, whose story we have Jud. xi., before Samson; he was raised up to deliver Israel from the Ammonites. As various and new enemies rise up against the people of God, various and new deliverers are raised up for them. In the story of Jephthah observe, 1st. That the grace of God often finds out and fastens upon the most undeserving and ill-deserving persons, to do great things for them and by them: Jephthah was the son of a harlot. 2nd. That the grace of faith, wherever it is, will put men upon acknowledging God in all their ways, ch. xi. 11: Jephthah rehearsed "all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh." 3rd. The grace of faith will make men bold and venturesome in a good cause. 4th. That faith will not only put men upon making their vows to God, but upon paying their vows after the mercy received; yea, though they have vowed to their own great grief, hurt, and loss, as in the case of Jephthah and his daughter.

5. David, that great man after God's own heart. Few ever met with greater trials, and few ever discovered a more lively faith. His first appearance on the stage of the world was a great evidence of his faith; having, when young, slain the lion and the bear, his faith in God encouraged him to encounter the great Goliath, and helped him to triumph over him. The same faith enabled him to bear patiently the ungrateful malice of Saul and his favourites, and to wait till God should put him into possession of the promised power and dignity. The same faith made him a very successful and victorious prince; and after a long life of virtue and honour, (though not without some foul stains of sin,) he died in faith, relying upon that everlasting covenant that God had made with him and his, ordered in all things and sure. And he has left behind him such excellent memoirs of the trials and acts of faith in the book of Psalms as will ever be of great esteem and use to the people of God.

6. Samuel, raised up to be a most eminent prophet of the Lord to Israel, as well as a ruler over them. God revealed himself to Samuel when he was but a child, and continued to do so till his death. In his story observe, 1st. That those are like to grow up to some eminency in faith that begin betimes in the exercise of it. 2nd. They whose business it is to reveal the mind and will of God to others had need to be well established in the belief of it themselves. To Samuel he adds, "and of the prophets," who were extraordinary ministers of the Old Testament church, employed of God sometimes to denounce judgment, sometimes to promise mercy, always to reprove sin; sometimes to foretell remarkable events, known only to God; and chiefly to give notice of the Messiah, his coming, person, and offices; for in him the prophets, as well as the law, centre. Now a true and strong faith was very requisite for the right discharge of such an office as this.

Secondly. And now, having done naming particular persons, he proceeds to tell us what things were done by their faith. He mentions some things that easily apply themselves to one or other of the persons named; but he mentions other things that are not so easy to be accommodated to any here named, but must be left to general conjecture or accommodation.

1. By faith they "subdued kingdoms," ver. 33. This did David, Joshua, and many of the judges. Learn hence, 1st. The interests and powers of kings and kingdoms are often set up in opposition to God and his people. 2nd. That God can easily subdue all those kings and kingdoms that set themselves to oppose him. 3rd. That faith is a suitable and excellent qualification of those that fight in the wars of the Lord; it makes them just, bold, and wise.

2. They wrought righteousness both in their public and personal capacities. They turned many from idolatry to the ways of righteousness: they believed God, and it was imputed to them for righteousness; they walked and acted righteously towards God and man. It is a greater honour and happiness to work righteousness than to work miracles. Faith is an active principle of universal righteousness.

3. They obtained promises, both general and special. It is faith that gives us an interest in the promises; it is by faith that we have the comfort of the promises; and it is by faith that we are prepared to wait for the promises, and in due time to receive them.

4. They "stopped the mouths of lions," so did Samson, Jud. xiv. 5, 6, and David, 1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35, and Daniel, ch. vi. 22. Here learn, 1st. That the power of God is above the power of the creature. And, 2nd. That faith engages the power of God for his people whenever it shall be for his glory to overcome brute beasts and brutish men.

5. They "quenched the violence of fire," ver. 33. So Moses, by the prayer of faith, quenched the fire of God's wrath that was kindled against the people of Israel, Num. xi. 1, 2. So did the three children, or rather mighty champions, Dan. iii. 17-27; their faith in God, refusing to worship the golden image, exposed them to the fiery furnace which Nebuchadnezzar had prepared for them, and their faith engaged for them that power and presence of God in the furnace which quenched the violence of the fire, so that not so much as the smell thereof passed on them. Never was the grace of faith more severely tried, never more nobly exerted, nor ever more gloriously rewarded, than theirs was.

description recalls those prophets who were spoken of as "hairy men" (2 Kings i. 8).

xi. 38. "Of whom the world was not worthy;" this seems introduced to meet the insinuation that these martyrs were "mere outcasts;" or is it not rather the genuine expression of the apostle's own enthusiastic admiration of these men?

xi. 39 "Good report through faith;" Alford's rendering is, "being borne witness to through faith."

6. They "escaped the edge of the sword." Thus David escaped the sword of Goliath and of Saul, and Mordecai and the Jews escaped the sword of Haman. The swords of men are held in the hand of God, and he can blunt the edge of the sword, and turn it away from his people against their enemies when he pleases. Faith takes hold of that hand of God which has hold of the swords of men, and God has often suffered himself to be prevailed upon by the faith of his people.

7. "Out of weakness they were made strong." From national weakness, into which the Jews often fell by their unbelief, upon the revival of faith, all their interest and affairs revived and flourished. From bodily weakness: thus Hezekiah, believing the word of God, recovered out of a mortal distemper; and he ascribed his recovery to the promise and power of God; Isa. xxxviii. 15, "What shall I say? He hath spoken it, and he hath also done it. Lord, by these things men live, and in these is the life of my spirit." And it is the same grace of faith that from spiritual weakness helps men to recover and renew their strength.

8. They "grew valiant in fight;" so did Joshua, the judges, and David. True faith gives truest courage and patience, as it discerns the strength of God, and thereby the weakness of all his enemies; and they were not only valiant but successful. God, as a reward and encouragement of their faith, put to flight the armies of aliens; of those that were aliens to their commonwealth, and enemies to their religion. God made them flee and fall before his faithful servants. Believing and praying commanders, at the head of believing and praying armies, have been so owned and honoured of God that nothing could stand before them.

9. "Women received their dead raised to life again," ver. 35. So did the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kin. xvii. 23, and the Shunammite, 2 Kin. iv. 36. 1st. In Christ there is neither male nor female. Many of the weaker sex have been strong in faith. 2nd. Though the covenant of grace takes in the children of believers, yet it leaves them subject to natural death. 3rd. Poor mothers are loath to resign up their interest in their children, though death has taken them away from them. 4th. God has sometimes yielded so far to the tender affections of sorrowful women as to restore their dead children to life again. Thus Christ had compassion on the widow of Nain, Lu. vii. 12. 5th. This should confirm our faith in the general resurrection.

Thirdly. The apostle tells us what these believers endured by faith.

1. They "were tortured, not accepting deliverance," ver. 35. They were put upon the rack to make them renounce their God, their Saviour, and their religion; and they bore the torture, and would not accept of deliverance upon such vile terms; and that which animated them to suffer was, the hope they had of obtaining a better resurrection, and deliverance upon more honourable terms. This is thought to refer to that memorable story, 2 Maccabees vii. &c.

2. They endured "trials of cruel mockings, and scourgings, and bonds, and imprisonment," ver. 36. They were persecuted in their reputation by mockings, which are cruel to an ingenuous mind; in their persons by scourging, the punishment of slaves; in their liberty by "bonds and imprisonment." Observe how inveterate is the malice that wicked men have towards the righteous, how far it will go, and what a variety of cruelties it will invent and exercise upon those against whom they have no cause of quarrel, except in the matters of their God.

3. They were put to death in the most cruel manner; some "were stoned," as Zechariah, 2 Chr. xxiv. 21; "sawn asunder," as Isaiah by Manasseh. They were "tempted," some read it 'burnt,' 2 Maccabees vii. 5. They were "slain with the sword." All sorts of deaths were prepared for them; their enemies clothed death in all the array of cruelty and terror, and yet they boldly met it and endured it.

4. Those that escaped death were used so ill as that death might seem more eligible than such a life. Their enemies spared them only to prolong their misery, and wear out all their patience; for they were forced to "wander about in sheep-skins, and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, and tormented; they wandered about in deserts, and on mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth," ver. 37, 38. They were stripped of the conveniences of life, turned out of house and harbour; they had not raiment to put on, but were forced to cover themselves with the skins of slain beasts; they were driven out of all human society, and forced to converse with the beasts of the field, to hide themselves "in dens and caves," and make their complaint to rocks and rivers, not more obdurate than their enemies. Such sufferings as these they endured then for their faith, and such they endured through the power of the grace of faith. And which shall we most admire, the wickedness of human nature, that is capable of acting such cruelties on fellow-creatures, or the excellency of Divine grace, that is able to bear up the faithful under such cruelties, and to carry them safely through all?

Fourthly. What they obtained by their faith.

1. A most honourable character and commendation from God, the true Judge and Fountain of honour; that is, that the world was not worthy of such men. The world did not deserve such blessings; they did not know how to value them, nor how to use them. Wicked men! The righteous are not worthy to live in the world; and God declares the world is not worthy of them; and though they widely differ in their judgment, they agree in this, that it is not fit good men should have their rest in this world; and therefore God receives them out of it to that world that is suitable to them, and yet far beyond the merit of all their services and sufferings.

2. They "obtained a good report," ver. 39, of all good men, and of the truth itself, and have the honour to be enrolled in this sacred calendar of the Old Testament worthies, God's witnesses; yea, they had a witness for them in the consciences of their enemies, who, while they thus abused them, were condemned by their own consciences as persecuting those that were more righteous than themselves.

3. They obtained an interest in the promises, though not the full possession of them. They had a title to the promises, though they received not the great things promised. This is not meant of the felicity of the heavenly state, for that they did receive when they died, in the measure of a part, in one constituent part of their persons, and the much better part; but it is meant of the felicity of the gospel state. They had types, but not the antitype; they had shadows, but had not seen the substance; and yet under this imperfect dispensation they discovered this precious faith. And this the apostle insists upon to render their faith more illustrious, and to provoke Christians to a holy jealousy and emulation; that they should not suffer themselves to be outdone in the exercise of faith by those that came so short of them in all the helps and advantages for believing. He tells the Hebrews God had "provided some better things" for them, ver. 40, and therefore they might be assured he expected at least as good things from them; and that since the Gospel is the end and perfection of the Old Testament, which had no excellency but in its reference to Christ and the Gospel, it was expected that their faith should be as much more perfect than the faith of the Old Testament saints. Or, their state and dispensation was more perfect than the former, and was indeed the perfection and completion of the former; for without the gospel church the Jewish church must have remained in an incomplete and imperfect state. This reasoning is strong, and should be effectually prevalent with us all.

xi. 40. "They without us," i.e., "that they apart from as do not attain the consummation of their hope." "The reason of the fact just mentioned (viz., that they received not the promise) is God's gracious regard for us, which has led him to adopt such an arrangement that the actual receiving of the promise is accorded to us if we abide in the faith; while yet those fathers who are eulogised for their faith are not excluded, but attain in like manner the consummation, only not without us, as would have been the case if their

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle in this chapter applies what he had collected in the chapter foregoing, and makes use of it as a great motive to patience and perseverance in the Christian faith and state, pressing home the argument, 1. From a greater example than he had yet mentioned, and that is Christ himself, ver. 1—3. II. From the gentle and gracious nature of the afflictions they endured in their Christian course, ver. 4—17. III. From the communion and conformity between the state of the gospel church on earth and the triumphant church in heaven, ver. 18—29.

AFORE seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, 2 Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. 3 For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

Here observe what is the great duty which the apostle urges upon the Hebrews, and which he so much desires they would comply with, and that is to "lay aside every weight, and the sin that did so easily beset them, and run with patience the race set before them." The duty consists of two parts, the one preparatory, the other perfective.

First. Preparatory. "Lay aside every weight, and the sin," &c. 1. Every weight, that is, all inordinate affection and concern for the body, and the present life and world. Inordinate care for the present life, and fondness for it, is a dead weight upon the soul, that pulls it down when it would ascend upwards, and pulls it back when it should press forward. It makes duties and difficulties harder and heavier than they would be. 2. "The sin that does so easily beset us." The sin that has the greatest advantage against us by the circumstances we are in, our constitution, our company. This may mean either the damning sin of unbelief, or rather the darling sin of the Jews, an over-fondness for their own dispensation. Let us lay aside all external and internal hindrances.

Secondly. Perfective. "Run with patience the race that was set before them." The apostle speaks in the gymnastic style, taken from the Olympic and other exercises.

1. Christians have a race to run. A race of service, and a race of sufferings; a course of active and passive obedience.

2. This race is set before them; it is marked out unto them, both by the word of God and the examples of the faithful servants of God, that cloud of witnesses with which they are compassed about. It is set out by proper limits and directions; the mark they run to, and the prize they run for, are set before them.

3. This race must be run with patience and perseverance. There will be need of patience to encounter the difficulties that lie in our way, of perseverance to resist all temptations to desist or turn aside. Faith and patience are the conquering graces, and therefore must be always cultivated and kept in lively exercise.

4. Christians have a greater example to animate and encourage them in their Christian course than any or all that have been mentioned before, and that is the Lord Jesus Christ; ver. 2, "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." Where observe,

1st. What our Lord Jesus is to his people. He is "the author and finisher of their faith;" the beginning, and perfecter, and rewarder of it. First. He is "the author" of their faith; not only the object, but "the author." He is the great leader and precedent of our faith, he trusted in God; he is the purchaser of the spirit of faith, the publisher of the rule of faith, the efficient cause of the grace of faith, and in all respects "the author of our faith." Secondly. He is "the finisher of our faith." He is the fulfiller and the fulfilling of all Scripture promises and prophecies; he is the perfecter of the canon of Scripture; he is the finisher of grace and work of faith with power in the souls of his people; and he is the judge and the rewarder of their faith; he determines who they are that reach the mark, and from and in him they have the prize.

2nd. What trials Christ met with in his race and course. First. He endured the "contradiction of sinners against himself," ver. 3. He bore the opposition that they made to him both in their words and behaviour. They were continually contradicting him, and crossing in upon his great designs; and though he could easily have both confuted and confounded them, and sometimes gave them a specimen of his power, yet he endured their evil manners with great patience. Their contradictions were levelled against Christ himself, against his person as God-man, against his authority, against his preaching, and yet he endured all. Secondly. He endured the cross—all those sufferings that he met with in the world; for he took up his cross betimes, and was at length nailed to it, and endured a painful, ignominious, and accursed death, in which he was numbered with the transgressors, the vilest malefactors; yet all this he endured with invincible patience and resolution. Thirdly. He despised the shame, all the reproaches that were cast upon him both in this life and at his death. He despised them all, was infinitely above them; he knew his innocence, and his own excellency, and despised the ignorance and malice of his despisers.

3rd. What it was that supported the human soul of Christ under these unparalleled sufferings; and that was the joy that was set before him. He had something in view under all his sufferings which was pleasant to him; he rejoiced to see that by his sufferings he should make satisfaction to the injured justice of God, and give security to his honour and government; that he should make peace between God and man; that he should seal the covenant of grace, and be the Mediator of it; that he should open a way of salvation to the chief of sinners, and that he should effectually save all those that the Father had given him, and himself be the first-born among many brethren. This was the joy that was set before him.

4th. The reward of his suffering. He is "set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Christ, as Mediator, is exalted to a station of the highest honour, of the greatest power and influence; he is at the right hand of the Father; nothing passes between heaven and earth but by him; he does all that is done; he ever lives to make intercession for his people.

5th. What is our duty with respect to this Jesus. We must, First. Look unto him; that is, [1. The Christian race-runner hath Jesus before him in the way to help him in everything that may befall him in his course. 2. Christ must be looked upon by him who would be helped in the race; the eye of the soul being drawn off of everything which might divert the man or discourage him, and our minds fixed on Christ with loving and longing looks, which may draw life and strength from him. 3. We must look on him as Jesus, the deliverer from sins and giver of salvation, even him who saveth his people from their sins. 4. We must look upon him as the author and finisher of our faith; that is, as our God, who hath begun his good work in us, and will also perfect it, who hath given us grace to believe, and will surely continue this grace with us, even to the end, lest the fears of our faith failing make us to faint.] 5. We must set him continually before us as our example, and our great encouragement; we must look to him for direction, for assistance, and for acceptance in all our sufferings. Secondly. We must "consider him;" meditate much upon him, and reason with ourselves from his case to our own. We must "analogize," as the word is; compare Christ's suffering and ours, and we shall find that, as his sufferings far exceeded ours in the nature and measure of them, so his patience far excels ours, and is a perfect pattern for us to imitate.

6th. The advantage we shall reap by thus doing. It will be a means to prevent our weariness and fainting; ver. 3, "Lest ye be weary, and faint in your minds." Observe, First. There is a proneness in the best to grow weary, and to faint under their trials and afflictions, especially when they prove heavy, and of long continuance. This proceeds from the imperfection of grace, and remains of corruption. Secondly. The best way to prevent this is to "look unto Jesus," and to "consider him." Faith and meditation will fetch in fresh supplies of strength, comfort, and courage; for he has assured them, if they suffer with him, they shall also reign with him. And this hope will be their helmet.

4 Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin. 5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him: 6 For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. 7 If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? 8 But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons. 9 Furthermore we have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? 10 For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. 11 Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which faith had been immediately rewarded with the promised good, and no interval had come in between the faith and the attainment. Since, then, the consummation still also awaits us, and will be attained only at the second coming of Christ; we are on the one hand on a level with the fathers, and, notwithstanding our faith, have, like them, to submit to a period of waiting, which also gives ample scope for Christian endurance, while thus their life of faith can furnish us a comforting and stimulating example; and, on the other, a better thing has been provided for us. The fulfilment of the Messianic promise has, with the appearance of Jesus Christ and his entrance into the heavenly All Holy, become matter of historical fact, so that the prophecy of Jeremiah is fulfilled—chap. viii. 6, &c. (Lange). This quotation serves as well to introduce chap. xii. as to close chap. xi.

xii. 1. "Wherefore let us lay:" i.e., as well as they. "Witnesses:" the word is not that which describes a "spectator," but witnesses ("martyrs," literally), who have borne testimony to the ble you, and thereby many be defiled; 16 Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. 17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

GREEK STADIUM.—VER. 13.

Here the apostle presses the exhortation to patience and perseverance by an argument taken from the gentle measure and gracious nature of those sufferings the believing Hebrews endured in their Christian course.

First, From the gentle and moderate degree and measure of their sufferings: "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin," ver. 4. Observe,

1. He owns they had suffered much; they had been striving to an agony against sin. Here, 1st. The cause of the conflict was sin; and to be engaged against sin is to fight in a good cause; for sin is the worst enemy both to God and man. Our spiritual warfare is both honourable and necessary; for we are only defending ourselves against that which would destroy us if it should get the victory over us. We fight for ourselves, for our lives; and therefore ought to be patient and resolute. 2nd. Every Christian is listed under Christ's banner to strive against sin, against sinful doctrines, and sinful practices, and sinful habits and customs, both in themselves and others.

2. He puts them in mind that they might have suffered more, (others have suffered more;) for they "had not yet resisted unto blood." They had not been called to martyrdom as yet, though they knew not how soon they might be. Learn here, 1st. Our Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, does not use to call his people out to the hardest trials at the first, but wisely trains them up by lesser sufferings to be prepared for greater. He will not put new wine into weak vessels; he is the gentle Shepherd, that will not overdrive the young ones of the flock. 2nd. It becomes Christians to take notice of the gentleness of Christ in accommodating their trial to their strength; they should magnify their afflictions, but should take notice of the mercy that is mixed with them, and should pity those that are called to the fiery trial to resist to blood; not to the shedding the blood of their enemies, but to sealing their testimony with their own blood. 3rd. Christians should be ashamed to faint under lesser trials when they see others bear up under greater, and do not know how soon they may meet with greater themselves. "If we run with the footmen, and they have wearied us, how shall we contend with horses? If we be wearied in a land of peace, what shall we do in the swellings of Jordan?" Jer. xii. 5.

Secondly, He argues from the peculiar and gracious nature of those sufferings that befall the people of God. Though their enemies and persecutors may be the instruments of inflicting such sufferings on them, yet they are Divine chastisements; their heavenly Father has his hand in all, and his wise end to serve by all, and of this he has given them due notice, and they should not forget it, ver. 5. Observe,

1. That those afflictions which may be truly persecution, as far as men are concerned in them, are fatherly rebukes and chastisements, as far as God is concerned in them. Persecution for religion is sometimes a correction and rebuke for the sins of professors of religion. Men persecute them because they are religious; God chastises them because they are not more so. Men persecute them because they will not give up their profession; God chastises them because they have not lived up to their profession.

2. God has directed his people how they ought to behave themselves under all their afflictions. They must avoid the extremes that many run into. 1st. They must not despise the chastening of the Lord; they must not make light of afflictions, and be stupid and insensible under them; for they are the hand and rod of God, and his rebukes for sin. They that make light of affliction make light of God, and make light of sin. 2nd. They must not faint when they are rebuked; they must not depend and sink under their trial, nor fret and repine, but bear up with faith and patience. 3rd. If they run into either of these extremes, it is a sign they have forgotten their heavenly Father's advice and exhortation, which he has given them in true and tender affection.

3. Afflictions rightly endured, though they may be the fruits of God's displeasure, yet they are proofs of his paternal love to his people, and care for them; ver. 6, 7, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Observe, 1st. The best of God's children need chastisement; they have their faults and follies, which need to be corrected. 2nd. Though God may let others alone in their sins, he will correct sin in his own children; they are of his family, and shall not escape his rebukes when they want them. 3rd. That in this he acts as becomes a father, and treats them like children. No wise and good father will wink at those faults in his own children as he would in others; his relation and his affections oblige him to take more notice of the faults of his own children than of others. 4th. To be suffered to go on in sin without rebuke is a sad sign of alienation from God; such are bastards, not sons. They may call him Father, because born in the pale of the church; but they are the spurious offspring of another father, not of God, ver. 7, 8.

4. Those that are impatient under the discipline of their heavenly Father carry it worse towards him than they would do towards earthly parents, ver. 9, 10. Here, 1st. The apostle commends a dutiful and submissive behaviour in children towards their earthly parents; "We gave them reverence" even when they corrected us. It is the duty of children to give the reverence of obedience to the just commands of their parents, and the reverence of submission to their correction when they have been disobedient. Parents have not only authority, but a charge from God to give their children correction when it is due, and he has commanded children to take such correction well; and to be stubborn and discontented under due correction is a double fault, for the correction supposes there has been a fault already committed against the parents' commanding power, and superadds a farther fault against his chastising power. 2nd. From hence he recommends an humble and submissive behaviour towards our heavenly Father when under his correction, and this he does by an argument from the less to the greater.

First, Our earthly fathers are but the fathers of our flesh, but God is the Father of our spirits. Our fathers on earth were instrumental in the production of our bodies, which are but flesh, a mean, mortal, vile thing, formed out of the dust of the earth, as the bodies of the beasts are; and yet as they are curiously wrought, and made parts of our persons, and a proper tabernacle for the soul to dwell in, and an organ for it to act by, we owe reverence and affection to those that were instrumental in their procreation; but then we must owe much more to him who is the Father of our spirits. Our souls are not of a material substance, not of the most refined sort; they are not ex traduce,—"by tradition"; to affirm it is bad philosophy and worse divinity. They are the immediate offspring of God, who, after he had formed the body of man out of the earth, breathed into him a vital spirit, and so he became a living soul.

Secondly, Our earthly parents chastened us for their own pleasure. Sometimes they did it to gratify their passion, rather than to reform our manners. This is a weakness the fathers of our flesh are subject to, and this they should carefully watch against; for hereby they dishonour that parental authority that God has put upon them, and very much hinder the efficacy of their chastisements. But the Father of our spirits never grieves willingly, nor afflicts the children of men, much less his own children. It is always for our profit, and the advantage he intends us thereby is no less than our being partakers of his holiness; it is to correct and cure those sinful disorders that make us unlike to God, and to improve and increase those graces, which are the image of God in us, that we may be and act more like our heavenly Father. God loves his children so that he would have them to be as like himself as can be, and for this end he chastises them when they need it. Thirdly, The fathers of our flesh corrected us for a few days, in our state of childhood, when minors; and though we were in that weak and peevish state we owed them reverence, and when we came to maturity we loved and honoured them the more for it. Why, our whole life here is a state of childhood, minority and imperfection, and therefore we must submit to the discipline of such a state; and when we come to a state of perfection we shall be fully reconciled to all the measures of God's discipline over us now. Fourthly, God's correction is no condemnation; his children may at first fear lest affliction should come upon that dreadful errand, and we cry, "Do not condemn me, but shew me wherefore thou contendest with me," Job x. 2. But that is so far from being the design of God to his own people, that he therefore "chastens them now, that they may not be condemned with the world," 1 Cor. xi. 32. He does it to prevent the death and destruction of their souls, that they may live to God and like God, and be for ever with him.

5. The children of God, under their afflictions, ought not to judge of his dealings with them by present sense, but by reason, and faith, and experience; ver. 11, "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; truth and faithfulness of God and the power of faith. "Every weight, and the sin," &c.: some consider the second word as explanatory of the first, "every weight, even the sin, &c., which 'doth so easily beset us,'" expressed by one word in the original. It is used nowhere else in the New Testament, and its meaning is differently understood. Some refer it to sin, like a garment closely and constantly encompassing and hindering the runner; others to the fact that sin every where besets us and subtly encompasses us, or obstructs our way. Alford renders, "and sin, which doth naturally enwrap us." Webster and Wilkinson say that the sin to which these Hebrew Christians were most tempted was the sin of apostasy; there are hints of this in the epistle. (Compare chap. vi. 9, x. 38, 39.)

xii. 2. "Looking unto the author and perfecter of our faith, even Jesus" (Alford). The word translated "author" signifies more than the mere "originator" who works in us the beginning of faith, but, as at chap. ii. 10, the leader, marshal, who, in the exhibition of nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness." Where observe,

1st. The judgment of sense in this case. Afflictions are not grateful to the sense, but grievous; the flesh will feel them, and be grieved by them, and groan under them.

2nd. The judgment of faith, which corrects that of sense, and declares that a sanctified affliction produceth the fruits of righteousness; and these fruits are peaceable, tend to the quieting and comforting of the soul. Affliction produces peace, by producing more righteousness; for the fruit of righteousness is peace. And if the pain of the body contribute thus to the peace of the mind, and short, present affliction, produceth blessed fruits of a long continuance, they have no reason to fret or faint under it, but their great concern is that the chastening they are under may be endured by them with patience, and improved to a greater degree of holiness.

First. That their affliction may be endured with patience, which is the main drift of the apostle's discourse on this subject; and he again returns to exhort them, that for the reason before mentioned they should "lift up their hands that hang down, and the feeble knees," ver. 12. A burthen of affliction is apt to make the Christian's hands hang down and his knees grow feeble, to dispirit him and discourage him; but this he must strive against, and that for two reasons. 1st. That he may the better run his spiritual race and course. Faith, and patience, and holy courage and resolution, will make him walk more steadily, keep a straighter path, prevent wavering and wandering. 2nd. That he may encourage and not discourage others that are in the same way with him. There are many that are in the way to heaven that yet walk but weakly and lamely in it. Such are apt to discourage one another, and hinder one another; but it is their duty to take courage, and act by faith, and so help one another forward in the way to heaven.

Secondly. That their afflictions may be improved to a greater degree of holiness. Since this is God's design, it ought to be the design and concern of his children, that with renewed strength and patience they may "follow peace with all men, and holiness," ver. 14. If the children of God grow impatient under affliction, they will neither walk so quietly and peaceably towards men nor so piously towards God as they should do; but faith and patience will enable them to follow peace and holiness too, as a man follows his calling, constantly and diligently, and with pleasure. Observe, 1st. It is the duty of Christians, even when in a suffering state, "to follow peace with all men," yea even with those that may be instrumental in their sufferings. That is a hard lesson, and a high attainment, but it is what Christ has called his people to. Sufferings are apt to sour the spirit, and sharpen the passions; but the children of God must "follow peace with all men." 2nd. Peace and holiness are connected together; there can be no right peace without holiness. There may be prudence and discreet forbearance, and a shew of friendship and goodwill to all; but this true Christian peaceableness is never found separate from holiness. We must not, under pretence of living peaceably with all men, leave the ways of holiness, but cultivate peace in a way of holiness. 3rd. "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." The vision of God our Saviour in heaven is reserved as the reward of holiness, and the stress of our salvation is laid upon our holiness, though a placid, peaceable disposition contributes much to our meetness for heaven.

6. Where afflictions and sufferings for the sake of Christ are not considered by men as the chastisement of their heavenly Father, and improved as such, they will be a dangerous snare and temptation to apostasy, which every Christian should most carefully watch against; ver. 15, 16, "Looking diligently, lest any man fall of the grace of God," &c. And here the apostle enters a serious caveat against apostasy, and backs it with an awful example:—

1st. He enters a serious caveat against apostasy, ver. 15. Where you may observe, First. The nature of apostasy. It is "failing of the grace of God;" it is to become bankrupts in religion, for want of a good foundation, and suitable care and diligence. It is "failing of the grace of God;" coming short of a principle of true grace in the soul, notwithstanding the means of grace, and a profession of religion, and so coming short of the love and favour of God here and hereafter. Secondly. The consequences of apostasy. Where persons fail of having the true grace of God, a "root of bitterness" will spring up; corruption will prevail and break forth; a root of bitterness, a bitter root, producing bitter fruits to themselves and others; to themselves, corrupt principles, which lead to apostasy, and are greatly strengthened and radicated by apostasy; damnable errors, to the corrupting the doctrine and worship of the Christian church, and corrupt practices. Apostates generally grow worse and worse, and fall into the grossest wickedness, which usually ends either in downright atheism or in despair; and this produces bitter fruits to others, to the churches to whom these men belonged. By their corrupt principles and practices many are troubled, the peace of the churches is broken, the peace of men's minds disturbed, and many defiled, tainted with those bad principles, and drawn into defiling practices, so that the churches suffer both in their purity and peace. But the apostates themselves will be the greatest sufferers at last.

2nd. The apostle backs the caution with an awful example, and that is that of Esau; who, though born within the pale of the church, and having the birthright as the eldest son, and so might have had the privilege of being prophet, priest, and king, in his family, was so profane as to despise these sacred privileges, and to sell "his birthright for a morsel of meat." Where observe, First. Esau's sin. He profanely despised and sold the birthright, and all the advantages attending it. So apostates, that to avoid persecution and enjoy sensual ease and pleasure, though they bore the character of the children of God, and had a visible right to the blessing and inheritance, give up all the pretensions thereto. Secondly. Esau's punishment suitable to his sin. His conscience was convinced of his sin and folly when it was too late; "He would afterward have inherited the blessing," but "he was rejected," &c. His punishment lay in two things. 1st. He was condemned by his own conscience. He now saw that the blessing he had made so light of was worth the having, worth the seeking, though with much carefulness, and many tears. 2nd. He was rejected of God. "He found no place of repentance" in God, in his Father, or of true repentance in his own soul; the blessing was given to another, even to him to whom he sold it for a mess of pottage. Esau, in his great wickedness, had made the bargain, and God, in his righteous judgment, ratifies and confirms it, and would not suffer Isaac to reverse it. Learn, (1.) Apostasy from Christ is the fruit of preferring the gratification of the flesh before the blessing of God and the heavenly inheritance. (2.) Sinners will not always have such mean thoughts of the Divine blessing and inheritance as now they have. The time is coming when they will think no pains too great, no cares, no tears, too much, to obtain the lost blessing. (3.) That when the day of grace is over (as sometimes it may be in this life) they will find no place for repentance. They cannot repent aright of their sin; and God will not repent of the sentence he has passed upon them for their sin. And therefore, as the design of all, Christians should never give up their title and hope of their Father's blessing and inheritance, and expose themselves to his irrevocable wrath and curse, by deserting their holy religion to avoid suffering; which, though this may be persecution as far as wicked men are concerned in them, are only a rod of correction and chastisement in the hand of their heavenly Father, to bring them near to himself in conformity and communion. This is the force of the apostle's arguing from the nature of the sufferings of the people of God, even when they suffer for righteousness' sake; and the reasoning is very strong.

18 For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest, 19 And the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more: 20 (For they could not endure that which was commanded, And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart: 21 And so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake:) 22 But ye are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, 23 To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, 24 And to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. 25 See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven: 26 Whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven. 27 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. 28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear: 29 For our God is a consuming fire.

Here the apostle goes on to engage the professing Hebrews to perseverance in their Christian course and conflict, and not to relapse again into Judaism. And this he does by shewing them how much the state of the gospel church differed from that of the Jewish church, and how much it resembles the state of the church in heaven; and on both accounts demands and deserves our diligence, patience, and perseverance in Christianity.

First. How much the gospel church differs from the Jewish church, and how much it excels. And here we have a very particular description of the state of the church under the Mosaic dispensation, ver. 18—21.

1. It was a gross, sensible state. Mount Sinai, on which that church state was constituted, was a "mount that might be touched," ver. 18, a gross, palpable place; and so was the dispensation. It was very much external, earthly and sensitive, and so more heavy. The state of the gospel church on mount Zion is more spiritual, rational, and easy.

2. It was a dark dispensation. Upon that mount there was "blackness and darkness," and that church state was covered with dark shadows and types. The gospel state is much more clear and bright.

3. It was a dreadful and terrible dispensation. The Jews could not bear the terror of it; the thunder and the lightning, the trumpet sounding, the voice of God himself speaking to them, struck them with such dread, that they "intreated the word should not be spoken to them any more," ver. 19. Yea, Moses himself said, "I exceedingly fear and quake." The best of men on earth are not able to converse immediately with God and his holy angels. The gospel state is mild, and kind, and condescending, suited to our weak frame.

4. It was a limited dispensation; all might not approach to that mount, but only Moses and Aaron. Under the Gospel we have all access with boldness to God.

5. It was a very dangerous dispensation. The mount "burned with fire," and whatever man or beast touched the mount, they must "be stoned, or thrust through with a dart," ver. 20. It is true it will be always dangerous for presumptuous and brutish sinners to draw nigh to God; but it is not immediate and certain death, as here it was. This was the state of the Jewish church, fitted to awe a stubborn and hard-hearted people, and to set forth the strict and tremendous justice of God, and to wean the people of God from that dispensation, and make them more readily to embrace the sweet and gentle economy of the gospel church, and adhere to it.

Secondly. He shews how much the gospel church represents the church triumphant in heaven, what communication there is between the one and the other. The gospel church is called mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, which is free, in opposition to mount Sinai, which tendeth to bondage, Gal. iv. 24.

patient and victorious faith, has preceded us as a pattern and an aid. (Compare chap. ii. 13, iii. 2.)

xii. 7. "If ye endure:" the majority of ancient MSS. read, "unto chastisement ye are enduring"—i.e., "it is for chastisement that ye are enduring."

xii. 12. "Wherefore lift up:" "The thought and language of the first clause are apparently suggested by Isa. xxxv. 3, while the second clause reflects Prov. iv. 26. The language is very condensed. It is not meant that making a path even would tend to heal the lame, or that bringing back is to be considered as healing; but not only should even paths be made for the benefit of the lame, that they may not forsake them for others, but also, instead of such an unhappy result, the lame should be healed. The scope of the admonition is to teach and learn the way of righteousness plainly, and promote the inclination and ability to follow it" (Webster and Wilkinson).

xii. 14, 15. For "holiness" Alford has "sanctification," and for

There is the hill on which God set his king the Messiah. Now, in coming to mount Zion, believers come into heavenly places, and into a heavenly society.

1. Into heavenly places. 1st. To "the city of the living God." God has taken up his gracious residence in the gospel church, which on that account is an emblem of heaven. There his people may find him ruling, guiding, sanctifying and comforting them; there he speaks to them by the gospel ministry; there they speak to him by prayer, and he hears them; there he trains them up for heaven, and gives them the earnest of their inheritance. 2nd. To "the heavenly Jerusalem," as born and bred there, as free denizens there. Here believers have clearer views of heaven, plainer evidences for heaven, and a greater meekness and more heavenly temper of soul.

2. To a heavenly society. 1st. "To an innumerable company of angels," who are of the same family with the saints, under the same head, and in a great measure employed in the same work, ministering to believers for their good, and keeping them in all their ways, and pitching their tents about them. These for number are innumerable, and for order and union are a company, and a glorious one. And those that by faith are joined to the gospel church are joined to the angels, and shall at length be like them, and equal with them. 2nd. "To the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven," that is, to the universal church, however dispersed. By faith we come to them, have communion with them in the same Head, by the same Spirit, and in the same blessed hope, and walk in the same way of holiness, grappling with the same spiritual enemies, and hasting to the same rest, victory, and glorious triumph, where will be the general assembly of the first-born, the saints of former and earlier times, who saw the promises of the gospel state but received them not, as well as those that first received them under the Gospel, and were regenerated thereby, and so were the first-born and the first-fruits of the gospel church, and thereby, as the first-born, advanced to greater honours and privileges than the rest of the world. Indeed, all the children of God are heirs, and every one hath the privileges of the first-born. The names of these are written in heaven, in the records of the church here; have a name in God's house, written among the living in Jerusalem; have a good repute for their faith and fidelity, and are enrolled in the Lamb's book of life, as citizens are enrolled in the lively books. 3rd. "To God the Judge of all;" that great God who will judge both Jew and Gentile according to the law they are under. Believers come to him now by faith, and make supplication to their Judge, and receive a sentence of absolution in the Gospel, and in the court of their consciences now, by which they know they shall be justified hereafter. 4th. "To the spirits of just men made perfect." To the best sort of men, the righteous, who are more excellent than their neighbours; to the best part of just men, their spirits, and to these in their best state, made perfect. Believers have union with departed saints in one and the same Head and Spirit, and a title to the same inheritance, of which those on earth are heirs, those in heaven possessors. 5th. "To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." This is none of the least of the many encouragements there are to perseverance in the gospel state, since it is a state of communion with Christ the Mediator of the new covenant, and of communication of his blood, that speaketh better things than the blood of Abel. First. The gospel covenant is a new covenant, distinct from the covenant of works; and it is now under a new dispensation, distinct from that of the Old Testament. Secondly. Christ is the Mediator of this new covenant. He is the middle person that goes between both parties, God and man, to bring them together in this covenant; to keep them together, notwithstanding the sins of the people, and God's displeasure against them for sin; to offer up our prayers to God, and to bring down the favours of God to us; to plead with God for us, and to plead with us for God; and at length to bring God and his people together in heaven, and to be a Mediator of fruition between them for ever; they beholding and enjoying God in Christ, and God beholding and blessing them in Christ. Thirdly. This covenant is ratified by the blood of Christ sprinkled upon our consciences, as the blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled upon the altar and the sacrifice. This blood of Christ pacifies God, and purifies the consciences of men. Fourthly. This is speaking blood, and it speaks better things than that of Abel. 1st. It speaks to God in behalf of sinners. It pleads not for vengeance, as the blood of Abel did on him that shed it, but for mercy. 2nd. To sinners, in the name of God, it speaks pardon to their sins, peace to their souls; and bespeaks their strictest obedience, and highest love and thankfulness.

Thirdly. The apostle having thus enlarged upon the argument to perseverance, taken from the heavenly nature of the gospel church state, he closes the chapter by improving the argument in a manner suitable to the weight of it; ver. 25, &c., "See then that ye refuse not him that speaketh;" that speaketh by his blood, and not only speaketh after another manner than the blood of Abel spoke from the ground, but than God spoke by the angels, and by Moses spoke on mount Sinai: then he spoke on earth, now he speaks from heaven. Here observe,

1. That when God speaks to men in the most excellent manner, he justly expects from them the most strict attention and regard. Now it is in the Gospel that God speaks to men in the most excellent manner. For, 1st. He now speaks from a higher and more glorious seat and throne; not from mount Sinai, which was on this earth, but from heaven. 2nd. He speaks now more immediately by his inspired word, and by his Spirit, which are his witnesses. He speaks not now any new thing to men, but by his Spirit speaks the same word home to the conscience. 3rd. He speaks now more powerfully and effectually. Then, indeed, his voice shook the earth, but now, by introducing the gospel state, he hath not only shaken the earth, but the heavens; not only shaken the hills and mountains, or the spirits of men, or the civil state of the land of Canaan, to make room for his people; he hath not only shaken the world, as he then did, but he hath shaken the church, that is, the Jewish nation, and shaken them in their church state, which was in Old Testament times a heaven upon earth: this their heavenly spiritual state he hath now shaken. It is by the Gospel from heaven that God shook to pieces the civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jewish nation, and introduced a new state of the church that cannot be removed, shall never be changed for any other on earth, but shall remain till it be made perfect in heaven.

2. When God speaks to men in the most excellent manner, the guilt of those that refuse him is the greater, and their punishment will be more unavoidable and intolerable; there is no escaping, no bearing it, ver. 25. The different manner of God's dealing with men under the Gospel in a way of grace assures us that he will deal with the despisers of the Gospel after a different manner than he does with other men in a way of judgment. The glory of the Gospel, which should greatly recommend it to our regard, appears in these three things:—1st. It was by sound of the gospel trumpet that the former dispensation and state of the church of God was shaken and removed. And shall we despise that voice of God that pulled down a church and state of so long standing, and of God's own building? 2nd. It was by the sound of the gospel trumpet that a new kingdom is erected for God in the world, that can never be so shaken as to be removed. This was a change made once for all, no other change after it till time shall be no more. We have now received a kingdom that cannot be moved, shall never be removed, never give way to any new dispensation. The canon of Scripture is now perfected; the spirit of prophecy is ceased; the mystery of God finished; he has put his last hand to it. The gospel church may be made more large, more prosperous, more purified from contracted pollution; but it shall never be altered for another dispensation; they that perish under the Gospel perish without remedy. And from hence the apostle justly concludes, First. How necessary it is for us to obtain grace from God to serve him acceptably. If we be not accepted of God under this dispensation, we shall never be accepted at all; and we lose all our labour in religion if we be not accepted of God. Secondly. We cannot worship God acceptably unless we worship him with godly reverence and fear. As faith, so holy fear, is necessary to acceptable worship. Thirdly. It is only the grace of God that enables us to worship God in a right manner. Nature cannot come up to it; it can neither produce that precious faith nor that holy fear that is necessary to acceptable worship. Fourthly. God is the same just and righteous God under the Gospel as he appeared to be under the law. Though he be our God in Christ, and now deals with us in a more kind and gracious way, yet he is in himself a consuming fire; that is, a God of strict justice, and will avenge himself on all the despisers of his grace, and upon all apostates. Under the Gospel the justice of God appears in a more awful manner, though not in so sensible a manner as under the law. For here we behold Divine justice seizing upon the Lord Jesus Christ, and making him a propitiatory sacrifice, his soul and body an offering for sin, which is a display of justice far beyond what was seen and heard on mount Sinai when the law was given.

CHAPTER XIII.

The apostle having treated largely of Christ, and faith, and free grace, and gospel privileges, and warned the Hebrews against apostasy, now in the close of all recommends several duties to them, as the proper fruits of faith, ver. 1—17; then bespeaks their prayers for him, and offers up his prayers to God for them, gives them some hope of seeing himself and Timothy, and ends with the general salutation and benediction, ver. 18—25.

ET brotherly love continue. 2 Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares. 3 Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body. 4 Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled: but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have: for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. 6 So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me. 7 Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation: 8 Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever. 9 Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines. For it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein. 10 We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. 11 For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. 12 Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. 13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. 14 For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. 15 By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name. 16 But to do good and to communicate

ALTAR OF BURNT OFFERINGS.

"fail of the grace of God" he has "falling short of the grace of God."

xii. 16, 17. "Esau found no place of repentance:" this is frequently understood as applying to a change of purpose on the part of Isaac. The tears of Esau did not avail to reverse the blessing once given. It seems, however, more natural, and more in harmony with the context, to refer his "repentance" to Esau himself. He "found no place of repentance:" he found no place, or scope, of reaching a higher tone of moral feeling, "though he sought it"—not the repentance, but the blessing. "He stands as the type of him who wantonly turns away and rejects, with carnal and sensual mind, the blessings of God's spiritual covenant" (Delitzsch, in Lange). Even in his more hopeful state of mind, it was the blessing, not the moral good, of which he regretted the loss.

xii. 20. The words "thrust through with a dart" are not found in any of the ancient MSS.

forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. 17 Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you.

The design of Christ in giving himself for us is, that he may purchase to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Now, the apostle calls the believing Hebrews to the performance of many excellent duties in which it becomes Christians to excel.

First. To "brotherly love," ver. 1. By which he does not only mean a general affection to all men as our brethren by nature, all made of the same blood, nor that more limited affection that is due to those that are of the same immediate parents, but that special and spiritual affection which ought to be among the children of God.

1. It is here supposed that the Hebrews had this love one for another. Though at this time that nation was miserably divided and distracted among themselves, both about matters of religion and the civil state, yet there was true brotherly love left among those of them that believed on Christ. And this appeared in a very eminent manner presently after the shedding forth of the Holy Ghost, when they had all things in common, and sold their possessions to make a general fund of subsistence to their brethren. The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of love; faith works by love. The true religion is the strongest bond of friendship; if it be not so, it has its name for nothing.

2. This brotherly love was in danger of being lost, and that in a time of persecution, when it would be most necessary. It was in danger of being lost by those disputes that were among them concerning the respect they ought still to have to the ceremonies of the Mosaic law. Disputes about religion too often produce a decay of Christian affection; but this must be guarded against, and all proper means used to preserve brotherly love. Christians should always love and live as brethren; and the more they grow in devout affection to God their heavenly Father, the more they will grow in love to one another for his sake.

Secondly. To hospitality; ver. 2, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers." We must add to brotherly kindness charity. Where observe,

1. The duty required. "To entertain strangers;" both those that are strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to our persons, especially those that know themselves to be strangers here, and are seeking another country, which is the case of the people of God, and was so at this time; the believing Jews were in a desperate and distressed condition. But he seems to speak of strangers as such; though we know not who they are, nor whence they come, yet, seeing they are without any certain dwelling-place, we should allow them room in our hearts, and in our houses, as we have opportunity and ability.

2. The motive. "Thereby some have entertained angels unawares." So Abraham did, Gen. xviii., and Lot, Gen. xix. And one of those that Abraham entertained was the Son of God. And though we cannot suppose this will ever be our case, yet what we do to strangers in obedience to him he will reckon and reward as done to himself; Mat. xxv. 35., "I was a stranger, and ye took me in." God has often bestowed honours and favours upon his hospitable servants, beyond all their thoughts, unawares.

Thirdly. To Christian sympathy; ver. 3, "Remember those that are in bonds," &c. Where observe,

1. The duty to "remember those that are in bonds," and adversity. 1st. God oftentimes orders it so that, while some Christians and churches are in adversity, others enjoy peace and liberty. All are not called at the same time to resist unto blood. 2nd. Those that are themselves at liberty must sympathize with "those that are in bonds" and adversity, as if they were bound with them in the same chain. They must feel the sufferings of their brethren.

2. The reason of the duty. "As being yourselves in the body;" not only in the body natural, and so liable to the like sufferings, (and you should sympathize with them now, that others may sympathize with you when your time of trial comes,) but in the same mystical body, under the same head: "And if one member suffer, all the rest suffer with it," 1 Cor. xii. 26. It would be unnatural in Christians not to bear each other's burthens.

Fourthly. To purity and chastity, ver. 4. Where you have,

1. A recommendation of God's ordinance of marriage, that it is honourable in all, and ought to be esteemed by all, and not denied to those to whom God has not denied it. It is honourable, for God instituted it for man in paradise, knowing it was not good for him to be alone. He married and blessed the first couple, the first parents of mankind, to direct all to look unto God in that great concern, and to marry in the Lord. Christ honoured marriage with his presence and first miracle. It is honourable, as a means to prevent impurity, and a defiled bed; it is honourable and happy when persons come together pure and chaste, and preserve the marriage bed undefiled, not only from unlawful but inordinate affections.

2. A dreadful but just censure of impurity and lewdness; "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge." 1st. God knows who are guilty of such sins; no darkness can hide them from him. 2nd. He will call such sins by their proper names, not by the names of love and gallantry, but of whoredom and adultery; whoredom in the single state, and adultery in the married state. 3rd. He will bring them into judgment. He will judge them either by their own consciences here, and set their sins in order before them for their deep humiliation, (and conscience when awakened will be very severe upon such sinners,) or he will set them at his tribunal at death and in the last day, and convict them, and condemn them, and cast them out for ever, if they die under the guilt of this sin.

Fifthly. To Christian contentment, ver. 5, 6. Where observe,

1. The sin that is contrary to this grace and duty, and that is covetousness; an over-eager desire of the wealth of this world, envying those that have more than we. This sin we must allow no place in our conversation; for though it be a secret lust lurking in the heart, if it be not subdued it will enter into our conversation, and discover itself in our manner of speaking and acting; we must take care not only to keep this sin down, but to root it out of our souls.

2. The duty and grace that is contrary to covetousness, and that is being satisfied and pleased with such things as we have, present things; for past things cannot be recalled, and future things are only in the hand of God. What God gives us from day to day we must be content with; though it fall short of what we have enjoyed heretofore, and though it do not come up to our expectations for the future, we must be content with our present lot, we must bring our minds to our present condition, and this is the sure way to contentment; and they that cannot do it would not be contented though God should raise their condition to their minds, for the mind would rise with the condition. Haman was the great court favourite, and yet not contented; Ahab on the throne, and yet not contented; Adam in paradise, and yet not contented; yea, the angels in heaven, and yet not contented; but Paul, though abased and empty, had learned in every state, in any state, therewith to be content.

3. What reason Christians have to be contented with their present lot. 1st. "God hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," ver. 5, 6. This was said to Joshua, ch. i. 5., but belongs to all the faithful servants of God; Old Testament promises may be applied to New Testament saints. This promise contains the sum and substance of the promises; "I will never," no never, "leave thee, nor" ever "forsake thee." Here are no less than five negatives heaped together to confirm the promise. The true believer shall have the gracious presence of God with him in life, at death, and for ever. 2nd. From this comprehensive promise they may assure themselves of help from God; ver. 6, "So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what men shall do unto me." Men can do nothing against God, and God can make all that men do against his people to turn to their good.

Sixthly. To the duty Christians owe to their ministers; and that both to those that are dead and to those that are yet alive.

1. To those that are dead; ver. 7, "Remember them that have had the rule of you," &c. Where observe,

1st. The description given of them. They were such as had the rule over them, and had spoken to them the word of God; their guides and governors, who had spoken to them the word of God. Here is the dignity to which they were advanced; to be rulers and leaders of the people, not according to their own will, but the will and word of God; and this character they filled up with suitable duty. They did not rule at a distance, and rule by others; but they ruled by personal presence and instruction according to the word of God.

2nd. The duty owing to them even when they were dead.

First. Remember them, their preaching, their praying, their private counsel, their example.

Secondly. Follow their faith; be steadfast in the profession of that faith they preached to you, and labour after that grace of faith by which they lived and died so well. Consider the end of their conversation, how quickly, how comfortably, how joyfully, they finished their course. Now this duty of following the same true faith in which they had been instructed the apostle enlarges much upon, and presses them earnestly to it, not only from the remembrance of their faithful deceased guides, but from several other motives.

1st. From the immutability and eternity of the Lord Jesus Christ. Though their ministers were some dead, others dying, yet the great Head and High Priest of the church, the bishop of their souls, ever lives, and is ever the same; and they should be steadfast and immovable in imitation of Christ, and should remember that Christ ever lives to observe and reward their faithful adherence to his truths, and to observe and punish their sinful departure from him. Christ is the same in the Old Testament day, in the gospel day, and will be so to his people for ever.

2nd. From the nature and tendency of those erroneous doctrines that they were in danger of falling in with. (1) They were divers and various, ver. 9; different from what they had received from their former faithful teachers, and inconsistent with themselves. (2) They were strange doctrines, such as the gospel church was unacquainted with, foreign to the Gospel. (3) They were of an unsettling, distracting nature, like the wind by which the ship is tossed, and in danger of being driven from its anchor, and carried away and split upon the rocks. They were quite contrary to that grace of God that fixes and establishes the heart, which is an excellent thing. These strange doctrines keep the heart always fluctuating and unsettled.

[1. The ground of devising and urging of superstitious ceremonies is the unquietness and unstableness of men's hearts wanting satisfaction in God and his ordinances; and therefore seeking to support themselves by means of their own devising. 2. It is the doctrine of justification by grace only, and nothing of our doings, which getteth true rest to our hearts, and quiet settling to the consciences.]

(4) They are mean and low as to their subject; they are about external, little, perishing things, such as meats and drinks, &c. (5) They were unprofitable. Those that were most taken with them, and employed about them, got no real good by them to their own souls; they did not make them more holy, nor more humble, nor more thankful, nor more heavenly. (6) They would exclude those that embraced them from the privileges of the Christian altar; ver. 10, "We have an altar," &c. This is an argument of great weight, and therefore the apostle insists the longer upon it. Observe, (1st.) The Christian church has its altar. It was objected against the primitive Christians that their assemblies were destitute of an altar, but that was not true. "We have an altar," not a material altar, but a personal one, and that is Christ; he is both our altar and our sacrifice; he sanctifies the gift. The altars under the law were types of Christ; the brazen altar of the sacrifice, the golden altar of his intercession. (2nd.) This altar furnishes out a feast for true believers; a feast upon the sacrifice, a feast of fat things; spiritual strength, and growth, and holy delight, and pleasure. The Lord's table is not our altar, but it is furnished with provision from the altar, "Christ our passover for us," 1 Cor. v. 7; and it follows, "Therefore let us keep the feast." The Lord's supper is the feast of the gospel passover. (3) Those that adhere to the tabernacle, or the Levitical dispensation, or return to it again, exclude themselves from the privileges of this altar, from the benefits purchased by Christ. If they serve the tabernacle, they are resolved to subject themselves to antiquated rites and ceremonies, to renounce their right to the Christian altar; and this part of the argument he first proves and then improves. [1.] He proves that this servile adherence to the Jewish state is a bar to the privileges of the gospel altar. And he argues thus under the Jewish law:—No part of the sin offering was to be eaten, but all must be burned without the camp, while they dwelt in tabernacles, and without the gates when they dwelt in cities. Now if they will still be subject to that law, they cannot eat at the gospel altars; for that which is eaten there is furnished from Christ, who is the great sin offering. Not that it is the very sin offering itself, as the papists affirm, for then it was not to be eaten, but burned; but the gospel feast is the fruit and procurement of the sacrifice, which they have no right to that do not acknowledge the sacrifice itself.

[In that he saith, They have no right to eat, learn, 1. That Jesus is our food who believe in him, by whom our souls are kept alive, and maintained every day spiritually, as the priests were maintained by the old altar bodily. 2. That before a man attains to eat, or draw benefit from Christ, he must have a right unto him. There is a possession following the right, and the right tendeth to the possession. 3. He who loveth to have the right must take the course which Christ prescribeth, without mixing any thing therewith.]

And that it might appear that Christ was really the antitype of the sin offering, and as such might sanctify or cleanse his people with his own blood, he conformed himself to the type in suffering without the gate. A great degree this was of his humiliation, as if he had not been fit either for sacred or civil society! And this shews, [1st.] How sin, which was the meritorious cause of the sufferings of Christ, is a forfeiture of all sacred and civil rights, and the sinner a common plague and nuisance to all society, if God should be strict

xii. 28. For "moved" read "shaken." The word is the same as in verses 26, 27. "Let us have grace," or thankfulness, "whereby let us serve God acceptably, with reverent fear; for indeed 'our God is,'" &c.

xiii. 4. "Marriage;" the word used here is employed elsewhere in the New Testament to denote the wedding and its celebration. Alford renders "your marriage;" "Let your marriage be held in honour in all things."

xiii. 7. "Them which have;" or, rather, "which had the rule over you—your leaders." "Who have spoken;" better, "who spoke." "Whose faith follow, considering;" Alford inverts these two clauses, and translates, "The end of whose life is their death by martyrdom—e.g., Stephen and James."

xiii. 8. Supply "is;" "Jesus Christ is the same." The reference to verse 7 is in the form of an encouragement.

to mark iniquity. [2nd.] [How basely soever men did use Christ's body in casting of it without the city, yet was his blood in high estimation with God; it made atonement for the people, and sanctified them.] And having thus shewed that adherence to the Levitical law would, even according to its own rules, debar men from the Christian altar, he proceeds, [2.] To improve this argument, ver. 13—15, in suitable advice. [1st.] "Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp;" go forth from the ceremonial law, from sin, from the world, from ourselves, our very bodies, when he calls us. [2nd.] Let us be willing to "bear his reproach;" be willing to be accounted the outcasts of all things, not worthy to live, not worthy to die a common death. This was his reproach, and we must submit to it. And we have the more reason, because, whether we go forth from this world to Christ or no, we must necessarily go forth in a little time by death; for here we have no continuing city. Sin, sinners, death, will not suffer us to continue long here; and therefore we should go forth now by faith, and seek in Christ that rest and settlement that this world cannot afford us, ver. 14. [3rd.] Let us make a right use of this altar; not only partake of the privilege of it, but discharge the duties of the altar, as those that Christ has made priests to attend on this altar. Let us bring our sacrifices to this altar, and to this our High Priest, and offer them up by him, ver. 15, 16. Now what are the sacrifices which we must bring and offer on this altar, even Christ? not any expiatory sacrifices, there is no need of them. Christ has offered the great sacrifice of atonement; ours are only the sacrifices of acknowledgment, and they are, [1st.] The sacrifice of praise to God, which we should offer up to God continually. In this is included all adoration and prayer, as well as thanksgiving; this is the fruit of our lips; we must speak forth the praises of God from unfeigned lips. And this must be only offered to God, not to angels or saints, or any creature but to the name of God alone; and it must be by Christ, in a dependence upon his meritorious satisfaction and intercession. [2nd.] The sacrifice of alms deeds and Christian charity; ver. 16, "To do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." We must, according to our power, communicate to the necessities of the souls and bodies of men; not contenting ourselves to offer the sacrifice of our lips, mere words, but the sacrifice of good deeds. And these we must lay down upon this altar, not depending upon the merit of our good deeds, but of our great High Priest; and with such sacrifices as these, adoration and alms thus offered up, God is well pleased. He will accept the offering with pleasure, and will accept and bless the offerers through Christ.

2. Having thus told us the duty Christians owe to their deceased ministers, which principally consist in following their faith, and not departing from it, the apostle tells us what is the duty that people owe to their living ministers, in ver. 17, and the reasons of that duty.

1st. The duty to obey them, and submit themselves to them. It is not an implicit obedience nor absolute submission that is here required, but only so far as is agreeable to the mind and will of God revealed in his word; and yet it is truly obedience and submission, and that not only to God, but to the authority of the ministerial office, which is of God as certainly, in all things belonging to that office, as the authority of parents or the civil magistrate in the things within their sphere. Christians must submit to be instructed by their ministers, and not think themselves too wise, or too good, or too great to learn from them; and when they find that ministerial instructions are agreeable to the written word, they must obey them.

2nd. The motives to this duty. First. They have the rule over the people. Their office, though not magisterial, yet it is truly authoritative. They have no authority to lord it over the people, but to lead them in the ways of God, by informing and instructing them, explaining the word of God to them, and applying it to their several cases. They were not to make laws of their own, but to interpret the laws of God. Nor is their interpretation to be immediately received without examination, but the people must search the Scriptures; and so far as the instructions of their ministers are according to that rule, they ought as receive them; not as the word of men, but, as they are indeed, the word of God, that works effectually in those that believe. Secondly. They watch for the souls of the people, not to ensnare them, but to save them; not to gain them to themselves, but to Christ; to build them up in knowledge, faith, and holiness. They are to watch against every thing that may be hurtful to the souls of men, and to give them warning of dangerous errors, of the devices of Satan, of approaching judgments; they are to watch for all opportunities of helping the souls of men forward in the way to heaven. Thirdly. They must give an account how they have discharged their duty, and what is become of the souls committed to their trust; whether any have been lost through their neglect, and whether any of them have been brought in and built up under their ministry. Fourthly. They would be glad to give a good account of themselves and their hearers. If they can then give in an account of their own fidelity and success, it will be a joyful day to them; those souls that have been converted and confirmed under their ministry will be their joy and their crown in the day of the Lord Jesus. Fifthly. If they give up their account with grief, it will be the people's loss as well as theirs. It is the interest of hearers that the account their ministers give of them may be with joy and not with grief. If faithful ministers be not successful, the grief will be theirs, but the loss will be the people's. Faithful ministers have delivered their own souls, but a fruitless and faithless people's blood and ruin will be upon their own heads.

18 Pray for us: for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly. 19 But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner. 20 Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, 21 Make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is wellpleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen. 22 And I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation: for I have written a letter unto you in few words. 23 Know ye that our brother

Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you. 24 Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints. They of Italy salute you. 25 Grace be with you all. Amen.

Here, First. The apostle recommends himself and his fellow-sufferers to the prayers of the Hebrew believers; ver. 18, "Pray for us," for me and Timothy, mentioned ver. 23, and for all those of us that labour in the ministry of the Gospel.

1. This is one part of the duty people owe to their ministers. They need the prayers of the people; and the more earnestly the people pray for their ministers the more benefit they may expect to reap from their ministry. They should pray that God would teach those that are to teach them; that he would make them vigilant, and wise, and zealous, and successful; that he would assist them in all their labours, support them under all their burthens, and strengthen them under all their temptations.

2. There are good reasons why people should pray for their ministers. He mentions two:—1st. "We trust we have a good conscience," &c. ver. 18. Many of the Jews had an ill opinion of Paul, because he, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews, had cast off the Levitical law, and preached up Christ. Now he here modestly asserts his own integrity; "We trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly;" "We trust," he might have said, "We know," but he chose to speak in a humble style, to teach us all not to be too confident of ourselves, but to maintain a godly jealousy over our own hearts. "We trust we have a good conscience," an enlightened and well-informed conscience, a clean and pure conscience, a tender and faithful conscience, a conscience testifying for us, not against us. "A good conscience in all things," in the duties both of the first and second table, towards God and towards men, and especially "in all things" pertaining to our ministry; we would act honestly and sincerely in all things. Observe, First. "A good conscience" has respect to all God's commands, and all our duty. Secondly. That those that have this good conscience yet need the prayers of others. Thirdly. Conscientious ministers are public blessings, and deserve the prayers of the people. 2nd. Another reason why he desires their prayers is, that he hoped thereby to be the sooner restored to them, ver. 19, intimating he had been formerly among them, that now he was absent from them, that he had a great desire and real intention to come again to them; and that the best way to facilitate his return to them, and to make it a mercy to him and them, was to make it the matter of their prayer. When ministers come to a people as a return of prayer, they come with greater satisfaction to themselves and success to the people. We should fetch in all our mercies by prayer.

Secondly. He offers up his prayers to God for them, being willing to do for them as he desired they should do for him; ver. 20, "Now the God of peace," &c. In this excellent prayer observe,

1. The title given to God, "The God of peace," who has found out a way for peace and reconciliation between himself and sinners, and who loves peace on earth, and especially in his churches.

2. The great work ascribed to him. He hath "brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus," &c. Jesus raised himself by his own power, and yet the Father was concerned in it, attesting thereby that justice was satisfied, and the law fulfilled. He rose again for our justification; and that Divine power by which he was raised is able to do every thing for us that we stand in need of.

3. The titles given to Christ. Our Lord Jesus, our Sovereign and our Saviour, and the great Shepherd of the sheep, promised in Isa. xl. 11; declared by himself to be so, Jno. x. 14, 15. Ministers are under-shepherds; Christ is the Great Shepherd. This denotes his interest in his people,—they are the flock of his pasture; and his care and concern for them,—he feeds them, and leads them, and watches over them.

4. The way and method in which God is reconciled, and Christ raised from the dead, through the blood of the everlasting covenant. The blood of Christ satisfied Divine justice, and so procured Christ's release from the prison of the grave, as having paid our debt, according to an eternal covenant or agreement between the Father and the Son; and this blood is the sanction and seal of an everlasting covenant between God and his people.

5. The mercy prayed for; ver. 21, "Make you perfect in every good work," &c. Observe, 1st. The perfection of the saints "in every good work" is the great thing desired by them, and for them, that they may here have a perfection of integrity, a clear mind, a clean heart, lively affections, regular and resolved wills, and suitable strength for every good work to which they are called now, and at length a perfection of degrees to fit them for the employment and felicity of heaven. 2nd. The way in which God makes his people perfect. It is by working in them always what is "pleasing in his sight," and that "through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever." Observe, First. There is no good thing wrought in us but it is the work of God; he works in us before we are fit for any good work. Secondly. No good thing is wrought in us by God but "through Jesus Christ," for his sake, and by his Spirit. And therefore, Thirdly. Eternal glory is due to him who is the cause of all the good principles wrought in us, and all the good works done by us; and to this every one should say, "Amen."

Thirdly. He gives the Hebrews an account of Timothy's liberty, and hopes of seeing them with him in a little time, ver. 23. It seems Timothy had been a prisoner, doubtless for the Gospel, but now he was set at liberty. The imprisonment of faithful ministers is an honour to them, and their enlargement matter of joy to the people. He was pleased with the hopes of not only seeing Timothy, but seeing the Hebrews with him. Opportunities of writing to the churches of Christ are desired by the faithful ministers of Christ, and pleasant to them.

Fourthly. Having given a brief account of this his letter, and begged their attention to it, ver. 22, he closes with salutations, and a solemn, though short, benediction.

1. The salutation. 1st. From himself to them, directed to all their ministers that had the rule over them, and to all the saints; to them all, ministers and people. 2nd. From the Christians in Italy to them. It is a good thing to have the law of holy love and kindness written in the hearts of Christians one towards another. Religion teaches men the truest civility and good breeding. It is not a sour or morose thing.

2. The solemn, though short, benediction; ver. 25, "Grace be with you all. Amen." Let the favour of God be towards, and his grace continually working in, you, and with you, bringing forth the fruits of holiness, as the first-fruits of glory. When the people of God have been conversing together by word or writing, it is good to part with prayer, desiring for each other the continuance of the gracious presence of God, that they may meet together again in the world of praise.

xiii. 10. "The apostle did not mean that they who served the tabernacle had no right to believe in Christ, but that they who served the tabernacle, not believing in Christ, or adhering too closely to the legal oblations, had no right or title to partake of the sacrifice or atonement made by Christ. The thought is similar to that in Gal. v. 2—4" (Waterland, quoted in Webster and Wilkinson).

xiii. 19. "I beseech you the rather:" or, "I the more abundantly beseech you to do this, that," &c.

xiii. 20. A different connection is given to the clauses of this verse by the change of order adopted by Alford. "The God of peace, that brought up from the dead, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, the great Shepherd," &c. "From the dead:" "This is the only place," says Delitzsch, "where our author mentions the resurrection. Everywhere else he lifts his eyes from the depth of our Lord's humiliation, passing over all that is intermediate, to the highest point of his exaltation."

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

THE writer of this epistle was not James the son of Zebedee, for he was put to death by Herod, Acts xii., before Christianity had gained so much ground among the Jews of the dispersion as is here implied; but it was the other James, the son of Alphaeus, who was cousin-german to Christ, and one of the twelve apostles, Mat. x. 3. He is called "a pillar," Gal. ii. 9; and this epistle of his cannot be disputed without loosening a foundation stone. [Some writers hold that three persons bearing this name (James) are mentioned in the New Testament, namely, 1. James, the son of Joseph and Mary, called the brother of our Lord; 2. James, the son of Zebedee; 3. James, the son of Alphaeus. Those who adopt this opinion suppose that the one first-named was the author of this epistle: see Rosenmüller, Scholia in N. T.] It is called a "general epistle," because, as some think, not directed to any particular person or church; but such a one as we call a circular letter. Others think it is called general or catholic, to distinguish it from the epistles of Ignatius, Barnabas, Polycarp, and others that were noted in the primitive times, but not generally received in the church, and on that account not canonical, as this is. Eusebius tells us that this epistle was generally read in the churches with the other catholic epistles.—Hist. Eccles. p. 53, Ed. Valer., Anno. 1678. [Noesselt says that the name was originally given to 1 John and 1 Peter to distinguish these from others of the same writers, whose authority was for a time doubted; afterwards, when the name was given to the epistles of James and Jude, it was intended to distinguish them from the epistles of Paul. A catholic epistle, therefore, is a legitimate one, and universally recognized as such. Legitima omniumque consensu probata.] St. James, our author, was called the just, for his great piety. He was an eminent example of those graces which he presses upon others. He was so exceedingly revered for his justice, temperance and devotion, that Josephus the Jewish historian records it as one of the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem, 'that St. James was martyred in it.' This is mentioned in hope of procuring the greater regard to what is penned by so holy and excellent a man. The time when this epistle was written is uncertain. [Biblical critics generally are agreed that this epistle was written about A.D. 61. Its canonical authority has been questioned, but without reason. Luther called it a "strawy epistle," and rejected it from the canon of Scripture, on account of its supposed opposition to the great doctrine of justification by grace only; thus giving a lamentable instance of the rashness into which the best of men may be betrayed by zeal without knowledge. Clement of Rome alludes to it; Origen quotes it as genuine, as also do Jerome, Athanasius, and many others of the fathers. It is found in all the ancient catalogues and the Syriac translation, made near the close of the first century, or beginning of the second. Nor is the internal evidence of its authenticity less strong than the external. Beyond a doubt it is a part of the precious word of God.] The design of it is to reprove Christians for their great degeneracy both in faith and manners; and to prevent the spreading of those libertine doctrines which threatened the destruction of all practical godliness, (particulars shall be laid down in the contents at the beginning of each chapter.) It was also a special intention of the author of this epistle to awaken the Jewish nation to a sense of the greatness and nearness of those judgments which were coming upon them; and to support all true Christians in the way of their duty, under those calamities and persecutions they might meet with. The truths laid down are very momentous and necessary to be maintained; and the rules for practice as here stated are such as ought to be observed in our times as well as in preceding ages.

A.D. 60.

CHAPTER I.

After the inscription and salutation, ver. 1, Christians are taught how to carry it when under the cross. Several graces and duties are recommended; and those who endure their trials and afflictions, as the apostle here directs, are pronounced blessed, and are assured of a glorious reward, ver. 2—12. But those sins which bring sufferings, or those weaknesses and faults men are chargeable with under them, are by no means to be imputed to God, who cannot be the author of sin, but is the author of all good, ver. 13—18. All passion and rash anger, and vile affections, ought to be suppressed. The word of God should be made our chief study; and what we hear and know of it we must take care to practice, otherwise our religion will prove but a vain thing. To which is added an account wherein pure religion consists, ver. 19—27.

JAMES, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting. 2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; 3 Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. 4 But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. 5 If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. 6 But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. 7 For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord. 8 A double minded man is unstable in all his ways. 9 Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted: 10 But the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. 11 For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways. 12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.

We are here to consider, first the inscription of this epistle, and then the matter of it.

First. The inscription has three principal parts.

1. The character by which our author desires to be known; "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." Though he was a prime

* By the Rev. Dr. S. Wright. Revised by the Rev. Dr. Forsyth, one of the professors of Princeton College, United States.

Introductory Note.—It is generally allowed that "James the Lord's brother" (Gal. i. 19) was the writer of this epistle; but there is great doubt if he can be identified with "James the son of Alphaeus." Dean Alford thinks that the writer was "the Lord's brother," the eldest of the sons of Joseph and Mary, and therefore the cousin of the "son of Alphaeus." The epistle is addressed to believing Jews. It was written at Jerusalem, where St. James was head of the church. The date of writing is variously placed. Those who think that St. James wrote to correct the false notions of justification by faith, which had arisen from a perversion of St. Paul's teaching, place it as late as the year before St. James' martyrdom, which took place in A.D. 69. But others, with more probability, since the epistle contains no trace of the relation of Jew to Gentile in the church, refer it to a period anterior to the council held at Jerusalem A.D. 50 (Acts xv.). Its tone is hortatory, and at times threatening. Those to whom it is addressed had fallen into various errors. Their trials had not produced in them good minister in Christ's kingdom, yet he styles himself only a servant. Note here, that those who are highest in office or attainments in the church of Christ yet are but servants; they should not therefore act as masters, but as ministers. Farther, though St. James is called by the evangelist the brother of our Lord, yet it was his glory to serve Christ in the spirit rather than to boast of his being akin according to the flesh. From hence let us learn to prize this title above all others in the world, the "servants of God and of Christ." Again, it is to be observed that St. James professes himself a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to teach us that in all services we should have an eye to the Son as well as the Father. We cannot acceptably serve the Father unless we are also servants of the Son. God will have "all men to honour the Son as they honour the Father," Jno. v. 23; looking for acceptance in Christ, and assistance from him, and yielding all obedience to him, thus "confessing that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

2. The apostle here mentions the condition of those to whom he writes; "The twelve tribes which are scattered abroad." Some understand this of the dispersion upon the persecution of Stephen, Acts viii.; but that only reached to Judæa and Samaria. Others, by the Jews of the dispersion understand those that were in Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, and other kingdoms into which their wars had driven them. The greatest part indeed of ten of the twelve tribes were lost in captivity; but yet some of every tribe were preserved, and are still honoured with the ancient style of "twelve tribes." [The twelve tribes scattered abroad, or the Jews of the dispersion, Jno. vii. 35, were, in general, those families who at various times, and from various causes, had removed from Judæa, and were permanently settled in other countries. The great body of the ten tribes never returned from their captivity, and many of those who were carried to Babylon remained in that region. From the days of Alexander the Great large numbers emigrated from Judæa for purposes of trade; and at the time when James wrote the Jews were numerous in all the chief seats of commerce in Asia, Africa, and Europe.] These, however, were scattered and dispersed. 1st. They were dispersed in mercy. Having the Scriptures of the Old Testament, the providence of God so ordered it, that they were scattered in several countries for the diffusing of the light of Divine revelation. 2nd. They began now to be scattered in wrath. The Jewish nation was crumbling into parties and factions, and many were forced to leave their own country, as being now grown too hot for them; even good people among them shared in the common calamity. 3rd. These Jews of the dispersion were those that had embraced the Christian faith. They were persecuted and forced to seek for shelter in other countries, the Gentiles being kinder to Christians than the Jews were. Note here, that it is often the lot even of God's own tribes to be "scattered abroad." The gathering day is reserved for the end of time, when all the dispersed children of God shall be gathered together to Christ their head. In the mean time, while God's tribes are scattered abroad, he will send to look after them. Here is an apostle writing to the scattered; an epistle from God to them, when driven away from his temple, and seemingly neglected by him. Apply here that of the prophet Ezekiel, Eze. xi. 16, "Thus saith the Lord God, Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come." God hath a particular care of his outcasts; "Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab," Isa. xvi. 3, 4. God's tribes may be scattered, therefore we should not value ourselves too much on outward privileges. And, on the other hand, we should not despond and think ourselves rejected, under outward calamities, because God does remember and send comfort to his scattered people.

3. St. James here shews the respect he had even for the dispersed. Greeting, saluting them, wishing peace and salvation to them. True Christians should not be the less valued for their hardships. It was the desire of this apostle's heart that those who were scattered yet might be comforted; that they might do well and fare well, and be enabled to rejoice even in their distresses. God's people have reason to rejoice in all places, and at all times, as will abundantly appear from what follows.

Secondly, We next come to consider the matter of this epistle. And in the verses now before us we have these following things to be observed:—

1. The suffering state of Christians in this world is represented, and that in a very instructive manner, if we attend to what is plainly and necessarily implied, together with what is fully expressed. 1st. It is implied that troubles and afflictions may be the lot of the best Christians, even of those who have the most reason to think and hope well of themselves. Such as have a title to the greatest joy yet may endure very grievous afflictions. As good people are liable to be scattered, they must not think it strange if they meet with troubles. 2nd. These outward afflictions and troubles are temptations to them. The devil endeavours by sufferings and crosses to draw men to sin, and to deter them from duty, or unfit them for it; but, as our afflictions are in God's hand, they are intended for the trial and improvement of our graces. The gold is put into the furnace that it may be purified. 3rd. These temptations may be numerous and various; "divers temptations," as the apostle speaks. Our trials may be of many and different kinds, and therefore we have need to put on the whole armour of God. We must be armed on every side, because temptations lie on all sides. 4th. The trials of a good man are such as he does not create to himself, or sinfully pull upon himself; but they are such as he is said to "fall into," and for this reason they are the better borne by him. [The word "fall into" is the same as that used Lu. x. 30, "fall among." To court or rush into trials is both foolish and sinful; it is to tempt God. We must just leave ourselves in the hands of our gracious God and Father.]

2. The graces and duties of a state of trial and affliction are here pointed out to us; and could we attend to these things, and grow in them as we should do, how good would it be for us to be afflicted!

1st. One Christian grace to be exercised is joy; "Count it all joy," ver. 2. We must not sink into a sad and disconsolate frame of mind, that would make us faint under our trials, but must endeavour to keep our spirits dilated and enlarged, the better to take in a true sense of our case, and with greater advantage to set ourselves to make the best of it. Philosophy may instruct men to be calm under their troubles; but Christianity teaches them to be joyful, because such exercises proceed from love and not fury in God. In them we are conformable to Christ our head, and they become marks of our adoption; and by suffering in the ways of righteousness we are serving the interests of our Lord's kingdom among men, and edifying the body of Christ. And our trials will brighten our graces now, and our crown at last; therefore there is reason to count it all joy when trials and difficulties become our lot in the way of our duty. And this is not purely a New Testament paradox, but even in Job's time it was said, "Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth." There is the more reason for joy in afflictions if we consider the other graces that are promoted by them, Rom. v. 3, 5.

2nd. Faith is a grace that one expression supposes, and another expressly requires. "Knowing this, that the trial of your faith," ver. 3; and then, in ver. 5, Let him ask in faith. There must be a sound believing of the great truths of Christianity, and a resolute cleaving to them in times of trial. That faith which is spoken of here as tried by afflictions, consists in a belief of the power, and word, and promise of God, and in fidelity and constancy to the Lord Jesus. [The trial or trying of faith by means of afflictions of all kinds, and especially those endured for Christ's sake, at once proves its genuineness, its preciousness, and its strength. As the precious metal is proved to be such by the refiner's fire, so do outward trials evince the existence of precious faith. Nothing else can carry a man through them.]

3rd. There must be patience. The trial of faith "worketh patience." Trying of one grace produces another, and the more the suffering graces of a Christian are exercised the stronger they grow. "Tribulation worketh patience," Rom. v. 3. Now to exercise Christian patience aright we must, First, "Let it work." It is not a stupid but an active thing. A stoical apathy and a Christian patience are very different; by the one men become in some measure insensible of their afflictions, but by the other they become triumphant in and over them. Let us take care in times of trial that patience and not passion be set at work in us. Whatever is said or done let patience have the saying and doing of it; do not let the indulging of our passions hinder the operation and noble effects of patience; give it leave to work, and it will work wonders in a time of trouble. Secondly, We must let it have its perfect work: do nothing to limit it, or to weaken it, but let it have its full scope. If one affliction come upon the heels of another, and a train of them are drawn upon us, yet let patience go on till its work is perfected. When we hear all that God appoints, and as long as he appoints, and with a humble obedient eye to him, and when we not only bear troubles but rejoice in them, then patience hath its perfect work. Thirdly, When the work of patience is complete, then the Christian is entire, and nothing will be wanting. It will furnish us with all that is necessary for our Christian race and welfare, and will enable us to persevere to the end, and then its work will be ended, and crowned with glory. After we have abounded in other graces we "have need of patience," Heb. x. 36. But let patience have its perfect work, and we shall be "perfect and entire, wanting nothing," [free from all defects, possessing every grace. In this expression there seems to be an allusion to the sacrificial law, which required that the victims should be faultless, perfect.]

4th. Prayer is a duty recommended also to suffering Christians. And here the apostle shews, First, What we ought more especially to pray for, wisdom; "If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God." We should not pray so much for the removal of an affliction as for wisdom to make a right use of it. And who is there that does not want wisdom under any great trials or exercises, to guide him both in his judging of things and in the conduct of his own spirit and temper, and in the management of his affairs? To be wise in trying times is a special gift of God; and to him we must seek for it. Secondly, In what way this is to be obtained; namely, upon our petitioning or asking for it. Let the foolish become beggars at a throne of grace, and they are in a fair way to be wise. It is not said, Let such ask of man, nor of any man, but let him ask of God who made him, and gave him his understanding and reasonable powers at first; and of him in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Let us confess our want of wisdom to God, and daily ask it of him. Thirdly, We have the greatest encouragement to do this; he "giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not;" yea, it is expressly promised "it shall be given," ver. 5. Here is something in answer to every discouraging turn of the mind, when we go to God, under a sense of our own weakness and folly, to ask for wisdom. He to whom we are sent we are sure has it to give; and he is of a giving disposition, inclined to bestow this upon those that ask. And no fear of his favours being limited to some in this case, so as to exclude others, or any humble petitioning soul; for "he gives to all men." And if you should say you want a great deal of wisdom, a small portion will not serve your turn, why, he gives liberally; and lest you should be afraid of going to him unseasonably, or being put to shame for your folly, it is added, he "upbraideth not." Ask when you will, and as often as you will, you will meet with no upbraidings. And if, after all, any should say, This may be the case with some, but I fear I shall not succeed so well in my seeking for wisdom as some others may, let such consider how particular and express the promise is, "It shall be given him." Justly then must fools perish in their foolishness, if wisdom may be had for asking, and they will not pray to God for it. But, Fourthly, There is one thing necessary to be observed in our asking, namely, that we do it with a believing, steady mind; ver. 6, "Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." The promise above is very sure, taking this proviso along with us: wisdom shall be given to those that ask it of God, provided they believe that God is able to make the simple wise, and is faithful to make good his word to those that apply to him. This was the condition Christ insisted on, in treating with those that came to him for healing; "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" There must be no wavering, no staggering at the promise of God through unbelief, or through a sense of any disadvantages that lie on our own part. Here, therefore, we see,

5th. That oneness and sincerity of intention, and a steadiness of mind, is another duty required under affliction. "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed." To be sometimes lifted up by faith, and then thrown down again by distrust,—to mount sometimes towards the heavens, with an intention to secure glory, and honour, and immortality, and then to sink again in seeking the ease of the body, or the enjoyments of this world,—this is very fitly and elegantly compared to a wave of the sea that rises and falls, swells and sinks, just as the wind tosses it higher or lower, that way or this. A mind that has but one single and prevailing regard to its spiritual and eternal interest, and that keeps steady in its purposes for God, will grow wise by afflictions, will continue fervent in its devotions, and will be superior to all trials and oppositions. Now, for the cure of a wavering spirit and a weak faith, the apostle shews the ill effects of these. First, In that the success of prayer is spoiled hereby; ver. 7, "Let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord." Such a distrustful, shifting, unsettled person, is not likely to value a favour from God as he should do, and therefore cannot expect to receive it. In asking for Divine and heavenly wisdom we are never like to prevail if we have not a heart to prize it above rubies, and the greatest things in this world. Secondly, A wavering faith and spirit has an ill influence upon our conversations; ver. 8, "A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways." ["Double-minded" lit with two souls; that is, a man whose principles and sentiments are unfixed, who is one moment ready to give up all for Christ, and the next as ready to renounce him for the sake of present enjoyment.] When our faith and spirits rise and fall with second causes, there will be great unsteadiness in all our conversation and actions. This may sometimes expose men to contempt in the world; but it is certain such ways cannot please God, nor procure any good for us in the end. While we have but one God to trust to, we have but one God to be governed by; and this should keep us even and steady. He that is unstable as water shall not excel. Hereupon,

3. The holy humble temper of a Christian, both in advancement and debasement, is described; and both poor and rich are directed on what grounds to build their joy and comfort, ver. 9–11. Here we may observe, 1st. That those of low degree are to be looked upon as brethren; "Let the brother of low degree," &c. Poverty does not destroy the relation among Christians. 2nd. That good Christians may be rich in the world, ver. 10. Grace and wealth are not wholly inconsistent. Abraham, the father of the faithful, was rich in silver effects. "The characteristic of his readers was the lack of living faith—the falling asunder, as it has been well called, of knowledge and action, of head and heart" (Alford).

i. 1. "Servant:" implying devotion to God and his work. St. James only mentions our Lord twice in this epistle. Bengel suggests that "if he had often spoken of Jesus, it might have seemed that he did so from vanity, when he was the brother of the Lord." Another reason may be that the epistle is practical rather than doctrinal.

i. 2. "Temptations:" i.e., trials, or distresses of any kind, that are sent by God to test and purify the Christian's faith.

i. 3. "The trying of your faith:" "the proving of" (Wickliffe). "Worketh patience;" see Note on 2 Thess. iii. 5.

i. 5. Not "liberally," as in Authorised Version, but "simply," or "frankly"—that is to say, God gives without adding anything that might detract from the graciousness of the gift. "And upbraideth not;" "casteth no man in the teeth" (Tyndal, Cranmer, Geneva).

and gold. 3rd. That both these are allowed to rejoice. No condition of life puts us out of a capacity of rejoicing in God. If we do not rejoice in him always, it is our own fault. Those of low degree may rejoice, if they are exalted to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of God, (as Dr. Whitby explains this place.) And the rich may rejoice in humbling providences, as they produce a lowly and humble disposition of mind, which is highly valuable in the sight of God. Where any are made poor for righteousness' sake, their very poverty is their exaltation. It is an honour to be dishonoured for the sake of Christ; "To you it is given to suffer," Phil. i. 29. All that are brought low, and made lowly by grace, may rejoice in the prospect of their exaltation at last in heaven. 4th. What reason rich people have, notwithstanding their riches, to be humble and low in their own eyes, because both they and their riches are passing away. "As the flower of the grass he shall pass away," he and his wealth with him; ver. 11, "For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat" [scorching wind,] "but it withereth the grass" [καυσων]; most commentators understand by this term, not the heat of the rising sun, but a 'hot wind,' or a 'burning wind.' This wind often blows at sunrise, and, coming up from the hot deserts of Arabia, at once withers herbs and flowers.] Note hence, that worldly wealth is a withering thing. Riches are too uncertain, (says Mr. Baxter on this place,) too inconsiderable things, to make any great or just alteration in our minds. As a flower fades before the heat of the scorching sun, "so shall the rich man fade away in his ways." His projects, counsels, managements for this world, are called his ways here; in these he shall fade away. For this reason let him that is rich rejoice, not so much in the providence of God that makes him rich, as in the grace of God that makes and keeps him humble; and in those trials and exercises that teach him to seek his felicity in and from God, and not from these perishing enjoyments.

4. A blessing is pronounced on those who endure their exercises and trials as here directed; ver. 12, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation." Observe, 1st. It is not the man that suffers only who is blessed, but he that endures, who with patience and constancy goes through all difficulties in the way of his duty. 2nd. That afflictions cannot make us miserable, if it be not our own fault. A blessing may arise from them, and we may be blessed in them. They are so far from taking away a good man's felicity, that they really increase it. 3rd. That sufferings and temptations are the way to eternal blessedness. "When he is tried he shall receive the crown of life;" δοκιμος γενομενος, "when he is approved," when his graces are found to be true, and of the highest worth, (so metals are tried as to their excellency by the fire,) and his integrity is manifested, and all is approved of the great Judge. Note hence, that to be approved of God is the great aim of a Christian in all his trials; and it will be his blessedness at last, when he shall receive the crown of life. The tried Christian shall be a crowned one; and the crown he shall wear will be a crown of life. It will be life and bliss to him, and it will last for ever. We only bear the cross for awhile, but we shall wear the crown to eternity. 4th. That this blessedness and crown of life is a promised thing to the righteous sufferer. It is therefore what we may most surely depend upon; for, when "heaven and earth shall pass away," this word of God shall not fail of being fulfilled. But withal let us take notice that our future reward comes not as a debt, but by a gracious promise. 5th. That our enduring temptations must be from a principle of love to God, and to our Lord Jesus Christ, or otherwise we are not interested in this promise; "The Lord hath promised to them that love him." St. Paul supposes that a man may for some point of religion even give his body to be burnt, and yet not be pleasing to God, nor regarded by him, because of his want of charity, or a prevailing sincere love to God and man, 1 Cor. xiii. 3. 6th. The crown of life is promised not only to great and eminent saints, but to all those that have the love of God reigning in their hearts. Every soul that truly loves God shall have its trials in this world fully recompensed in that world above, where love is made perfect.

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man: 14 But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. 15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. 16 Do not err, my beloved brethren. 17 Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. 18 Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures.

We are here taught several things.

First. We are taught that God is not the author of any man's sin. Whoever they are that raise persecutions against good men, and whatever injustice and sin they may be guilty of in proceeding against them, God is not to be charged with it. And whatever sins good men may themselves be provoked to by their exercises and afflictions, God is not the cause of them. It seems to be here supposed that some professors might fall in the hour of temptation, that the rod resting upon them might carry some into ill courses, and make them "put forth their hands unto iniquity." But though this should be the case, and though such delinquents should attempt to lay their faults on God, yet the blame of their miscarriages must lie entirely upon themselves; for,

1. There is nothing in the nature of God that they can lay the blame upon. "Let no man say when he is tempted," (to take any evil course, or do any evil thing,) "I am tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evil." All moral evil is owing to some disorder in the being that is chargeable with it; either to want of wisdom, or want of power, or want of decorum and purity in the will. But who can impeach the holy God with the want of these, which are his very essence? No exigence of affairs can ever tempt him to dishonour or deny himself, and therefore he cannot be tempted with evil.

2. There is nothing in the providential dispensations of God that the blame of any man's sin can be laid upon; ver. 13, "Neither tempteth he any man." As God cannot be tempted with evil himself, so neither can he be a tempter of others. He cannot be a promoter of what is repugnant to his nature. The carnal mind is willing to charge its own sins on God. There is something hereditary in this. Our first father Adam tells God, that "the woman thou gavest me tempted me;" thereby, in effect, throwing the blame upon God, for giving him the tempter. Let no man speak thus: it is very bad to sin, but it is much worse when we have done amiss to charge it upon God, and say it was owing to him. They that lay the blame of their sins either upon their constitution or upon their condition in the world, or pretend they are under a fatal necessity of sinning, they wrong God, as if he was the author of sin. Afflictions as sent by God are designed to draw out our graces, but not our corruptions.

Secondly. We are taught where the true cause of evil lies, and where the blame ought to be laid; ver. 14, "Every man is tempted" (in an ill sense) "when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed." In other Scriptures the devil is called the tempter; and other things may sometimes concur to tempt us, but neither the devil nor any other person or thing is to be blamed so as to excuse ourselves. For the true original of evil and temptation is in our own hearts. The combustible matter is in us, though the flame may be blown up by some outward causes. And therefore, "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it," Pr. ix. 12. Observe here,

1. The method of sin in its proceeding. First it draws away, then entices. As holiness consists of two parts, forsaking that which is evil, and cleaving to that which is good, so these two things reversed are the two parts of sin. The heart is carried from that which is good, and enticed to cleave to that which is evil. It is first by corrupt inclinations, or by lusting after and coveting some sensual or worldly thing, estranged from the life of God, and then by degrees fixed in a course of sin. We may observe from hence,

2. The power and policy of sin. The word here rendered "drawn away" signifies a being forcibly haled or compelled. The word translated "enticed" signifies being "whedled and beguiled" by allurements and deceitful representations of things; ἐξαλαβόμενος καὶ δολιχόμενος. There is a great deal of force done to conscience and to the mind by the power of corruption; and there is a great deal of cunning, and deceit, and flattery in sin to gain us to its interests. The force and power of sin could never prevail, were it not for its cunning and guile. Sinners that perish are whedled and flattered into their own destruction, and this will justify God for ever in their damnation, that they destroyed themselves. Their sin lies at their own door, and therefore their blood will lie upon their own heads.

3. The success of corruption in the heart; ver. 15, "Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin;" that is, sin being allowed to excite desires in us, it will soon ripen those desires into consent; and then it is said to have conceived. The sin truly exists, though it be but in embryo; and when it is grown to its full size in the mind it is then brought forth in actual execution. Stop the beginnings of sin, therefore, or else all the evil it produces must be wholly charged upon us.

4. The final issue of sin, and how it ends; "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." After sin is brought forth in actual commissions, the finishing of it, as Dr. Manton observes, is its being strengthened by frequent acts, and settled into a habit. And when the iniquities of men are thus filled up, death is brought forth. There is a death upon the soul, and death comes upon the body; and, besides death spiritual and temporal, the wages of sin is eternal death too. Let sin therefore be repented of and forsaken before it be finished. "Why will ye die, O house of Israel," Eze. xxxiii. 11. God has no pleasure in your death, as he has no hand in your sin; but both sin and misery are owing to yourselves. Your own hearts' lusts and corruptions are your tempters; and when by degrees they have carried you off from God, and finished the power and dominion of sin in you, then they will prove your destroyers.

Thirdly. We are taught yet farther that, whilst we are the authors and procurers of all sin and misery to ourselves, "God is the Father and Fountain of all good," ver. 16, 17. We should take particular care not to err in our conceptions of God. "Do not err, my beloved brethren;" μὴ λαλᾶσθε, "Do not wander;" that is, from the word of God, and the accounts of him you have there. Do not stray into erroneous opinions, and go off from the standard of truth, the things which you have received from the Lord Jesus, and by the direction of his Spirit. The loose opinions of Simon and the Nicolaitans, (from whom the Gnostics, a most sensual, corrupt set of people arose afterward,) may, perhaps, by the apostle here, be more especially cautioned against. Those who are minded to look into these may consult the first book of Irenæus against heresies. Let corrupt men run into what notions they will, the truth as it is in Jesus stands thus, that God is not, cannot be, the author and patronizer of any thing that is evil; but must be acknowledged as the cause and spring of every thing that is good; ver. 17, "Every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights," &c. Here observe,

1. God is "the Father of lights." The visible light of the sun and heavenly bodies is from him. He said, "Let there be light, and there was light." Thus God is at once represented as the Creator of the sun and in some respects compared to it. "As the sun is the same in its nature and influences, though the earth and clouds often interposing make it seem to us as varying, by its rising and setting, and by its different appearances, or entire withdrawalment, when change is not in it; so God is unchangeable, and our changes and shadows are not from any mutability, or shadowy alterations in him, but from ourselves," —Mr. Baxter. "The Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." What the sun is in nature, God is in grace, providence, and glory. Aye, and infinitely more; for,

2. Every good gift is from him. As the Father of lights he gives the light of reason; "The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding," Job xxxii. 8. He gives also the light of learning. Solomon's wisdom in the knowledge of nature, and in the arts of government, and in all his improvements, is ascribed to God. The light of Divine revelation is more immediately from above. The light of faith, purity, and all manner of consolation is from him; so that we have nothing good but what we receive from God, as there is no evil or sin in us, or done by us, but what is owing to ourselves. We must own God as the author of all the powers and perfections that are in the creature, and the giver of all the benefits which we have in and by those powers and perfections. But none of their darknesses, their imperfections, or their ill actions, are to be charged on "the Father of lights." From him proceeds every good and perfect gift, both pertaining to this life and that which is to come.

3. That as every good gift is from God, so particularly the renovation of our natures, our regeneration, and all the holy, happy consequences of it, must be ascribed to him; ver. 18, "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth," &c. [The natural, carnal mind has nothing spiritually good; by regeneration the fountain of feeling and action is purified; the new heart—which God only can give—is the seal and source of all excellence in the character and life.] Here let us take notice, 1st. That a true Christian is a creature begotten anew. He becomes as different a person from what he was before the renewing influences of Divine grace as if he were formed over again, and born afresh. 2nd. The original of this good work is here declared. It is of God's own will; not by our skill or power, not from any good foreseen in us, or done by us, but purely from the goodwill and grace of God. 3rd. The means whereby this is effected are pointed out; the word of truth, that is, the Gospel; as St. Paul expresses it more plainly, 1 Cor. iv. 15, "I have begotten you in Jesus Christ through the Gospel." This Gospel is indeed a word of truth; or else it could never produce such real, such lasting, such great and noble effects. We may

God does not reproach the suppliant with past gifts misused. Fausset quotes here the Jewish prayer, "Let me not have need of the gifts of men, whose gifts are few, but their upbraidings manifold; but give me out of thy large and full hand."

i. 6. "In faith, nothing wavering," or "doubting." He must ask in the full persuasion that God can and will give. The word here translated "wavering" is not equivalent to "disbelieving." Faith says "Yes," and unbelief says "No;" doubting is the union of

"yes" and "no," but so that "no" is weightier: it is that inward giving way which leans not to faith but to unbelief. (Compare Alford.)

i. 7. "That he shall receive anything;" i.e., for which he is asking; some things he and all receive constantly—life, health, &c.

i. 8. This is not a general proposition, as in Authorised Version, but should read "a man double-souled, unstable in all his ways," referring to the doubting asker.

rely upon it, and venture our immortal souls upon it; and we shall find it a means of our sanctification, as it is "a word of truth," Jas. xvii. 17. 4. The end and design of God's giving renewing grace is here laid down; "That we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures." That we should be God's portion and treasure, and a more peculiar property to him, as the first-fruits were; and that we should become holy to the Lord, as the first-fruits were consecrated to him. Christ is the first-fruits of Christians; Christians are the first-fruits of creatures. [Some think that James here refers to the Jewish Christians. They were the first to receive the Gospel, and thus were the first-fruits of that great harvest of which Christ speaks, Mat. ix. 37. But we may also apply the word to all Christians, to express their entire consecration to God, and his special interest in them.]

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath: 20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. 21 Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls. 22 But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. 23 For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: 24 For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. 25 But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed. 26 If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain. 27 Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

In this part of the chapter we are required, First, To restrain the workings of passion. This lesson we should learn under affliction; and this we shall learn if we are indeed begotten again by the word of truth. For thus the connexion stands: an angry and hasty spirit is soon provoked to ill things by afflictions; and errors and ill opinions become prevalent through the workings of our own vile and vain affections. But the renewing grace of God, and the word of the Gospel, teach us to subdue these; "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath," &c. This may refer,

1. To "the word of truth" spoken of in the verse foregoing. And so we may observe, that it is our duty rather to hear God's word, and apply our minds to understand it, than to speak according to our own fancies, or the opinions of men, and to run into heat and passion thereupon. Let not such errors as that of God's being the occasion of men's sin ever be hastily, much less angrily, mentioned by you, (and so as to other errors,) but be ready to hear and consider what God's word teaches us in all such cases.

2. This may be applied to the afflictions and temptations spoken of in the beginning of the chapter. And then we may observe, that it is our duty rather to hear how God explains his providences, and what he designs by them, than to say as David did in his haste, "I am cut off;" or as Jonah did in his passion, "I do well to be angry." Instead of cursing God under our trials, let us open our ears and hearts to hear what he will say to us.

3. This may be understood as referring to the disputes and differences that Christians in those times of trial were running into among themselves. And so this part of this chapter may be considered without any connexion with what goes before. And here we may observe that, whenever matters of difference arise among Christians, each side should be willing to hear the other. People are many times stiff in their own opinions, because they are not willing to hear what others have to offer against them; whereas we should be swift to hear reason and truth on all sides, and be slow to speak any thing that should prevent this. And when we do speak there should be nothing of wrath, for "a soft answer turneth away wrath;" and, as this epistle is designed to correct a variety of disorders that were among Christians, these words, "swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath," may be very well interpreted according to this last explication. And we may further observe from them that, if men would govern their tongues, they must govern their passions. When Moses' spirit was provoked, he spake unadvisedly with his lips. If we would be slow to speak, we must be slow to wrath.

Secondly. A very good reason is given for suppressing of anger; ver. 20, "For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." It is as if the apostle had said, Whereas men often pretend zeal for God and his glory in their heat and passion, let them know that God needs not the passions of any man; his cause is better served by mildness and meekness than by wrath and fury. Solomon says, "The words of the wise are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools," Ecc. ix. 17. Dr. Manton here says of some assemblies, "That if we were as swift to hear as we are ready to speak, there would be less of wrath, and more of profit, in our meetings. I remember when a Manichee contested with Augustine, and with impudent clamour cried I hear me! hear me! the father modestly replied, Nec ego te, nec tu me, sed ambo audiamus apostolum." "Neither let me hear thee, nor do thou hear me, but let us both hear the apostle." The worst thing we can bring to a religious controversy is anger. This, however it pretends to be raised by a concern for what is just and right, yet is not to be trusted. Wrath is a human thing; and the wrath of man stands opposed to the righteousness of God. Those who pretend to serve the cause of God hereby shew that they are neither acquainted with God nor his cause. This passion must especially be watched against when we are hearing the word of God: see 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2.

Thirdly. We are called upon to suppress other corrupt affections, as well as rash anger; ver. 21, "Lay aside all filthiness, and superfluity of naughtiness," &c. The word here translated "filthiness" signifies those lusts which have the greatest turpitude and sensuality in them. And the words rendered "superfluity of naughtiness" may be understood of the overflows of malice, or any other spiritual wickednesses. Hereby we are taught, as Christians, to watch against and lay aside, not only those more gross and fleshly dispositions and affections which denominate a person filthy, but all the disorders of a corrupt and naughty heart, which would prejudice it against the word and ways of God. Observe, 1. That sin is a defiling thing; it is called "filthiness" itself. 2. That there is abundance of that which is evil in us to be watched against; there is superfluity of naughtiness. 3. It is not enough to restrain evil affections, but they must be cast from us, or laid apart. "Thou shalt cast them away as a menstruous cloth; thou shalt say, Get ye hence," Isa. xxx. 22. 4. This must extend not only to outward sins and greater abominations, but to all sin, of thought and affection as well as speech and practice. ἅπαν ῥυπαρίας, "All filthiness," every thing that is corrupt and sinful. 5. Observe from the foregoing parts of this chapter, that the laying apart all filthiness is what a time of temptation and affliction calls for, and is necessary to the avoiding of error, and rightly receiving and improving the word of truth. For, Fourthly. We are here fully, though briefly, instructed concerning hearing the word of God.

1. We are required to prepare ourselves for it, ver. 21; to get rid of every corrupt affection, and of every prejudice and prepossession; and to lay aside those sins which pervert the judgment, and blind the mind. "All that filthiness, and superfluity of naughtiness," before explained, must in an especial manner be subdued and cast off, by all such as attend on the word of the Gospel.

2. We are directed how to hear it. "Receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls." 1st. In hearing the word of God we are to receive it, assent to the truths of it, consent to the laws of it; receive it as the stock does the graft, so that as the fruit which is produced may be not according to the nature of the sour stock, but according to the nature of that word of the Gospel which is engrafted into our souls. 2nd. We must therefore yield ourselves to the word of God, with most submissive, humble, and tractable tempers. This is to receive it with meekness. Being willing to hear of our faults, and taking it not only patiently but thankfully; desiring also to be moulded and formed by the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel. 3rd. In all our hearing we should aim at the salvation of our souls. It is the design of the word of God to make us wise to salvation; and they that propose any meaner or lower ends to themselves in attending upon it dishonour the Gospel, and disappoint their souls. We should come to the word of God, both to read and hear it, as those that know it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," Rom. i. 16.

3. We are taught what is to be done after hearing; ver. 22, "But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." Observe here, 1st. That hearing is in order to doing. The most attentive and the most frequent hearing of the word of God will not avail us, unless we be also doers of it. If we were to hear a sermon every day of the week, and an angel from heaven were the preacher, yet, if we rested in bare hearing, it would never bring us to heaven. Therefore the apostle insists much upon it, (and without doubt it is indispensably necessary,) that we practice what we hear. "There must be inward practice by meditation, and outward practice in true obedience."—Mr. Baxter. It is not enough to remember what we hear, and to be able to repeat it, and to give testimony to it, and commend it, and write it, and preserve what we have written; but that which all this is in order to, and which crowns the rest, is, that we be doers of the word.

2nd. That bare hearers are self-deceivers. The original word, παρολογίζομενοι, signifies men's arguing sophistically to themselves. Their reasoning is manifestly deceitful and false, when they would make one part of their work discharge them from the obligation they lie under to another; or persuade themselves that filling their heads with notions is sufficient, though their hearts be empty of good affections and resolutions, and their lives fruitless of good works. Self-deceit will be found the worst deceit at last.

4. The apostle shews what is the proper use of the word of God, and who they are that do not use it as they ought, and who they are that do make a right use of it, ver. 23—25. Let us consider each of these distinctly:—

1st. The use we are to make of God's word may be learned from its being compared to a glass, in which a man may behold his natural face. As a looking-glass shews us the spots and defilements upon our faces, that they may be remedied and washed off, so the word of God shews us our sins that we may repent of them, and get them pardoned, and shews us what is amiss that it may be amended. There are glasses that will flatter people, but that which is truly the word of God is no flattering glass. If you flatter yourselves, it is your own fault; the truth as it is in Jesus flatters no man. Let the word of truth be carefully attended to, and it will set before you the corruption of your nature, the disorders of your hearts and lives; it will tell you plainly what you are. St. Paul describes himself as insensible of the corruption of his nature till he saw himself in the glass of the law; Rom. vii. 9. I was alive without the law; that is, I took all to be right with me, and thought myself not only clean, but, compared with the generality of the world, that I was beautiful too. "But when the commandment came," when the glass of the law was set before me, "then sin revived and I died." Then I saw my spots and deformities, and discovered that amiss in myself which before I was not aware of; and such was the power of the law and of sin, that I then perceived myself in a state of death and condemnation. Thus, when we attend to the word of God so as to see ourselves, our true state and condition, to rectify what is amiss, and to form and dress ourselves anew by the glass of God's word, this is to make a proper use of it.

2nd. We have here an account of those who do not use this glass of the word as they ought; ver. 24, "He that beholdeth himself, and goes his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was." This is the true description of one that hears the word of God, and does it not. How many are there that, when they sit under the word, are affected with their own sinfulness, and misery, and danger, acknowledge the evil of sin, acknowledge their need of Christ, but when their hearing is over, all is forgotten, convictions are lost, good affections are vanished, and pass away like the waters of a land flood; he straightway forgets, &c. "The word of God," as Dr. Manton speaks, "discovereth how we may do away our sins, and deck and attire our souls with the righteousness of Jesus Christ." Maculae sunt peccata, quae ostendit lex; aqua est sanguis Christi, quem ostendit evangelium.—"Our sins are the spots which the law discovers; Christ's blood is the laver which the Gospel shews." But in vain do we hear God's word, and look into the gospel glass, if we go away and forget our spots instead of washing them off, and forget our remedy instead of applying to it. This is the case of those who do not hear the word as they ought.

i. 12. "He hath promised" not "the Lord hath," according to best MSS.

i. 13. "For God cannot be tempted with evil;" Alford would read, "God is unversed in things evil"—i.e., has no experience of; and the original favours this interpretation. The apostle's argument thus far may be briefly summed up thus: "Your trial works patience; patience, having her perfect work, life; lust produces sin; sin, when completed, death."

i. 16—18. The idea that God tempts to sin has been as yet only negatively contradicted, but not only does he not tempt to evil, he is the author of all good. "First-fruits;" a figure familiar to the Jews. "Believers are the first of God's regenerated creatures, and thus a pledge of the ultimate regeneration of all creation" (Fausset). See Rom. viii. 20, 21.

i. 19. The best MSS. read, "know" or "ye know," not "wherefore." The connection, therefore, would be "ye know it"—i.e., the

3rd. Those also are described, and pronounced blessed, that hear aright, and that use the glass of God's word as they should do; ver. 25, "Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein," &c. ["Looketh into;" it is the same word as that employed, 1 Pet. i. 12, "angels desire to look into," and expresses an earnest desire for thorough and comprehensive knowledge.] Observe here, that the Gospel is a law of liberty, or, as Mr. Baxter expresses it, of liberation, giving us deliverance from the Jewish law, and from sin and guilt, and wrath and death. The ceremonial law was a yoke of bondage, the Gospel of Christ is a law of liberty. [The Gospel establishes the law, it secures free obedience, it comes with all the force of law; men are bound to obey it.] Observe again, that it is a perfect law; nothing can be added to it. Observe farther, that in hearing the word we look into this perfect law; we consult it for counsel and direction; we look into it that from thence we may take our measures. But observe withal, that then only do we look into the law of liberty as we should when we "continue therein;" "when we dwell in the study of it till it turn to a spiritual life engrafted and digested in us." Mr. Baxter. When we are not forgetful of it, but practise it as our work and business, set it always before our eyes, and make it the constant rule of our conversation and behaviour, and model the temper of our minds by it. Observe once more from this place, that they who thus do and continue in the law and word of God are, and shall be, "blessed in their deed;" blessed in all their ways, according to the first Psalm, which some think St. James here alludes to. He that meditates in the law of God, and walks according to it, the Psalmist says, shall prosper in whatsoever he does. And he that is not a perfunctory hearer, but a doer of the work which God's word sets him about, St. James says, "shall be blessed." The papists pretend that here we have a clear text to prove we are blessed for our good deeds; but Dr. Manton, in answer to that pretence, puts the reader upon marking the distinctness of Scripture phrase: the apostle does not say for his deeds that any man is blessed, but in his deed. This is a way in which we shall certainly find blessedness, but not the cause of it. This blessedness does not lie in knowing, but in doing, the will of God; Jno. xiii. 17, "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." It is not talking but walking that will bring us to heaven.

Fifthly. The apostle next informs us how we may distinguish betwixt a vain religion and that which is pure and approved of God. Great and hot disputes there are in the world about this matter,—what religion is false and vain, and what is true and pure. I wish men would agree to let the holy Scripture in this place determine the question. And here it is plainly and peremptorily declared,

1. What is a vain religion; ver. 26, "If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain." Here are three things to be observed:—

1st. In a vain religion there is much of show, and affecting to seem religious in the eye of others. This I think is mentioned in a manner that should fix our thoughts on the word "seemeth." When men are more concerned to seem religious than really to be so, it is a sign their religion is but vain. Not that religion itself is a vain thing,—they do it a great deal of wrong that say, "It is in vain to serve the Lord;" but it is possible people may make it a vain thing, if they have only a form of godliness, and not the power.

2nd. In a vain religion there is much censuring, reviling, and detracting of others. The not bridling the tongue here is chiefly meant of not abstaining from these evils of the tongue. When we hear people ready to speak of the faults of others, or to censure them as holding scandalous errors, or to lessen the wisdom and piety of those about them, that themselves may seem the wiser and better, this is a sign that they have but a vain religion. That man who has a detracting tongue cannot have a truly humble, gracious heart. He that delights to injure his neighbour in vain pretends to love God; therefore a reviling tongue will prove a man a hypocrite. Censuring is a pleasing sin, extremely compliant with nature, and therefore evidences a man's being in a natural state. These sins of the tongue were the great sins of that age in which St. James wrote, as other parts of this epistle fully shew, and it is an ill sign of a vain religion, says Dr. Manton, "to be carried away with the evil of the times." This has ever been a leading sin with hypocrites, that the more ambitious they have been to seem well themselves, the more free they are in censuring and running down others; and there is such quick intercourse betwixt the tongue and the heart, that the one may be known by the other. On these accounts it is that the apostle has made an unbridled tongue an undoubted, certain proof of a vain religion. There is no strength nor power in that religion which will not enable a man to bridle his tongue. [An unbridled tongue is not merely one which utters slanders or passionate language, but also one which is silent when it should speak out for Christ, or in the way of admonition and advice to others. Horses are bridled, not only to restrain them, but to render them useful. But observe, that while an unbridled tongue is a proof of a vain religion, James does not say that a bridled tongue is a certain proof of true religion, for men may be temperate in speech while they are strangers to godliness.]

3rd. In a vain religion a man "deceiveth his own heart." He goes on in such a course of detracting from others, and making himself seem somebody, that at last the vanity of his religion is consummated by the deceiving of his own soul. When once religion comes to be a vain thing, how great is the vanity!

2. It is here plainly and peremptorily declared wherein true religion consists; ver. 27, "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this." [Pure religion is this,—as to its outward evidences, its visible fruits; its existence is proved, and its real nature is displayed, by active love, by readiness for every good word and work, and by self-denial. Without some degree of this holy love, and deadness to the world, neither zeal for doctrinal truth, nor the rigid observance of outward forms, will prove a man to be a child of God.] Observe,

1st. It is the glory of religion to be "pure and undefiled," not mixed with the inventions of men, nor the corruptions of the world. False religions may be known by their impurity and uncharitableness; according to that of St. John, "He that doth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother," 1 Jno. iii. 10. But, on the other hand, a holy life and a charitable heart shew a true religion. Our religion is not, says Dr. Manton, adorned with ceremonies, but purity and charity; and it is a good observation of his, that a religion which is pure should be kept undefiled.

2nd. That religion is pure and undefiled which is so before God and the Father. That is right which is so in God's eye, and which chiefly aims at his approbation. True religion teaches us to do everything as in the presence of God, and to seek his favour, and study to please him in all our actions.

3rd. That compassion and charity to the poor and distressed is a very great and necessary part of true religion; "Visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction." Visiting is here put for all manner of relief which we are capable of giving to others; and fatherless and widows are here particularly mentioned, because they are generally most apt to be neglected or oppressed, but by them are meant all others that are objects of charity, all that are in affliction. It is very remarkable that, if the sum of religion be drawn up in two articles, this is one, to be charitable and relieve the afflicted.

4th. That an unspotted life must accompany an unfeigned love and charity; truth of the foregoing statement; "but" (consequently) "let every man," &c. "Wrath;" not sudden passion, but revengeful anger (Trench, "New Testament Synonyms").

i. 20. "The wrath of man," &c.: "How many an endeavour which might have ended in 'working the righteousness of God' has been diverted and blighted by hasty speaking and anger, and ended only in disgracing ourselves, and him whom we would have served, before men!" (Alford).

"To keep himself unspotted from the world." The world is apt to spot and blemish the soul, and it is hard to live in it, and have to do with it, and not be defiled, but this must be our constant endeavour. Herein consists pure and undefiled religion. The very things of the world too much taint our spirits if we are much conversant with them, but the sins and lusts of the world deface and defile them very woefully indeed. St. John comprises "all that is in the world" which we are not to love under three heads,—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life; and to keep one's-self unspotted from all these is to keep ourselves unspotted from the world. May God by his grace keep both our hearts and lives clean from the love of the world, and from the temptations of wicked, worldly men.

[The original expositor has omitted to notice the expression "Father," used by the apostle, and doubtless with reference to the way in which true religion operates in the production of benevolence. The man, once alienated, who believes in Christ, now returns to God as, in him, his reconciled Father, and is furnished with unutterably powerful motives, alike for the love of God and of his fellow-creatures. He loves God, who has forgiven all his iniquities, and restored him to the number, and given him a right to the privileges, of his children. He loveth him as a Father, and looking upon all mankind as created after the Divine image, he grieves at its effacement, and seeks its restoration by their being brought to believe in Him who is the way, the truth, and the life. Nor will he, whilst desiring their spiritual, be indifferent to their temporal good. The Divine law now written in his heart will prompt him to corresponding duty,—duty having respect to the body as well as to the soul,—to the concerns of time as well as of eternity. Such the source, and such the manifestation, of Christian philanthropy,—a philanthropy of which, if you asked the extent or the boundary of its field, we should answer, in the language of inspiration, that the field is the world,—a philanthropy which overlooks all the distinctions of caste and of colour, and spreads its ample regards over the whole brotherhood of the species,—a philanthropy which attaches itself to man in the general; to man throughout all his varieties; to man as the partaker of one common nature, and who, in whatever clime or latitude you may meet with him, is found to breathe the same sympathies, and to possess the same high capabilities, both of bliss and of improvement. It is true that, upon this subject, there is often a loose and unsettled magnificence of thought, which is fruitful of nothing but empty speculation. But the men to whom we allude have not imaged the enterprise in the form of a thing unknown. They have given it a local habitation. They have bodied it forth in deed and in accomplishment. They have turned the dream into a reality. In them, the power of a lofty generalization meets with its happiest temperament, in the principle and perseverance, and all the chastening and subduing virtues of the New Testament. And, were we in search of that fine union of grace and of greatness which we have now been insisting on, and in virtue of which the enlightened Christian can at once find room in his bosom for the concerns of universal humanity, and for the play of kindness towards every individual he meets with—we could no where more readily expect to find it than with the worthies of our own land—the Howard of a former generation, who paced over Europe in quest of the unseen wretchedness which abounds in it—or in such men of our present generation as Wilberforce, who lifted his unwearied voice against the biggest outrage ever practised on our nature, till he wrought its extermination—and Clarkson, who plied his assiduous task at rearing the materials of its impressive history, and at length carried, for this righteous cause, the mind of parliament—and Carey, from whose hand the generations of the East are now receiving the elements of their moral renovation—and, in fine, those holy and devoted men who count not their lives dear unto them; but, going forth every year from the island of our habitation, carry the message of heaven over the face of the world; and, in the front of severest obloquy, are now labouring in remotest lands, and are reclaiming another and another portion from the wastes of dark and fallen humanity; and are widening the domains of gospel light and gospel principle amongst them; and are spreading a moral beauty around the very spot on which they pitch their lowly tabernacle; and are at length compelling even the eye and the testimony of gainsayers, by the success of their noble enterprise; and are forcing the exclamation of delighted surprise from the charmed and the arrested traveller, as he looks at the softening tints which they are now spreading over the wilderness, and as he hears the sound of the chapel bell, and as in those haunts where, at the distance of half a generation, savages would have scowled upon his path, he reposes himself with the hum of missionary schools, and the lovely spectacle of peaceful and Christian villages.]—Chalmers's Astronomical Discourses.

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter the apostle condemns a sinful regarding the rich, and despising the poor, which he imputes to partiality and injustice, and shews it to be an acting contrary to God, who has chosen the poor, and whose interest is often persecuted, and his name blasphemed, by the rich, ver. 1—7. He shews that the whole law is to be fulfilled, and that mercy should be followed as well as justice, ver. 8—13. He exposes the error and folly of those that boast of faith without works; telling us that this is but a dead faith, and such a faith as devils have, not the faith of Abraham, or of Rahab, ver. 14—26.

Y brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. 2 For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; 3 And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: 4 Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? 5 Harken, my beloved

i. 21. "The engrafted word;" or, the implanted word; the same that is called (verse 18) "the word of truth"—the Gospel in its fullness. (See the Parable of the Sower.)

ii. 1. "In respectings of persons;" plural, to show that the fault may occur in various forms, one of which is then mentioned.

ii. 2. "Your assembly;" in the Greek, "synagogue." This is the only place in the New Testament where the word is used with reference to Christian worship; it was associated with Jewish worship, brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? 6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you; and draw you before the judgment seats? 7 Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?

ROMAN CITIZENS, RICH AND POOR.

[The first verse is variously translated. Some render it affirmatively, "Ye have not the faith (that is, ye adhere not to the teaching) of our Lord Jesus," thus making it a charge against those to whom James wrote. Others render it interrogatively, "In having respect to persons, can ye hold the faith?" While others regard it as an exhortation, "Do not so hold the faith as to shew respect to persons." Whichever of these be correct, it is plain that the apostle is here reproving a very corrupt practice.]

The apostle is here reproving a very corrupt practice. He shews how much mischief there is in the sin of προσωποληψία, "respect of persons," which seemed to be a very growing evil in the churches of Christ, even in those early ages, and which in these after times has sadly corrupted and divided Christian nations and societies. And here we have,

First. A caution against this sin laid down in general; ver. 1, "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons." Observe here,

1. The character of Christians fully implied. They are such as have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. They embrace it, they receive it, they govern themselves by it; they entertain the doctrine, and submit to the law and government of Christ; they have it as a trust, they have it as a treasure.

2. How honourably St. James speaks of Jesus Christ. He calls him "the Lord of glory," for he is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the "express image of his person."

3. Christ's being "the Lord of glory" should teach us not to respect Christians for anything so much as their relation and conformity to Christ. "You that profess to believe the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, which the poorest Christian shall partake of equally with the rich, and to which all worldly glory is but vanity, you should not make men's outward and worldly advantages the measure of your respect." In professing the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, we should not shew respect to men, so as to cloud or lessen the glory of our glorious Lord. However any may think of it, this is certainly a very heinous sin.

Secondly. We have this sin described and cautioned against by an instance or example of it; ver. 2, 3. "For if there come into your assembly a man with a gold ring, &c. Assembly here is meant of those meetings which were appointed for deciding matters of difference among the members of the church, or for determining when censures should be passed upon any, and what those censures should be. Therefore the Greek word here used, συναγωγή, signifies such an assembly as that in the Jewish synagogues when they met to do justice. Maimonides says, (as I find the passage quoted by Dr. Manton,) 'That it was expressly provided by the Jews' constitutions, that when a poor man and rich plead together, the rich shall not be bidden to sit down, and the poor stand or sit in a worse place, but both sit or both stand alike.' To this the phrases used by the apostle have a most plain reference, and therefore the assembly here spoken of must be some such as the synagogue assemblies of the Jews were, when they met to hear causes and to execute justice. To these the arbitrations and censures of their Christian assemblies are compared. But we must be careful not to apply what is here said to the common assemblies for worship, for in these certainly there may be appointed different places for persons, according to their rank and circumstances, without sin. They do not understand the apostle who fix his severity here upon this practice; they do not mind the word judges, used in ver. 4, nor what is said of their being convicted as transgressors by the law, if they had such a respect of persons as is here spoken of, according to ver. 9. Thus, now put the case: There comes into your assembly (when of the same nature with some of those at the synagogue,) a man that is distinguished by his dress, and that makes a figure; and there comes in also a poor man in vile raiment, and ye carry it partially, and determine wrong or ill things, merely because the one makes a better appearance, or is in better circumstances than the other.

[Assembly.] That this word is used in the sense of meetings for Christian worship, is evident from Heb. x. 25. In this place there is not the shadow of authority for taking it in the sense of 'your judicial assemblies.' What the apostle condemns is, the regarding wealth and splendour as necessarily honourable, and poverty as necessarily disgraceful. Such conduct is sinful in any assembly, but above all in one met for Christian worship, where rich and poor are on a common level. If the sin referred to were partiality in deciding causes, we may be sure that the apostle would have denounced so gross an iniquity in more pointed and severe terms.] Observe from hence,

1. That God has his remnant among all sorts of people; among those that wear soft and gay clothing, and among those that wear poor and vile raiment. But observe,

2. That in matters of religion rich and poor stand upon a level; no man's riches set him in the least nearer to God, nor does any man's poverty set him at a distance from God. With the Most High there is no respect of persons, and therefore in matters of conscience there should be none with us.
